LITERATURE.

Life and Letters of the Right Honourable Robert Lowe, Viscount Sherbrooke. With a Memoir of Sir John Coape Sherbrooke. By A. Patchett Martin. In 2 vols. (Longmans.)

THIS is a biography very much the reverse of that famous pudding whose fault was to have too many plums and no suet. Plums, indeed, there are, and of the best quality, though all too few—first and best an autobiographical fragment by Lord Sherbrooke himself, then some brief reminiscences of him contributed by the Master of Balliol, Mr. Lionel Tollemache, and other personal friends, printed apart from the body of the work, and various anecdotes and letters dispersed through the two volumes and less easy of extraction by the literary Jack Horner. But the suet, as represented by Mr. Martin's own contribution, preponderates enormously in bulk and weight.

It must be counted as one of Lord Sherbrooke's many misfortunes that the task of relating and vindicating his whole career was not entrusted to some more skilful hand. The chapter of autobiography breaks off abruptly soon after the writer's arrival in Australia. The concluding portion was lost in transmission through the post-office. Owing to that unhappy accident the world has not only so much the less of Lord Sherbrooke, but so much the more of Mr. Martin. To pass from the prose of the one to the prose of the other is indeed a painful fall. The style of the great political critic is here, as always, terse, masculine, and scholarly, vibrating too for once with a note of pathetic sadness, of baffled affection that finds its only relief in tracing out the unbroken sequence of moral causes and effects. Mr. Martin is pompous, prolix, commonplace, fussily apologetic, very much disposed to take refuge behind authorities, sometimes, as is the way of weak men, breaking into violent language, and in the statement of his facts neither so complete nor so exact as could be wished. As a writer he belongs to the sort who always say "different to," who use "allude to" instead of "mention," and who call John Bright a "Tribune of the People." Lord Beaconsfield seems to be his favourite hero; and it is evidently a sore point with him that Lowe did not ultimately turn out a Jingo, but very much the reverse.

People with a taste for antithesis might sum up the popular estimate of Robert Lowe's character somewhat in the following fashion: He was a great classical scholar, who constantly flouted classical learning because it led to no immediate material gains. He was a great Liberal politician, who opposed Parliamentary reform, thereby gaining office in a Reform cabinet, and leaning for support on the majority it had secured. He was a great master of expression, who made more unfortunate speeches than all other contemporary orators put together. He was a most ingenious administrator, whose contrivances caused intense annoyance to some classes of the community without enlisting the favour of any. Such a picture would unquestionably err in the way both of exaggeration and of omission; but with all the facts of Lowe's life laid before us and placed in the best possible light by his admiring friends, it must still be allowed to contain a large element of truth. But even were it altogether a misconception, the misconception would have to be explained. We ask ourselves why such a truly great and noble character as is presented in these pages should, outside a select circle of intimates, have been rewarded with such persistent unpopularity.

Lord Sherbrooke himself attributed nearly all his mishaps to the misfortune of having been born an Albino with very weak and short-sighted eyes. At Winchester, where he was placed "at the rather advanced age of thirteen," he remained for a year and a half the butt of a hundred and thirty boys, who for several hours in the day had no employment but to torment one another. At Oxford he set his heart on a double-first, and succeeded in Literae Humaniores, but took only a second in mathematics, having rubbed out with his nose much that he had written with his hand. He gained a fellowship, but lost it immediately by his marriage—a step which also drew down on him the displeasure of his father. The elder Mr. Lowe, himself a clergyman, wished his son to retain the fellowship with a view to taking holy orders, and refused to make him any allowance while reading for the bar, which the young man had chosen as his profession. In order to procure the necessary funds for this purpose, Lowe had to work for seven years as a private tutor, often giving an hour each to ten or eleven pupils in the day, and for five years taking pupils in the Long Vacation as well—a labour compared to which "everything else he had to do in his life was mere play and recreation" (vol. i., p. 24). His earnings during this period seem never to have exceeded £700 or £800 a year. In teaching, his defective eyesight obliged him to trust entirely to his memory for the texts, but even with this disadvantage he ranked as the best coach in Oxford. Studying law came as a delightful change after this sort of business, a reconciliation with his father was effected, and he was called to the bar in 1842, being then a little over thirty. But the preparatory reading had seriously affected his eyes, and the oculists whom he consulted told him that in seven years he would become totally blind. Meanwhile, adding blunder to blunder, they recommended out-of-door work under the glaring sun of Australia as a suitable occupation. To Australia Lowe went, not to work out of doors, but to make, if possible, by legal practice during the term of sight that still remained money enough to live on for the rest of his life. Soon after landing at Sydney he "in an evil hour consulted a doctor," who advised him at once to discontinue his legal work under pain of immediate blindness. After eight months and a half of enforced idleness he resumed the practice of his profession, made his mark both in the law courts and in the Legislative Council of the colony, and was never again debarred from activity by the state of his eyes. But both as a barrister and as a Parliamentary speaker, in Australia and in England, his shortsightedness proved a serious obstacle to success. In the law-courts he could not study the faces of witnesses and jurymen: in the House of Commons he could not watch the effect of his words on the audience. Worst of all, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, he could not refuse unjustifiable demands for public money in such a way as to avoid giving offence—though one does not quite understand how the most eagle-eyed minister is better qualified as such for performing this difficult operation.

There is no doubt a good deal in Lord Sherbrooke's explanation of his unpopularity; but, like most very simple explanations, it seems to be overstrained. People generally over-estimate the importance of their chief deficiency, whatever it may be. The desire of women for power has been very shrewdly traced to an exaggerated sense of the disadvantage at which they are placed by the weakness of their sex. It never seems to have struck Lord Sherbrooke that to live for seven years shut up with private pupils, one at a time, and for seven years more as an exile at the Antipodes, was almost enough of itself to put him out of touch with the opinions and feelings of ordinary home-staying Englishmen. Disraeli very happily called Lowe's great anti-reform speeches the work of an inspired schoolboy; and there always was a certain boyish freshness about the hero of the Cave. But no amount of inspiration will give a schoolboy tact; and we need only run over Lowe's most famous blunders to perceive that they were due to the want of an acquired mental sense, rather than to the congenital want of a bodily sense. In 1856, when introducing a bill for the abolition of shipping dues in Liverpool harbour, he referred contemptuously to the "musty parchments" on which the rights of the corporation were based. The phrase, as Mr. Martin tells us, "made every squire in the country tremble for his title deeds" (vol. ii., p. 122). The bill had to be withdrawn, Sir Frederick Thesiger, its chief opponent, observing, "Yes; Lowe and I have thrown it out!" In his speech on the reading of the Reform Bill in 1866 he asked the celebrated question: "If you want venality, if you want ignorance, if you want drunkenness . . . do you go to the top or to the bottom of the constituencies?" Of course it went all over the country that the chief anti-reform orator in the House of Commons had called the working men of England ignorant, drunken, and venal. Lowe did not say that, but he had no business to use words that looked so like saying it. It makes no practical difference whether I say that M. N. is occasionally addicted to porcine habits, or call him, briefly, a pig. Moreover, the better the words were explained away, the less was their value as an argument. If they did not mean that the vices specified were so common among working men as to disqualify them for the franchise, they meant nothing at all. Here, at any rate, there could be no question of studying the faces of the audience, for Lowe must have known that his words were received with enthusiastic applause by the Tory party. Ten years later he took occasion to contrast the economical manner in which he had raised funds for paying the Alabama indemnity with the extravagant commission paid by Disraeli to Baron Rothschild for advancing the price of the Suez Canal shares; forgetting, as Mr. Lucy observes, that "the one was a transaction of which we were proud, whereas the other was a matter which most Englishmen were anxious to forget" (vol. ii., p. 436). The evident displeasure of the House and of the country taught him no discretion; for, speaking a few weeks later against the Bill for making the Queen Empress of India, he argued that if ever we lost India the title would have to be dropped—a maladroitness passed over by Mr. Martin—and as if this was not enough, he went down to Retford and told the people there that at least two previous Ministers had been applied to but had refused to procure this title for the Queen. Here, I believe, the chronicle of his indiscretions closes. The enfant terrible had kept a good one for the last, and the terrible birching he got for it from Disraeli was not lightly to be forgotten.

Men of this childlike candour are sometimes very appropriately kept in order by their wives. But Mrs. Lowe, though in many respects a most admirable wife, probably acted rather as a stimulus than as a restraint on her idolised Robert. The same prolonged seclusion had evidently affected her in the same manner. Mr. Jowett tells us that she "was very independent of the conventionalities of the world," "said just what came into her head, without thinking of the persons who might happen to be present," and "was rather brusque in her manners." When the French Ambassador observed to her that "in England, which was said to be a nation of shopkeepers, he did not expect to find such great military displays," she replied that "the people of different countries did not understand one another. She, too, had been under the impression that the French were a great military nation" (vol. ii., p. 489). Her husband was always chaffing her, and a specimen of his chaff has been preserved. On one occasion when Mr. Goldwin Smith (who tells the story) was present,

"the English marriage-service was the subject of conversation. Lowe said, in his dashing way, that it was full of nonsense. 'Why,' he exclaimed (turning to his wife), 'it made me say "with all my worldly goods I thee endow," when I had no worldly goods wherewith to endow you.' 'Ah! Robert,' she replied, 'but there were your brains.' 'Well,' he said, 'all the world knows that I did not endow you with them'" (vol. ii., p. 200).

"Such sallies," observes Mr. Jowett, "did not at all interfere with the harmony in which they lived." Unfortunately all the world was not Lowe's wife, and his sallies often seriously disturbed the harmony between it and him.

Next to want of sight, want of money seems to have been the great trouble with Lowe. "To regret that I have no money," he ingenuously tells us, "has been to me during the whole of my life no uncommon sensation" (vol. i., p. 40). Nor was it an uncommon sensation with the public to hear him express his regret. He bitterly resented, as we all know, the deficiencies of an education that did not enable him to amass a fortune in his younger days. In a well-remembered passage (not quoted by Mr. Martin) he complained that in Australia he was walking over gold without knowing it, thanks to having been taught Greek and Latin instead of chemistry and geology. His success in life, such as it was, he attributed to the English books that he read for amusement rather than to his classical education. It might have occurred to him that all very clever boys read English without being obliged or persuaded, to do so by a scholastic apparatus, whereas Greek and Latin would be nowhere as optional subjects. Harriet and Mary can take care of themselves; Helen and Dido cannot. It is worth noticing that, in consequence of his defective sight, physical science was the one branch of knowledge that Lowe could not cultivate with success. In the midst of his tremendous exertions as an Oxford coach he found time and strength to take lessons in Sanskrit. As a busy politician and journalist he mastered Icelandic. During his tenure of the Exchequer he read the Hebrew Bible through twice, as Prince Prigio did sums in long division, for fun. But the microscope and the astronomical telescope were more than he could manage. Hence he probably overestimated the value of physical knowledge to non-professional students. A statesman of fifty would not be much helped by imperfect reminiscences of the chemistry or physiology he had learned thirty years before. Nor as an instrument of general culture is the value of such sciences very great. What Lowe said of the English middle-class is more or less true of all classes: "they want elevation of mind, they want to be told that money is not the be-all and end-all of life." These things are not to be learned in scientific laboratories, nor yet from the modern French novels that Lowe recommended as class-books, but from such teachers as Aeschylus and Demosthenes, Plato and Aristotle, Lucretius and Horace. For the rest Lowe had comparatively inexpensive tastes, and showed complete disinterestedness as regards money. Although he does not seem to have made a fortune in Australia or at the English bar, he refused the offer of a seat in the Council of Calcutta with a salary of £8,000 a year made to him by the Conservative government in 1859 (vol. ii. p. 175); nor would he afterwards accept the pension of £2,000 to which he was entitled as an ex-cabinet minister (vol. ii., p. 509).

Speaking of the great reforming government in which he held a place second only to that of Mr. Gladstone, Lowe once quoted the lines:

"One crowded hour of glorious life Is worth an age without a name."

But his own crowded hour of glorious life was more truly the period of his temporarily successful opposition to the extension of the suffrage in 1866. Of his speech on the first reading of Mr. Gladstone's bill (not the speech on the second reading, as Mr. Martin strangely thinks), the late Earl of Derby, then Lord Stanley, wrote to Mrs. Lowe that it had done more to influence affairs than any delivered in Parliament within his recollection (vol. ii., p. 288). Of the speech on the second reading, the Speaker (Mr. Denison) said that it was one of the greatest and ablest delivered within his memory. Sir John Walsh called it the greatest and the noblest he had heard since 1830. Lord Shaftesbury, writing in his private journal, doubted "whether a speech better adapted to place, persons, and circumstances, was ever delivered in any country or in any age" (ib., 290-1). And next year, when household suffrage had been passed, it seemed to some of us at the time as if the champion of the lost cause had won more by his failure than his opponents by their success: as if, amid all that ghastly wreck of broken pledges and discredited pretensions, that mob of Liberals unfaithful to progress and Conservatives unfaithful to order, of Ministers who had thrown up office in a huff and Ministers who clung to office through ignominy and defeat, with one Parliamentary chief incapable of leading and the other too capable of betraying his party, there had emerged a new supreme reputation—as if Robert Lowe had proved himself the one truly patriotic English statesman, morally and intellectually the foremost man in the foremost assembly in the world. Yet never before or after did he show himself so destitute of political wisdom; and his success was a satire on the institutions he had defended. He had been a Liberal all his life. He agreed with the Liberal party and disagreed with the Conservative party in every point but one—extension of the borough franchise. From the fact that the strength of his own party lay in those constituencies where the poorer electors were most numerous, he might have inferred, what subsequently came to pass, that the newly-enfranchised voters would give their support to his own side and his own principles. When Mill foretold that an extended suffrage would lead to a comprehensive measure of popular education, Lowe replied that his own educational reforms had received no support from the members for popular constituencies. This is too much even for Mr. Martin, who observes that Lowe, had he condescended to address himself to an audience of working-men, could easily have enlisted them on his side. He made a great point of showing that the arguments of the Liberal leaders proved as much for universal suffrage as for a £7 franchise. But a good cause ought not to suffer because once in a way it is supported by bad reasons. Many of his own arguments would have been equally good against the Reform Act of 1832, of which he approved; indeed, they were largely borrowed from the Tory speeches of that epoch. Still better could they have been urged against Locke King's £10 County Franchise Bill, which he supported. Granting all the harm that could be said of universal suffrage, that cataclysm would have been brought no nearer by Mr. Gladstone's very moderate measure than by the maintenance of the status quo; it might even have been hurried on, as had happened in France, by the obstinate refusal of all concessions. Above all, there was the danger, foreseen by Lowe himself, that if Disraeli came into office he might carry a more extreme measure, and even secure the new voters for himself.

Another important point, ignored or misinterpreted by Lowe, was the growing administrative inefficiency of the existing representative system. The present generation is so accustomed to strong and able Governments, supported by large and well-disciplined majorities, that it does not realise the state of impotence into which the party system had fallen since the overthrow of Sir Robert Peel. Lord Palmerston passes for a strong Premier; but he was really weak both at home and abroad—witness his very narrow escape from a vote of censure after the Danish fiasco—and in his last years was only kept in power by the popularity of Mr. Gladstone and the enthusiasm for Italian freedom. His cabinets were half filled with idle or incompetent Whig nobles; and such political mediocrities as Sir George Grey and Cornwall Lewis did little to redress the balance. In 1856 we find Lord Granville vainly "moving heaven and earth to get Lowe into office"; while in deference to Lord Lansdowne such a worthless fribble and clothes-horse as Vernon Smith is taken in. After doing admirable work in the departments of Health and Education, Lowe was left unsupported and driven to resign in 1864. Other great public servants fared worse. Mr. Martin reminds us of the "rude and abusive letter" sent by Lord Panmure to Lord Raglan, and of the sharp reprimand administered by the incompetent Duke of Newcastle to the same heroic general (vol. ii., p. 81); and he also tells us how Sir James Outram, "the Bayard of India," was only rescued from disgrace by the chivalrous intervention of Lowe (ib. pp. 67-9). Whatever we hear about the Colonial Office during Lowe's residence in Australia tells the same story of weak and mischievous blundering. Compared with what went before it, the last quarter of a century has been a period of light and leading.

According to Mr. Martin, what turned Lowe into an enemy of democracy was an American tour made in the summer of 1856. If so, his experience took a long time to bear fruit, for he voted (if I remember rightly) against Disraeli's Bill of 1859 as not going far enough, advocated reform in an electoral address of the same year, and, as a member of Lord Palmerston's Government, must have supported the £6 Bill of 1860—facts passed over by his biographer. It has been suggested that a desire to be revenged on the Whig leaders for abandoning him in 1864 had something to do with his volte-face of the following year; but the Life supplies no evidence in point, except that in a private letter dated September 16, 1866, he speaks of the bringing in of a reform bill that year as "a direct challenge to him to do his worst" (vol. ii. p. 306). On the whole, the likeliest theory seems to be that, as usual, he quite misunderstood the feeling of the House, the constituencies, the educated classes, and the country (see especially the letter of February 25, 1866, ib. p. 268). Having once chosen his side, he threw himself into it with all the rash ardour of an unpaid advocate, and came to believe in the claim of an effete oligarchy to pass for middle-class government as fervently as Dr. Kenealy believed in the claim of an Australian butcher to the name and position of an English baronet.

How far Lowe was prepared to justify his conduct during the reform crisis in the light of subsequent experience does not appear. He was certainly ready to accept office under Mr. Gladstone in 1880, and did not like being shelved with a peerage (vol. ii. p. 449). Mr. Jowett draws a pleasing picture of the liking and admiration entertained by Lord Sherbrooke for his former opponent Mr. Bright. There had, in fact, ceased to be any essential difference between them. But of the two it was certainly not Bright who had changed; and the increasing ascendancy of ideas which they both shared went to prove the superior wisdom of the great orator who, in the war of progress against privilege, saw that the support of the unenfranchised millions would be given to the side on which he fought, and which has won.

ALFRED W. BENN.

Many Inventions. By Rudyard Kipling. (Macmillans.)

At last the short story has taken firm root in English soil, though in France many a master of fiction has fashioned his most lasting creations in this form. But of late, certain English newspapers have caused a demand for such work, and Mr. Kipling has been, more than any one else, its pioneer.

As yet, however, too many of the tales put before us are only boiled-down novels. Few of our authors have acquired, as have their French contemporaries, notably Barbey D'Aurevilly, the trick of choosing such subjects as ought not to be treated in any other manner. The doings of their personages, for instance, are not always immediately intelligible; yet if a short story is to be effective, the characters must be so introduced as to make the reader feel at once that he knows them personally. For in work of this class the rapid and sure delineation of character is of even more importance than the plot.

Mr. Kipling's best stories contain the right qualities in a very marked degree. And these same qualities are mainly responsible for his failure as a novelist. It is a matter for rejoicing, then, that he has stayed his hand from the writing of novels, and given us a book after the style of his earlier, better work. Yet it is not an easy book to review, for it is perversely unequal. Between its covers lie several historiettes—I know of no more objectionable and appropriate word—which lesser men than Mr.

Kipling might well have hesitated to sign. He even sins at times by being dull; and when the laugh is bid for, the reader can only respond by a yawn. It were, of course, useless to expect that any writer, however capable, should always be at his best; moreover, a uniform excellence too often means mediocrity. Still, it is amazing to find in this volume such stuff as "Brugglesmith," "Judson and the Empire," and "The Children of the Zodiac." It were perhaps unfair to condemn Mr. Kipling for having included them, but it is impossible not to wonder at their presence.

For the rest of these stories we have only hearty praise. In "The Disturber of Traffic," Mr. Kipling gives us one of those inimitable sketches of blended farce and pathos that he alone seems able to contrive. "The Lost Legion" is a splendid ghost story, telling how an Afghan robber was surprised and captured by English officers and their men, through "the aid of a regiment whose name did not appear in the brigade orders." How it aided Lieutenant Halley and the Major in their manoeuvres, and why those gentlemen lost their tempers, it would be unfair to reveal. Several stories are devoted to the already famous "Soldiers Three," stories no less good than those that first gained for them "immortal fame." The psychological skill of "The Finest Story in the World," is, of course, remarkable. But the two most successful and certainly the boldest stories in the collection are "In the Rukh" and "A Matter of Fact." It required a very sure touch, an absolute mastery of words and form, to overcome the difficulties that here threatened, and would certainly have overwhelmed any but a really capable writer. There was every chance of complete failure, and yet they are perfectly successful and convincing.

"In the Rukh" is an account of a wild native bred up in the jungle among "his brothers the wolves," and Mr. Kipling thus describes him:

"A man was walking down the dried bed of the stream, naked except for the loin-cloth, but crowned with a wreath of the tasselled blossoms of the white convolvulus creeper. So noiselessly did he move over the little pebbles that even Gisborne, used to the soft-footedness of trackers, started. His voice was clear and bell-like, utterly different from the usual whine of the native, and his face as he lifted it in the sunshine might have been that of an angel strayed among the woods."

He has not ceased to be human because he has power over all the beasts of the jungle, dwells among them, and moves about attended by his wolves, calling them back and forth as a king calls his armies. He gives repeated evidence of his power, to the great contentment of Gisborne Sahib of the Woods and Forests, and to the great confusion of the Mahomedan butler whose daughter he loves. The whole study is one of great subtilty, and marked by a powerful restraint not usual in Mr. Kipling's work. It closes with a love idyll of exquisite beauty.

"A Matter of Fact" narrates how three journalists, the author himself, a Yankee, and a Dutchman, the only passengers on a "little tramp steamer," see the sea-serpent and its mate.

"Some six or seven feet above the port bulwarks, framed in fog, and as utterly unsupported as a full moon, hung a face. The mouth was open, revealing a ridiculously tiny tongue—as absurd as the tongue of an elephant; there were tense wrinkles of white skin at the angles of the drawn lips, while feelers like those of a barbel sprung from the lower jaw, and there was no sign of teeth within the mouth. But the horror of the face lay in the eyes, for those were sightless-white, in sockets as white as scraped bone, and blind. Yet for all this the face, wrinkled as the mask of a lion is drawn in Assyrian sculpture, was alive with rage and terror."

From this point the tragedy moves on relentlessly to its end. The terrific death-struggle of the monster, the savage, hopeless grief of the female, the chill horror of the fog, and the noisome masses of cold protoplasm on the waves, are so vividly described that one shudders involuntarily as one reads. The difficulty of the three enterprising "newspaper men" as to what they shall do with their magnificent, but incredible and useless, "scoop," makes an amusing and welcome finish to an astonishing story.

These are not the only stories I should have liked to quote from. One scene in "Love o' Woman" and some brilliant passages in "My Lord the Elephant" and "His Private Honour" ought not to be ignored. In "The Other Side of the Question" Mr. Kipling has marked for us one more type among the peoples of that vast eastern empire of ours, of which we are at once so proud and so ignorant.

A capital poem ushers in this remarkable volume. For remarkable it is, because, though it contains quite the worst things Mr. Kipling ever wrote—and they are very bad—it gives us more than two hundred pages of by far the best work he has yet published. It is but fair to close with the last verse of the noble and characteristic "Envoy," earnest, let us hope, of a book of sea ballads such as no other living Englishman is so able to indite.

"Wheel, full and by; but she'll smell her road alone to night.

Sick she is and harbour sick—Oh, sick to clear the land!

Roll down to Brest with the old Red Ensign over us—

Carry on and thrash her out with all she'll stand!

"Well, ah, fare you well, and it's Ushant gives the door to us,

Whirling like a windmill on the dirty sand to lea:

Till the last, last flicker goes

From the tumbling water rows,

And we're off to Mother Carey

(Walk her down to Mother Carey).

Oh, we're bound for Mother Carey where she feeds her chicks at sea."

PERCY ADDLESHAW.

"ENGLISH HISTORY BY CONTEMPORARY WRITERS."—The Jews of Angevin England: Documents and Records from Latin and Hebrew Sources, Printed and Manuscript, for the first time collected and translated by Joseph Jacobs. (David Nutt.)

UNLIKE the other volumes of Mr. York Powell's excellent series, which are chiefly intended to popularise historical sources already familiar to scholars, this little book is an original contribution to history, and, indeed, one of considerable importance. The passages translated include, Mr. Jacobs says, "every scrap of evidence" relating to the Jews of England, down to the year 1206, that he has been able to find in English records, whether printed or unpublished. This material is supplemented by extracts from the contemporary Rabbinical writings, tending directly or indirectly to throw light on the condition and customs of the Jewish community in England, or on the history and character of its eminent individual members. Notes are subjoined to the text, explaining obscure allusions, and pointing out, when needful, the bearing of the facts stated; and in an appendix the general conclusions to be derived from the documents are summarised from various points of views. The choice of the year 1206, the date of the loss of Normandy by the English crown, as the terminal point of the period treated of, seems somewhat arbitrary; and Mr. Jacobs rather strains a point when he argues that this date forms an actual epoch in the history of the English Jews. He has, however, a very good practical reason for closing his series of extracts at this point—viz., that shortly afterwards the available material becomes too abundant to be presented in a small volume otherwise than by way of selection. There is no doubt that Mr. Jacobs has chosen rightly in deciding to give an exhaustive collection of the notices of English Jews down to a particular date, instead of a mere selection from the whole mass of documents down to the expulsion of the Jews in 1290. The importance of "the King's Jews," as an element in the social and political system of England under Norman and Angevin rule, is far greater than would be supposed by any reader of popular histories; and no one who desires to understand thoroughly the history of England during that period can afford to overlook this interesting volume. For those who are interested in the history of Judaism, the book has of course a value of a different kind. If Mr. Jacobs's ingenious combinations prove correct, a much larger portion of Rabbinical literature than has hitherto been supposed must be assigned to writers either resident in or in some way connected with this country.

The early history of the Jews in England may be easily summarised. The principle of "a Christian state" was so far carried into practical effect, that the only remunerative employment left open to the Jews was that of usury; and as the lending of money at interest was forbidden by the laws of the Church, this branch of business fell almost wholly into the hands of the infidels. The monopoly thus conferred on a small community had the natural result of enormously increasing the gains of those who possessed it; according to Mr. Jacobs, indeed, in the time of Richard I., one-fourth of the moveable wealth of the kingdom was held by Jews. The law by which the property of a usurer was liable to confiscation at his death induced the sovereign to look with complacency on the enrichment of the Jews, as being an addition to his own potential wealth; and though the forfeiture was seldom enforced, as it would have destroyed the productiveness of the capital, yet the revenues of the Crown gained immensely by extortions to which the Jews could well afford to submit as the price of their lucrative privileges. It was not until after the close of the period treated of in Mr. Jacobs's volume that King John's desperate financial straits impelled him to resort to acts of spoliation unrestrained by any regard for the future interests of the Crown itself. Till then it may be said that, on the whole, the royal authority was exercised in a manner favourable to the prosperity of the Jews. But their growing wealth and power, and the insolence which they seem often to have displayed, constantly tended to embitter the hatred which the people felt towards them as the enemies of Christ; and the king and his counsellors sometimes had reasons of their own for treating with unjust leniency the outrages to which this hatred gave rise. The gradual deepening of ill-will towards the Jews is shown in the more and more envenomed tone of religious controversy. From the correspondence of Anselm, Mr. Jacobs extracts an interesting account of a theological discussion between a Jew and an eminent Churchman, which seems to have been conducted with as much urbanity and fairness as the debates of the Metaphysical Society; half a century later the unbelief of the Jews was regarded as proceeding from a demoniacal wickedness against which no argument could be expected to avail anything. It is pleasant to know, on the other hand, that even at the end of the twelfth century one great Churchman, the truly saintly Hugh of Avalon, behaved towards the Jews in such a way as to win their profound respect and affection.

A considerable amount of space in the book is occupied with the stories of Christian boys being murdered by Jews at the Passover, in mockery of the Crucifixion. The best known English example of these monstrous fictions, the legend of "Saint" Hugh of Lincoln, belongs to a later period; but there are four instances already in the twelfth century: "Saint" William of Norwich, "Saint" Robert of Bury, Harold of Gloucester, and an unnamed boy at Winchester. The weakness of the evidence for these stories is very obvious on reading the account given by contemporaries; and indeed most of the early chroniclers write in a guarded tone, which suggests that they had little confidence in the truth of what they related. In the case of William of Norwich we have the means of comparing the contemporary narrative (as given by the Saxon Chronicle and by an unpublished writer named Thomas of Monmouth) with the form in which the legend is told in the fifteenth century by Capgrave. As might be expected, the later version is much more circumstantial, but certainly much less plausible, than the earlier. It seems clear, as Mr. Jacobs points out, that one motive, if not for the invention, at least for the facile reception, of these calumnies, is to be found in the fact that the possession of the relics of one of these boy-martyrs was an important source of profit and honour to a monastery. The Norwich story, which became the type on which the others were modelled, was, it appears, the invention of a monk named Theobald, himself a convert from Judaism. It is noteworthy that neither in this instance, nor in any of the subsequent instances during the twelfth century, is there any statement that the murderers were ever brought to trial.

Mr. Jacobs has worked carefully through the Pipe Rolls, from which he gives more than two hundred extracts, besides several from the Patent, Close, and Liberate Rolls. The extant shetaroth ("starrs," documents in Hebrew relating to money transactions), dated before 1206, are also included; but they are not numerous, the "Exchequer of the Jews," in which such records were preserved, not having been organised until afterwards. This collection of official documents is historically the most valuable part of the book, though it will not be so attractive to ordinary readers as the vigorous translations from Latin historians. The importance of the information thus gathered together may be estimated from the fact that Mr. Jacobs is able to give a list of nearly a hundred manors and monastic houses, on which mortgages were held by Jews.

It must be left to Jewish critics to determine the value of the ingenious reasoning by which Mr. Jacobs has sought to identify certain of the Jews mentioned in the English records with persons who, under other names, are famous in the annals of Rabbinical learning. Some of his arguments certainly appear to involve rather bold assumptions, and perhaps, as in some other matters of which I am better qualified to form an opinion, he may sometimes have gone wrong by excess of ingenuity. However, bold hypothesis has a useful place in historical research; and whether the author's particular conclusions be established or not, it is safe to say that his work will contribute materially to advance the knowledge of the history of Jewish literature.

Mr. Jacobs has throughout managed his material with such admirable skill that his volume can hardly fail to be found interesting even to readers to whom the subject is not in itself especially attractive. With regard to points of detail, it would be possible to find a good deal of fault; partly, no doubt, owing to the fact that, as Mr. Jacobs explains, a part of the book was by some accident sent to press without revision of the proofs. The number of misprints is distressing. On the first page "Theodosius" occurs for "Theodorus" (a blunder that is repeated elsewhere), and p. 7 has the heading "Friendly Polonious," which should, I suppose, be "Friendly Polemics." On p. 69 it is said that a man before committing suicide "closed the door with wax (?) from the inside." If Mr. Jacobs had thought twice about this he would have seen that cera must stand for sera, of which in fact it is a common mediaeval spelling. In the Introduction, and again on p. 260, the author expresses himself as if he thought that "a knight's fee" was something to be paid. The places mentioned in the documents are often identified wrongly, or left unidentified for want of a little research—e.g., Malinges, occurring in a record relating to Kent, is surely Malling, not Mechlin; Turmdeston (an impossible form) stands for Turmodeston, which is probably Thurmaston in Leicestershire. Another fault in the book is that a considerable portion of the passages quoted are given only in a supplement, and not in the proper chronological sequence. These matters, however, are not of sufficient importance to form a very serious abatement from the value of the work. It is earnestly to be hoped that either Mr. Jacobs, or some one else similarly qualified, will ere long give us an exhaustive history of the English Jews to the time of their expulsion by Edward I.

HENRY BRADLEY.

Some French Writers. By Edward Delille. (Chapman & Hall.)

SEVERAL of the papers in this volume will be familiar to readers of the Fortnightly Review. There, it must be admitted, they appeared to greater advantage than now when collected into one volume. Each was interesting, but the interest was of journalistic rather than of literary quality. This is not meant disparagingly, for probably Mr. Delille accomplished just what he undertook to do; but it serves to indicate the limitations of the present series of essays. It is strange that we have so little good criticism of contemporary French writers. Mr. Henry James and Mr. George Saintsbury have given us delightful volumes; but there is little else. A year or two ago an ambitious work in two volumes was published; but its interest was even more markedly of the journalistic kind. If Mr. Henry James will supplement his French Poets and Novelists with another volume dealing with the most notable living writers—Zola, Guy de Maupassant, Bourget, Verlaine, Mallarmé, Loti, and a few others—how welcome it would be! Or Mr. Brownell might add to the high reputation already won by his French Traits and French Art. It is significant that three of the best exponents of French life and literature are Americans; for Mr. Delille, if of French parentage, is of Transatlantic birth and upbringing.

Some French Writers might have been made a more attractive book. The studies are not happily arranged. Bourget, Pierre Loti, Baudelaire, Guy de Maupassant, Verlaine, Maurice Barrès: there was an opportunity here to show how each is linked with each, and by what varied but natural processes Barrès comes to be the complement of Baudelaire, the man passionné for a new philosophical idea of social well-being, and the man passionné for art and art only; the neo-Platonist and the neo-Cyrenaic; how Guy de Maupassant has his complement in Pierre Loti; and how the morbid strain finds one expression in so representative a poet as Verlaine and another expression in so representative a novelist as Bourget. But besides this the volume has the appearance of rough-and-ready book-making. There may be good reason for the inclusion of the chatty paper entitled "Chez Pousset"—the well-known café in the Faubourg Montmartre—but none for that of "Card Sharping in Paris," a gratuitous deadweight dans cette galère. The text, too, stands in need of revision. There are aggravating mistakes that a little care would have obviated—e.g., "soliel" for soleil (p. 109), "jardins" for jardin (p. 220), "Standhalian" for Stendhalian (p. 14)—nay, even Mr. Delille's own name is spelt wrongly on the cover.

Fortunately, however, there is much that is interesting in these papers, personal records as they are rather than critical studies. The best are those on Baudelaire, Verlaine, and Guy de Maupassant. That on Loti is also worth reading. There is rather too much of "the interview business" in the essay on Paul Bourget—a style of literary disquisition better left to the brilliantly ingenious M. Huret. That M. Bourget is square-set and middle-sized, is past-master in "vestimentary harmony," whatever that may mean, and has at his command (as I suppose Mr. Delille has also, and all who are not of Mr. George Gissing's New Grub Street), "such little effects of grace and nicety as may be obtained with the meagre-spread palette of our modern male attire," might be news of vital interest to the readers of Le Figaro, or, at any rate, of Le Petit Journal, but can hardly be considered in place in an English essay on the writer who has already won cosmopolitan repute, but about whose best work little is known by the general reader in this country. Mr. Delille is certainly right in discountenancing the idea that M. Bourget is a poet by divine right. He makes excellent verse, though even in his maturest work in this kind there are many of those fatal lines which at once precipitate the volatile qualities of poetry into the sediment of prose, as in the disastrous line:

On the other hand, I do not think that Mr. Delille has done enough justice to Paul Bourget, the prosaist: to that style at once so delicate and so strong, so exquisite and so keen, so suave and so vigorous. He is somewhat contradictory, too; for while he ranks the author of Mensonges as one of the three foremost writers of the middle generation, he ends his appreciation by defining him as "a mere dexterous, brilliant, successful representative of the minor species homme de lettres."

The paper on Pierre Loti is interesting mainly from its admirable extracts: lines and passages illustrative of that natural magic which is the real charm of this poet who writes in prose. It seems to me a mere accident that M. Viaud became a prose romancier: the whole bent of his mind is clearly that of a poet, and of a poet of a singularly keen emotionalism, of a rare and exquisite spirit. No doubt, however, he has chosen wisely, or been happily impelled. The limitations of French verse are not what they were before Hugo and Gautier wrote Les Orientales and Emaux et Camées; yet even the prince of nuance, the author of Fêtes Galantes, could not achieve in verse just what Pierre Loti has done so variously in prose. So exquisite and refined a literary sentiment has he, as well as so refined and exquisite a touch, that often he pays the penalty and comes to grief on the line of his distinguishing merit. On the whole, most critics, I fancy, will agree with Mr. Delille, that this author's strongest book is Pêcheur d'Islande: that sombre, beautiful, haunting epic of the North Sea. Le Mariage de Loti, Aziyadé, Le Roman d'un Spahi, what poetry of the barbaric life is here! In Madame Chrysanthème, how the Orient lives anew! But in Pêcheur d'Islande a note is struck, that deep vox humana which, if heard at all, is heard with profound emotion.

No one has said a truer word of Baudelaire than Guy de Maupassant when he wrote: "C'était une âme très-délicate, très-fine, originale et tendre, qui s'est fêlée au premier choc de la vie"; as no criticism of his genius has a swifter and surer discernment than Baudelaire's own, when he said "J'ai cultivé mon hystérie avec jouissance et terreur." Mr. Delille's interesting paper is practically an exposition of these two texts. Of Guy de Maupassant, however, Mr. Delille himself indicates the canker at the root of the strange flower of this author's genius: a man of such strenuous vision and such supersensitive nerves, yet showing so chronic an effort, as it were, to prevent his inner life from being killed by the fierce blight of existence. His failure, where he has failed, is, says Mr. Delille, all a question of interior emotion. The chief corroboration of this is that, wonderful artist as he is, Guy de Maupassant's poor and even trivial stories cost him as much labour and nervous expenditure as those really driven straight from the bat of his temperament. When "the interior emotion" was active, he wrote "La Maison Sellier," "Monsieur Parent," "Mlle. Fifi," "L'Abandonné," "Deux Amis," "Boule de Suif"; when it was not, he produced those tales of grimy lives and those brutal episodes which are redeemed, when redeemable at all, only by the writer's masculine, mordant diction.

Of Paul Verlaine how difficult for any critic to speak adequately! His life is a problem; his genius a problem; the man himself an enigma. He has given us some of the most beautiful verse of our time: his best is certainly the most exquisite, in the right sense of the word, in all French literature. He stands in a festering swamp, and looks towards the sun: sometimes he stoops, and stirs the filth about his feet, and smiles an evil smile: sometimes he fronts the light again, and his song is crystal-clear, white as snow, fragrant as the breath of wild-roses, pure as the heart of a child singing for joy. Perhaps he will be remembered thus:

"... je suis né pour plaire aux nobles âmes,
Pour les consoler un peu d'un monde impur,
Cimier d'or chanteur et tunique de flamme,
Moi, le Chevalier qui saigne sur azur."

"As-tu réfléchi combien nous sommes organisés pour le malheur," wrote Flaubert to George Sand. We think of this when we ponder the writings, the genius, the personality of such men as Verlaine, or Guy de Maupassant, or Baudelaire, or Gérard de Nerval, or Arthur Rimbaud. Of these, it is not becoming to speak of the "disastrous day" of one who is still with us, pen in hand. Of the others, one is mad: the other, like his friend Villiers de l'Isle Adam, died miserably in a Paris hospital; the third hanged himself in despair; the youngest died the second death, and to this day his actual end is known of no man. Yes! "as-tu réfléchi combien nous sommes organisés pour le malheur?"

NEW NOVELS.

The Personal History of Jim Duncan. By John Pennington Marsden. In 3 vols. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

His Wife's Soul. By J. Fitzgerald Molloy. In 3 vols. (Hutchinson.)

Captain Enderis. By Archer P. Crouch. In 2 vols. (W. H. Allen.)

For Mrs. Grundy's Sake. By M. Isidore Douglas. (Digby, Long & Co.)

By a Himalayan Lake. By an Idle Exile. (Ward & Downey.)

A Constant Lover. By Wilhelm Hauff. (Fisher Unwin.)

Fishin' Jimmy and other Stories. By Annie Trumbull Slosson and Imogen Clark. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

The Great Peril and How it was Averted. By W. Laird Clowes. (Offices of Black and White.)

In The Personal History of Jim Duncan we have an experiment in realism—the realism, however, of a refined Smollett rather than of an Anglo-Saxon Zola. Its author styles it "a chronicle of small beer"; and so it is in the ordinary, though not in the spiritual sense. It is the autobiography (and the moral evolution) of a young man who, born in Staten Island, of a generous father and a negligent mother, has various misadventures, and falls among thieves of all kinds, who ruin him, throw him into a debtors' prison, and even alienate his wife's affections from him. But Jim Duncan has the raw material of a strong man in him; and, even when he is in prison, he makes it very hot for the sheriff who controls this wretched establishment, by communicating various "revelations" to an eminently receptive press. He finally succeeds in getting back to his children and into the heart of his wife—although here the author certainly flies in the face of the probabilities—and all ends well. The Personal History of Jim Duncan is perhaps a trifle too long drawn out, and it cannot help being—as when Duncan is engaged in his long conflict with his sordid-minded enemies the Blacks—very dreary in places. But it is well told and carefully written, and is emphatically a book sui generis. It is further worth reading, as containing pictures of certain little-known aspects of American life.

His Wife's Soul is such a substantial, satisfactory three-volume story of crime and detection, love and misunderstanding, that it is perhaps rather hard on Mr. Molloy to ask whose wife it is that is immortalised by his title. Is it Lady Fothergille, who recovers her husband's love and confidence, or Mrs. Fothergille, who loses both husband and reason? But we should not be hypercritical in dealing with these three delectable volumes of vice vanquished, containing as they do that accomplished scoundrel Captain Fothergille, who murders James Hawkins and all but murders Lord Hector Maynes, who steals the diamonds of his cousin's wife, and makes the theft the cause of a serious difference between that husband and that wife, and who finally commits suicide. But if the Captain does not suffice, there is his precious confederate Mrs. Crayworth, who is prevented by a wicked and vindictive Baron from becoming the wife of the Rev. Mr. Sympington. Mr. Molloy has set about producing three volumes of good-going modern melodrama, and has succeeded.

Mr. A. P. Crouch, the author of Captain Enderis, has amply demonstrated his powers as a descriptive writer, especially when he treads the (to him) familiar ground of West Africa. But he has yet to prove that he can write a novel. Captain Enderis, of the First West African Regiment, is as good a soldier and as good a fellow as ever even "John Strange Winter" has sketched. Esther Laverick is the typically fine girl, who is sure to meet a gallant and irreproachable officer under circumstances that involve a piquantly sufficient amount of danger to him. Mrs. Reavely is a favourable specimen of the young married flirt, whose attractions such men as Enderis have to lay their account with. But when one has said this, one has exhausted all the characters in Mr. Crouch's two stout volumes that are really worth knowing. There is in them, indeed, an adequate supply of fighting, and Enderis has one scoundrel of almost melodramatic capacity to contend with. But the real action of the story flags most disappointingly. The misunderstanding, too, which keeps Julian and Esther so long apart is a very clumsy and unnatural one.

For Mrs. Grundy's Sake is somewhat of a misnomer. At all events, defiance of Mrs. Grundy figures in it much more prominently than regard for her or for any other arbiter of the destinies of society. The central incident—a Scotch marriage of the sort popularised by the late Wilkie Collins—is essentially, at all events, an act of rebellion against Mrs. Grundy, although its character does not appear to be quite understood by either of the two who, through it, get—unhappily as it appears at first—united for life. After all, Mrs. Grundy gets her own way, it is true; for the great majority of the matches which are made towards the end of the volume are of the conventional and not of the happy-go-lucky sort, and, in consequence, give satisfaction to all persons, except, of course, the female villain, who is almost as frequently to be found in fiction nowadays as a Scotch marriage. In other words, For Mrs. Grundy's Sake is an ordinary boy-and-girl story, with plenty of love, incident, and cross purposes. As such, and by the ordinary readers of such, it will be thoroughly enjoyed. There is, however, a touch of exaggeration in it. Adelaide Brase might be capable of preventing the marriage to which she objects, but hardly of scheming a murder. Then, the misunderstandings which keep Maud Rienzi and Lord Fellamar more decidedly apart from each other after marriage than before it, are rather too numerous and appallingly obstructive. Finally, Murston Thornton, the blackguard of the story, degenerates too rapidly into a mere brutal cad. Even when half-intoxicated, he would hardly have said, in a loud insolent voice, to a married woman in her husband's presence, "I want to know, Maud, dearest, which dances you have reserved for me." Still less would he, "mad with baffled spite and rage, lay his hand forcibly on Maud's bare shoulder." Let it be said, however, that the tone of For Mrs. Grundy's Sake is thoroughly "healthy."

By a Himalayan Lake is a more than ordinarily good Anglo-Indian story. It contains abundance of the fun, flirtation, and scandal of the sort with which one is in the habit of associating the not always happy hunting-ground of Mrs. Hawkebee. The author has thought it necessary to introduce a little tragedy into her plot, in the shape of the painfully sudden death of Mrs. Hilda Crauston and her lover, Alan Adayre. But he (more probably she) is more familiar with light military comedy. Hetty Mainwaring, with her flutterings and frivolities, her Jack and her Jim, is quite in that way, and is indeed a very natural and loveable creature—in spite of one lapse into inconstancy. The humours of a voyage on a P. and O. steamer are most admirably reproduced. Altogether, By a Himalayan Lake is a very enjoyable holiday volume.

The latest addition to the "Independent Novel" series is agreeable and even original after a fashion, although it is lacking in strength and coherence. Fröben, a young German of family, aids a shivering beggar-girl one night on a Parisian bridge, and cheers the last hours of her mother. The impression made by the girl never leaves him; and in a miraculously commonplace way Fröben stumbles upon her occupying the position of wife to Baron Faldner, a matter-of-fact and even brutally cynical friend of his own. How she makes herself known, how, in spite of her "lustrous eyes," Faldner, on ascertaining her past, styles her a "low slut," how she is proved to belong to the Tortosi family, how she is befriended by Don Pedro de San Montanjo Ligez, the best of all Spaniards since the days of Don Quixote, and how all ends as it ought to end, he who reads these veracious chronicles will ascertain for himself—although he will hardly be able to do much running at the same time. In spite of the weaknesses already mentioned and hinted at, A Constant Lover is very readable. It contains some excellent character sketches. Poor Josephine and her Fröben are models of patient though apparently hopeless love. Faldner, too, is full of rude vigour; but he indulges in language of repulsive and unnecessary strength.

In the little volume of short American stories, the position of honour in which is occupied by "Fishin' Jimmy," a considerable difficulty is overcome with great skill and delicacy. They are simple, pathetic stories, suffused with lower middle-class piety; and they are told simply and pathetically and with just that souçon of American humour which was required to give them piquancy. "Fishin' Jimmy" is, perhaps, a trifle commonplace, both in the fundamental conception and in the development of such plot as it can be said to possess. Somehow, too, the dying words of its humble Christian hero have a familiar air. But the unconscious personation practised in "Aunt Liefly," which has the effect of transforming a sour and suspicious nature into a gentle and loving one, is novel, and has all the healthy effect of every good conceit. In "The Last Day" the familiar story of the reconciliation of a husband and wife over the dead body of a child is told again so naturally as to have—and not without reason—all the appearance of originality. Altogether, this volume is greatly superior to the run of average "studies in still life."

The Great Peril and How it was Averted is, although a political fantasy, of sufficiently exciting interest to merit republication from the weekly newspaper in which it first appeared. There is a suggestion of puerility, indeed, in the plasters with which that painfully typical Yankee Hiram Y. Hancock changes the opinion of the Barnham electors, and very nearly places the country at the feet of an American Old Country Development Trust. But the (in places) tragic development of the plot is very skilfully managed; and the advance of the thousands of plastered victims on London to hear "The Man" deliver his message to Britain and humanity is told with, at least, Macaulayan (that is to say the best "graphic") power. Above all things, The Great Peril contains at least one notable character-sketch, that of the brusque-mannered but essentially good and thoroughly English spinster, Miss Mar-rable, who plays Wellington to Mr. Hiram Y. Hancock's Napoleon. If Mr. Clowes can give an adequate supply of pictures worthy to be placed by the side of Miss Mar-rable, his success as a novelist ought to be assured. He might find a place midway between, say, the late Anthony Trollope and Mr. Besant. A word as to the illustrations. There could scarcely be anything better in their way—the way of photographic reality.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Life and Letters of Madame de Krudener. By Clarence Ford. (A. & C. Black.) The name of Mde. de Krudener is known as one of three women who achieved a certain notoriety under the First Empire and in the days of the Restoration. It is impossible to hear of her without thinking also of Mme. de Staël and Mme. Recamier. Mme. de Staël owed her reputation to literature; her attempts in politics were only prejudicial to her comfort and her fame. Mme. Recamier was content with being a leader in society and a professional beauty. Mme. de Krudener vied with the last as a leader in society; and her novel Valérie, on which her literary reputation depends, was written in jealous rivalry of Mme. de Staël's Delphine.

She was, however, more successful in her brief intercourse with Alexander I. than was Mme. de Staël in her interviews with Napoleon; but to these aspirations of a woman of the world, of a writer, of a politician, Mde. de Krudener, in the last twenty years of her life, added those of a prophetess and a preacher. Her character is an enigmatical one. Insatiable vanity and a necessity of being the first everywhere are its chief features. She possessed an almost boundless capacity for self-deceit; and, unfortunately, the history of her life depends almost wholly on her own evidence. We have few materials for getting at the simple unvarnished facts. A great deal too much is made, in her excuse, of the disproportion in age between herself and her husband. Julie de Wistinghoff was eighteen years old when she married M. de Krudener, who was thirty-eight. The discrepancy is not greater than is frequent in continental circles. M. de Krudener seems to have been a kind and generous husband. The letter, on p. 55, written after a former desertion of and unfaithfulness to him, is one that should have touched the head, or heart, of any reasonable woman. Mme. de Krudener could be happy only in society where she could be first; hence the duties of an ambassador's wife, who must necessarily sometimes yield precedence to others, were intolerable to her. No matter how unworthy her flatterers and followers might be, if only they offered incense enough, she was happy. She may have had graceful manners and singular personal attractiveness, but the refinement of mind attributed to her seems wholly lacking; her love of charlatanism and of advertising herself by the coarsest methods is opposed to this. And we see this always: as our author well observes, "At no time of her life was Mme. de Krudener tempted to hide her light under a bushel." Her exaggeration is habitual. We feel that we can never take her own statements about herself as literally true. Her part in the Holy Alliance seems to be reduced to the fact that Alexander showed her the rough copy before communicating it to others. Her claims to prophecy and her hints of miracles seem to rest on no tangible grounds. Her charity consisted almost wholly in careless and indiscriminate almsgiving. It is easy to see the annoyance that the crowd of beggars and vagabonds which followed her must have caused the authorities. This, and the vagueness of her religious teaching, attaching itself to no church, the rumour of her relations with crowned heads, which she took care should everywhere be known, excited curiosity. But we can see little of the real mystic in her, little to place her among the true and thoughtful heroines of charity. Only quite at the end of her life, when in retirement and under the influence of the Moravians, does her religious life appear to have deepened. The strongest evidence in her favour is the constant love of her son-in-law and daughter, and of some of her best friends. On the whole, she was almost as much distinguished by her faults as by her virtues. Mr. Ford likens her to Marie Baskirsteff: through the early part of her life she reminds us at least as much of Becky Sharp, only in a higher social sphere. We can hardly praise too highly the impartiality of Mr. Ford's narrative: he gives his readers the materials for forming their own opinion, and does not press his own unduly upon them. It is improbable that a better study of Mme. de Krudener's life will ever be made than this satisfactory work.

French Jansenists. By the Author of "Many Voices" and "Spanish Mystics." (Kegan Paul & Co.) This work consists of short memoirs of the principal Jansenists: of Cornelius Jansen, Saint Cyran, the Mère Angélique, Antoine Arnauld, de Sacy, Nicole, Pascal, Lenain de Tillemont, and Quesnel. In each case, except that of Jansen, a few sentences and aphorisms from their writings are prefixed to the biography. When we remember that the period embraced by these lives is but a century, and reflect how few the Jansenists were, we cannot but be astonished at the number of men of learning, of talent, of genius, included in so small a body. And the surprise is increased when we notice how many of these belong to one or two families, the Arnaulds and the Pascals; and that the learning and genius was shared by the women almost equally with the men. In this fact lies, perhaps, both the success and the failure of the Jansenists. Their learning and their literary genius have attracted the appreciative study of men like Cousin and Sainte-Beuve, who had little sympathy with technical theology; but they remain caviare to the multitude. Only those who are familiar with his works are aware how much subsequent ecclesiastical historians, from Gibbon to Dean Stanley, and the writers in the Dictionary of Christian Biography, are indebted to Lenain de Tillemont; Arnault's Perpetuité de la Foi de l'Eglise Catholique touchant l'Eucharistie is still a classical repository in the Roman Catholic Church; De Sacy's version of the Bible, in spite of all later attempts, yet remains the translation for the French Catholics; Pascal is always mentioned among the apologists of Christianity; the educational manuals of the Port Royalists were the best, their system of education the most humane of their time. Yet no sect is more bitterly reviled by Ultramontane writers of the present day. There is perhaps no more conclusive instance of the power of persistent calumny than the history of Jansenism. The anti-Christian philosophy of the Encyclopaedists is laid to their charge, though many of the maxims of the Revolution may be far more surely traced from Rousseau, through Bernardin de St. Pierre, to Fénelon. Though none wrote more bitterly against Calvinists, they are branded as Calvinists in disguise. None more rigorously upheld the interest of morality against casuistical relaxation; yet the current historical manuals of the day tell us that "Jansenism is a subtle heresy, which reduces religion to the existence of a God who does with men what He will, saving some and condemning others, and teaching that good works are useless, since grace does all." Such are the statements that are credited now. It is needless to say that there is nothing of this in the work before us; on the contrary, hardly sufficient prominence is given to the facts that have made such misrepresentations possible. The lives of the Jansenists were a continual protest: they were always engaged in controversy, they were never free from persecution, they ever bore the burden of unpopularity and the frowns of the Supreme Head of their Church; the sun, as it were, never shone upon them. Hence their view of life and of religion became one of gloom too unrelieved. They followed too closely one author. If any seek a proof of this, let him read the Christiani Cordis Gemitus, a commentary of the cixth Psalm, by their physician, Hamon. The Latin is so closely modelled on that of St. Augustine as to have the effect of a parody, and almost to raise a smile; the teaching is as if all the psalms were psalms of penitence, and none of praise. Still, no band of men and women of nobler character or of finer intellect have ever been associated together than those who gather round the names of Jansen and of Port Royal; and those who are unacquainted with them may well accept this volume as their introduction.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MORE than once in the ACADEMY we have called attention to the adventurous career of Babu Sarat Chandra Das, a Bengali pandit, who lived for some time in a Buddhist monastery at Lhasa, and who brought back with him a thorough knowledge of Tibetan language and literature. He is now engaged upon an exhaustive dictionary of Tibetan, to be published by the Government of India. But we are glad to hear that he has also found time to write a popular narrative of his travels and experiences in Tibet, and thus throw open to English readers a country that has been closed for more than a century. The book will be issued by a London publisher, probably in the course of next winter.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. have in the press a new edition of Beale's Oriental Biographical Dictionary, revised and enlarged by Mr. H. G. Keene. This work, which originally appeared in India about ten years ago, is based upon materials collected by Thomas William Beale, a clerk at Agra under Sir H. M. Elliot. When he died, in 1875, his MS. was acquired by the Government, and prepared for publication by the late Principal Blochmann and the present editor. It contains brief notices of all the prominent personages mentioned in Indian history (excluding Europeans). The names are arranged in alphabetical order, transliterated according to the official system, but printed also in Persian characters.

MR. JOSEPH JACOBS has determined that his next Christmas book shall be a second collection of "English Fairy Tales," for which he has already obtained several good examples. As before, the volume will be illustrated by Mr. Batten, and will be accompanied by notes, some reaching the length of an excursus.

MESSRS. W. THACKER & Co. will publish in July The Points of the Horse, by Capt. Hayes, well known as a veterinary surgeon and as a breaker and trainer of horses in many countries. It is "a familiar treatise on equine conformation," upon which the author has been engaged for the past fifteen years. The work contains seventy-seven photographs and 205 other illustrations, showing horses and ponies of every kind. Special attention has been paid to the paces of the horse, leaping, draught, horses of speed and horses of strength, asses, zebras, the painter's horse, and the evolution of the horse.

MESSRS. DIGBY, LONG & Co. will publish in a few days The Autobiography of an Old Passport, relating driving tours with English horses over the roads of Western Europe, before the time of railways. The author is the Rev. A. C. Smith, who wrote several books of travel more than twenty years ago, but who is perhaps best known to some as secretary of the Wilt's Archaeological and Natural History Society. The book will be illustrated with original drawings.

A VOLUME entitled Orchard Songs, by Mr. Norman Gale, will be issued in September by Messrs. Elkin Mathews & John Lane. It will include the verses Mr. Gale contemplated printing privately—a plan he has now definitely abandoned—and will have a specially designed cover and title-page by Mr. Will Rothenstein. Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons have arranged to issue the book simultaneously in America.

AN English version of "Salomé" will follow the three English plays by Mr. Oscar Wilde which Messrs. Elkin Mathews & John Lane have in the press. It may be mentioned that the publishers have commissioned Mr. Aubrey Beardsley to furnish ten full-page illustrations for the book.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. announce as nearly ready Fishing Experiences of Half a Century, with instructions in the use of the fast reel, by Major F. Powell Hopkins, illustrated by the author.

THE appearance of Prof. Tout's Edward I. leaves Chatham, by Mr. John Morley, as the only volume remaining to complete the series of "Twelve English Statesmen."

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces a volume entitled Eminent Men of Kent, by Mr. James Simson, author of "Historic Thanet." It will contain a series of biographical sketches from the earliest time.

MR. ALEXANDER GARDNER will be the publisher in this country of Reminiscences of Walt Whitman, with extracts from his letters and remarks on his writings, by Mr. William Sloane Kennedy, who dates from Camden, N.J.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish immediately a cheap edition of Mr. W. Outram Tristram's Coaching Days and Coaching Ways, with two hundred illustrations by Messrs. Hugh Thomson and Herbert Railton, uniform with Mr. Hugh Thomson's illustrated editions of The Vicar of Wakefield and Cranford.

MR. FRANKFORT MOORE'S novel I forbid the Banns is being translated into German by Miss Adele Berger, and Baron Tauchnitz has also added it to his Continental Library. Messrs. Hutchinson have a cheap edition in the press, which will be ready immediately.

THE large demand for Annie S. Swan's new book Homespun: a Study of a Simple Folk, will delay the publication until early in July.

A SECOND edition has already been called for of The Temptation of Dulce Carruthers, by C. E. C. Weigall, which was issued on Monday last as the opening volume of Cassell's "Sunshine Series."

ON July 1 the firm of Messrs. Percival & Co., of 34, King-street, Covent Garden, becomes Rivington, Percival & Co. The partners are Mr. Septimus Rivington, of Trinity College, Oxford, a partner from 1867 to 1889 in the late firm of Messrs. Rivington, of 3, Waterloo-place, and Mr. John Guthrie Percival, of Magdalen College, a son of the Rev. Dr. Percival, head master of Rugby. The name of Rivington, which has existed continuously for more than a century and three-quarters in the publishing trade, will thus again appear in a representative of the old family.

MR. HENRY SOTHERAN has retired from his position as sole partner in Messrs. Henry Sotheran & Co., in favour of his son, Mr. Henry Cecil Sotheran, who has been associated in his father's business for the last thirteen years, and who, in partnership with Messrs. Charles Buckland and Alexander Balderston Railton (the managers respectively during a long period of the Piccadilly and Strand houses), will continue the business under the same style as heretofore. We may add that Mr. Henry Sotheran's connexion with the trade extends over a period of more than sixty years.

MR. PHILIP GREEN, of Essex-street, Strand, has been appointed by the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association publisher of books of liberal and progressive theology. He will shortly issue a Handbook of Rational Piety, by the Rev. Dr. H. W. Crosskey; The Beginnings of Christendom, by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant; and The Development of Theology as illustrated in English Poetry from 1780 to 1830, by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke. He will also keep on sale American and English religious works of an advanced character.

THE Oriental University Institute at Woking opened its mosque and grounds on Monday last for the celebration of the 'Id-ud-Duhá, or Kurbán Bairam festival, which is a commemoration of Abraham's sacrifice. Muhammadans of different countries now resident in London and other parts of England attended.

THE Contemporary Review for July will contain an article by Dr. Dillon on the Book of Job, founded on the researches of Prof. Bickell, who claims to have discovered that the original dialogue is strictly metrical, and, by the help of this discovery and of a Coptic MS. recently brought to light at Rome, has presented a version of the original which differs widely from the standard Hebrew text. The part of Elihu is altogether excised. Prof. Bickell's Hebrew text is on the point of appearing in Germany; and Dr. Dillon gives, besides an account of the discovery, an English translation of the whole of the dialogue, arranged in quatrains, which is alleged to be the original form.

THE Library Review for July will contain an article by Mr. J. Cuming Walters, entitled "Tennyson—his Friends, Critics, and Foes: a Study in Misunderstandings."

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

LORD HERSCHELL has been appointed Chancellor of the University of London, in succession to the late Earl of Derby. He is the first graduate of London to hold the office.

PROF. HENRY GOUDY, of Edinburgh, has been appointed regius professor of civil law at Oxford, in succession to Mr. James Bryce. He is, we imagine, the first stranger to Oxford to hold the office.

THE Rev. H. F. Tozer has been elected an honorary fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, on resigning the tutorship which he has held there for nearly forty years.

IN the honour school of jurisprudence at Oxford, we notice the names of two natives of India, both in the second class. We believe that one is a Christian from Calcutta, the other a Parsi from Bombay.

AT Oxford it is becoming more and more common not to prescribe special subjects for those prizes which are offered for the encouragement of post-graduate research. Thus, for the Conington prize, it is merely required that the dissertation shall be on a subject appertaining to classical learning previously approved by the trustees; for the Rolleston memorial prize, candidates may select for themselves any subject comprised under the following heads: animal and vegetable morphology, physiology and pathology, and anthropology; and for the Johnson memorial prize, the trustees have obtained the approval of Convocation to their proposal that candidates may choose their own subject, provided that it be astronomical or meteorological.

IN response to an appeal to friends of the late Mr. B. L. Nettleship, a sum calculated (after defraying the cost of a memorial tablet) to produce somewhat more than £40 a year has been subscribed, to found a scholarship "to be held at Balliol College, Oxford, by a student of music, who shall have given satisfactory proof both of his musical ability and of his capacity to profit by one of the ordinary courses of university study."

A SYNDICATE at Cambridge has reported in favour of establishing examinations in the science and practice of agriculture, and granting diplomas in connexion therewith. The examinations will be open to persons not members of the university, and may be held elsewhere than at Cambridge. As usual at Cambridge, it is proposed that the examination be divided into two parts, the first part to consist of special branches of science so far as they have reference to agriculture, together with book-keeping, and the second part to consist of agriculture generally, to which surveying, veterinary science, and economics may hereafter be added.

SUBSCRIPTIONS are invited for a memorial to the late Prof. Marcus Beck, of University College, London. It is proposed to endow a bed in the hospital, and to place a suitable tablet within the precincts of the college.

MR. E. C. MARCHANT, of Peterhouse, Cambridge, has been elected professor of ancient history and Greek at Queen's College, Harley-street, in place of Mr. J. R. V. Marchant and Mr. H. F. Wilson, who have resigned.

IN American colleges, it is the custom for the class of the same year—that is to say, those who graduated together—to meet from time to time, and to make some permanent memorial of their meeting. At the college of New Jersey, better known as Princeton, the class of 1883 have commemorated their decennial meeting by presenting to the college library a collection of 1000 volumes relating to political science and jurisprudence, together with an endowment for the maintenance of the collection. These books have been incorporated with those on the same subject already in the library, making about 3000 in all; and a catalogue, or "find-list" has been compiled by the librarian. It is, perhaps, worthy of note that this catalogue has been printed by the linotype method, one advantage of which is that additions can be inserted as readily as cards in a card catalogue.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THE DEATH-STROKE.

'Twas the sunny Syrian sea
Off the coast of Tripoli,
And the ironclads of England were at play;
While their mimic thunder rent
With its roar the firmament,
As they tacked and they manoeuvred in the bay:
For our navy is the pride
Of that sea without a tide,
And our home is on the deep amid the spray.
Something terribly amiss
In a moment! That or this,
Man or mechanism? Well, I do not know:
On the gallant flagship came,
Quick as stroke of lightning-flame
Or the giant rush of tempest, such a blow
That, her harness rent, she bowed;
And, a mighty iron shroud,
With her Admiral and crew she sank below!
Do you deem they should have died
On a fierce and reddened tide,
In the fury and the glory of the fight?
With the ensign shot to rags,
And with striking of the flags
Of the foemen on the left and on the right;
With brave rescue from the wreck,
And wild cheering on the deck,
That Britannia had not parted with her might?
Be such glory what it may,
Yet I venture still to say
That these shall not lose their guerdon or their fame,
Though they died without a blow:
Well, the Highest—died He so;
And our land shall shrine their memory and their name:
For the man who, in the host,
Is death-stricken at his post,
"It is finished" may triumphantly exclaim!
There is grief for me and you:
But for Tryon and his crew
Happy future, as was honour in the past;
Though the Admiral no more
May hear wind or water roar,
Though his sailors cannot battle with the blast,
—For, the Pilot of all seas,
He will welcome souls like these,
And shall guide them to fair haven—land at last!

ROBERT BROWN, JUN.

"All then precipitated themselves into the sea, with the exception of Vice-Admiral Sir George Tryon, who remained alone on the bridge."—("The Times," June 27.)

LET England mourn for him who met his death
Steadfast to duty, all unconsciously
Grown to a hero,—mourn for him whose soul,
Shrined in a noble frame, had conquered fear.
Let England grieve for these her gallant sons
Untimely gone, and grieve with them who weep
A loss irreparable with bitter tears.

Let England still rejoice, for now she knows
Though time and science change the face of war
The stuff of English hearts they cannot change.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE second instalment of "Statistics of Some Midland Villages," in the June number of the Economic Journal (Macmillans), is less valuable than the first. The general impression left is that the condition of agricultural labourers is by no means so bad as it has been painted. But almost the only definite point made by the authors, Messrs. Joseph Ashby and Bolton King, is that the extension of allotments has helped materially to check depopulation, and has also tended to decrease pauperism. Under the heading "Notes and Memoranda," there are useful summaries of the financial condition of Australia, impartial accounts of the Home-stead strike (by Prof. F. W. Tausing), and of the recent wages dispute in Lancashire. There are also elaborate details about German clerks and shop assistants, and the conditions of State relief in Denmark. But perhaps the most interesting of all is the description of the study of political economy in Japan, by Jiuchi-Soyeda. He gives two lists of native writers: (1) of those who lived before the introduction of Western ideas, and (2) of those now living. There are no less than four associations directly connected with economics, and several special periodicals. The influence of the Imperial University was formerly in favour of free-trade, but is now tending towards State Socialism. The inclination of the Legislature is more or less on the side of protection. All economical questions are hotly discussed, in view of the changes that are daily taking place in the industrial and commercial condition of the country. In view of these facts, it is curious to consider how small is the interest felt in political economy in India.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE OLDEST VERSIONS OF EUSEBIUS'S HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

Oxford: June, 1893.

Allow me to record in the ACADEMY some features of the Greek text of Eusebius's History of the Church, revealed by a comparison of it with the old Armenian version. This version is quoted already by Armenian writers of the fifth century, who declare that it was made by S. Mashtotz. It must, therefore date from the early part of the fifth century. Since, however, it was made not from Greek, but from a still earlier Syriac version, it must represent a stage of the Eusebian text not later than the fourth century. Merx has proved, indeed, by actual comparison of some paragraphs, that it is actually made from the Syriac version still preserved to us. The Armenian is, therefore, the version of a version of the Greek text, and was made within a century of the time when the Greek text was written.

I will begin by examining Book IV., ch. xv., of the History, in which the martyrdom of Polycarp is narrated, and copious excerpts given from the Letter of the Smyrnaeans describing that martyrdom. This Letter was the earliest document of the kind of which Eusebius knew, and Bishop Lightfoot ascribes it to about the year 160 A.D. The entire text of it has come down to us only in a spurious Life of Polycarp, written towards the end of the fourth century by one calling himself Pionius. "Eusebius alone of all extant authorities," says Lightfoot, "is prior to the false Pionius, and gives an independent text." Hence the importance of ascertaining as far back as possible what really stood in the text of Eusebius. In adducing the testimony of the old Armenian version of Eusebius, we will begin by examining by the light of it the several passages of the letter in which the phrase "Catholic Church" occurs, not only in the text of Pionius, but in the Eusebian as well. For Keim and others have pronounced the Letter to be a forgery of the late third century, just because of the repeated occurrence in it of this phrase. Lightfoot enumerates them (Apostolic Fathers, vol. i., p. 622) as follows:

I. In § 1, πάσαις ταῖς κατὰ πάντα τόπον τῆς ἁγίας καὶ καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας παροικίαις.

II. § 8, πάσης τῆς κατὰ τὴν οἰκουμένην καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας.

III. § 19, ποιμένα τῆς κατὰ τὴν οἰκουμένην καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας—i.e., Jesus Christ.

IV. § 16, Polycarp is called the ἐπίσκοπος τῆς ἐν Σμύρνῃ καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας.

In the Armenian version passage I. appears thus: "ad omnes congregationes quae sunt in sanctis ecclesiis in omni loco." The word rendered by congregatio may answer to παροικία.

Passage II. is as follows: "et omnes ecclesias quae in toto orbe"; or, in Greek—καὶ πασῶν τῶν καθ' ὅλην τὴν οἰκουμένην ἐκκλησιῶν.

Passage III. does not occur in Eusebius's excerpts from the Letter, and cannot, therefore, be tested by the Armenian version.

Passage IV., however, is in that version as follows: ἐπίσκοπος τῆς ἐν Σμύρνῃ ἐκκλησίας.

We must conclude that a revising hand has been at work on the Greek text of Eusebius, and has intruded into it wherever possible the phrase καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία. Thus Keim's objection is sustained, but loses its force as an argument against the genuineness of the Letter of the Smyrnaeans. On the other hand, Lightfoot's laboured defence of the repeated use of the phrase in this document becomes unnecessary.

If all the Greek codices of Eusebius have undergone this contamination, why should not the Ignatian Epistles have suffered in the same way? Oddly enough, it is exactly in the Ignatian Letter to the Smyrnaeans (§ 8) that the phrase occurs for the first time in Christian literature: θεοῦ ἂν ὁ Χριστὸς Ἰησοῦς, ἐκεῖ ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία. If the phrase did not occur in the Letter of the Smyrnaeans circa A.D. 155, it could hardly have occurred fifty years earlier in Ignatius's Letter to the same Church.

One other variant implied in the Armenian version of this chapter deserves notice.

In Hist. Eccl. iv. 15 (162, 20) Eusebius thus describes the Letter of the Smyrnaeans: "Ἔστι δὲ ἡ γραφὴ ἐκ προσώπου ἧς αὐτὸς ἐκκλησίας ἡγεῖτο, ταῖς κατὰ πότον παροικίαις τὰ κατ' αὐτὸν ἀποσημαίνουσα διὰ τούτων. Lightfoot remarks as to the words κατὰ πότον (Ap. Fath. iii. 364):

"Of this there is no trace in the letter itself, for Philomelium was certainly not in Pontus. Perhaps, therefore, we ought to adopt the conjecture of Valois, and substitute πάντα τόπον for πότον, though Rufinus and the Syriac version both read πότον, and so it appears in all the extant Greek MSS."

The old Armenian version, however, is as follows: "Scriptae autem sunt literae hae quasi e persona ecclesiae eius cui praepositus erat ille ad ecclesias quae sunt in regionibus Asiae." Thus it is certain that Eusebius wrote κατ' Ἀσίαν, and not κατὰ πότον, and that an early editor of his text, from exigencies of which we now know nothing, substituted κατὰ πότον.

One's first instinct is to reckon the omission of the phrase καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία to the version alone, especially as the text of Pionius has it; to say, in fact, that the Armenian is just a loose rendering. This, however, cannot be so; for the phrase is not merely omitted, but is replaced in the Armenian by ἐκκλησίαι in the plural, which is the term used in the New Testament, and in other very early Christian documents. Moreover, the use of κατ' Ἀσίαν for κατὰ πότον is decisive against any theory which would set down the variants to the "personal equation" of an Armenian translator. For κατ' Ἀσίαν is certainly the right reading; and yet κατὰ πότον is read not merely in Rufinus's old Latin version (circa A.D. 402), but also in our extant MSS. of the very Syriac version from which the Armenian is translated. We can only suppose that κατὰ πότον was already intruded into the Eusebian text in the fourth century, before Rufinus made his Latin version, and that the older Syriac version was revised to agree with the doctored Greek text.

The Armenian, however, reflects the Syriac as it stood before it was so revised. Similarly, we have in the Armenian Acts of Paul and Thekla a version of an early and uninterpolated Syriac text, identical, except for the interpolations, with the extant Syriac MSS. of it printed and translated by Wright.

Many other interesting variants of the Armenian text might be pointed out, some of them of a character to startle those who may have regarded our Greek text of Eusebius as a perfectly accurate record of what he wrote in regard to minute points of early Christian doctrine and tradition.

MARAT AND THE ASHMOLEAN MUSEUM.

London: June 1893.

During the ten years which Jean Paul Marat spent in England, several misdemeanours were attributed to him, not the least of which was the robbery of the Ashmolean Museum, at Oxford. In a sketch I lately wrote of his doings in England (*Marat en Angleterre) I reproduced a report of the condemnation of one "John Peter le Maitre, alias Maire, alias Mara, extracted from the Book of the Crown Court for the Oxford Assizes, dated 5th March, 1777, together with a list of articles stolen. I have since been favoured by Mr. Edward Evans, of the Ashmolean Museum, with copies of two documents bearing on the same affair, and confirming, in my opinion, the surmise that the revolutionist Marat was the perpetrator of the theft. They are: (1) a letter by one Richard Hutchinson, of Norwich, who purchased some of the stolen property from Marat; (2) a list of articles bequeathed or restored to the museum by Dr. William Sheffield, provost of Worcester:

These documents call for a few remarks:—

1. The description of Mara as given by Hutchinson—the singularity of his person, his having been recognised by Rigby as the French tutor of the Warrington Academy, his associating with a surgeon, he (Marat) having practised surgery while in England, his impudence, &c., all tally with what we know of "L'ami du Peuple."

2. The stolen property was evidently not restored to the Oxford authorities at the time of Marat's condemnation. Hutchinson's letter is dated Feb. 19, 1776; the condemnation 5th March, 1777; while the vice-chancellor's receipt was only signed July 23, 1795.

3. In the list attached to the condemnation the articles are not at all described, and are consequently difficult to identify. One of them is "a five guinea piece of Queen Ann's gold coin of the year 1713," which we may fairly set down as identical with the No 11 returned by Sheffield.

4. The "Gold Chain of Felligree Work" noted by Hutchinson is evidently the No. 1 on Sheffield's list, and the Medal "Lipsia 1631" is the No. 6.

Attempts have been lately made in France to whitewash Marat; it will be difficult to clear his memory of the Ashmolean Museum robbery.

H. S. ASHBE.

[We print this communication out of respect for our correspondent. But we would call his attention to the fact that he produces no evidence that the Oxford thief is identical with the great Frenchman.

In the ACADEMY of December 23, 1882, the question of identity was discussed at some length by Mr. H. Morse Stephens, who had all these Oxford documents before him. By means of the contemporary files of the Oxford Journal, he showed that le Maître alias Mara had been for some time a teacher of drawing for tambour, and a designer of tambour waistcoats in Oxford. His theft from the Ashmolean took place early in February 1776, and he was condemned to five years' hard labour in the hulks on the Thames in March 1777. With regard to Jean-Paul Marat, Mr. Stephens continues:

"We know indisputably that J.-P. M. had been for some years a doctor practising in London; that he had received the degree of M.D. at St. Andrews on June 30, 1775; that he published a medical pamphlet on a disease of the eyes on January 1, 1776, dated Church-street, Soho; and that he was appointed physician to the Gardes du Corps of the Comte d'Artois on June 24, 1777."—ED. SCIENCE.

THE WALLACHS OF MACEDONIA.

Vlachio-Meglen: eine ethnographisch-philologische Untersuchung. Von Dr. Gustav Weigand. (Leipzig: Barth.)

STUDENTS of ethnography and philology will be grateful to Dr. George Weigand for this interesting volume. In 1888 appeared Die Sprache der Olympos-Walachen by him, and in the present work he describes his visit to a small colony of Wallachs living in the district of Mount Pindus. The language of these southern Roumans has already formed the subject of a treatise by Miklosich (Beiträge zur Lautlehre der rumänischen Dialecte); but, as Dr. Weigand remarks, Miklosich had but scanty material to work upon, and, as he had never visited the country, could not always obtain an accurate pronunciation of the words. There are also native Grammars by Athanescu, Bojadschi, and Massimu.

These Macedonian Wallachs have been generally styled by the nickname Zinzars, from their pronunciation of the word five, cinç (chinch). They are also called in derision Kutzo-Vlachs, from the Greek κουτζός, lame, halting. Dr. Weigand, although finding that a great portion of them are employed as shepherds, rejects the idea that they are a race of shepherds. Connected with these Kutzo-Vlachs or Roumans, south of the Danube, is the small colony of the Meglenites, whose villages our author saw in the year 1889. He has summed up the results of his investigations as follows: (1) The Meglenites are a tribe clearly marked off from the Zinzars. (2) The language of the Meglenites forms such a connecting link between the Macedo-Roumanian (Kutzo-Vlach) dialect and the Daco-Roumanian, the literary language, that it entirely prevents us from attempting to treat these two languages as independent developments of Latin. We shall see the importance of this fact if we remember the great difficulties which still surround the origin of the Roumanian race, especially with regard to the localities in which they are now found. Readers of Rössler's Romanischen Studien will recall the discussion of this point. (3) The Meglenite dialect approaches the Daco-Roumanian in its inflexions and vocabulary, but the Macedo-Roumanian in its phonetics. (4) The Istrian dialect is closely connected with the Meglenite in some points, but on the other hand has peculiarities which bring it closer to Daco-Roumanian than to Macedo-Roumanian. (5) An explanation of these peculiarities might be found in the primitive Roumanian, materials for the study of which are somewhat deficient; and on the other hand the dialects, as a whole, are separated by sharply marked distinctions from the other Romance languages. Dr. Weigand asserts that "without doubt one and the same soul" lives in the four dialects.

Their origin in these parts of the present Turkish Empire our author traces to those Zinzars and other Wallachians who in the middle ages occupied the country in Western Thessaly called Μεγαλοβλαχία. The Byzantine writers, Nicetas and Anna Comnena, and the Spanish Jew, Benjamin of Tudela, speak of these Roumans. Towards the end of the twelfth century a Bulgaro-Wallachian empire was founded, which has furnished the subjects of a valuable monograph by Prof. Theo. Uspenski, "The Formation of the Second Bulgarian Empire" (Образование Второго Болгарского Царства). The empire did not last long (1186-1398), and the Roumans who formed a part of it were not many. According to Dr. Weigand, the Meglenites may be looked upon as the remains of those Wallachians who found a refuge in Mount Pindus.

All traces of their origin have been lost by this people; they do not adopt the proud title which asserts their descent from the Romans, but are content with the Slavonic name Vlachki. Dr. Weigand suggests that perhaps the Zinzars found in Albania some remains of an earlier Rouman population, and assimilated it. The principal place in this little Wallachian settlement is called Ljumnitsa, and contains 3000 inhabitants. The eleven villages which make up the settlement contain 1645 houses, with 14,000 inhabitants in round numbers. There are many Mohammedans among them. Specimens of the Macedo-Roumanian dialect will be found in the second volume of Dr. Gaster's Chrestomathy (Leipzig, 1891), but nothing is given from that of the Meglenites.

In the part which treats of the Meglenite vocabulary (p. 47), Dr. Weigand has much to tell us that is curious. In some words of Latin origin Meglenite agrees with Daco-Roumanian, but Macedo-Roumanian shows another Latin root; again, in some cases Meglenite and Daco-Roumanian have the same Latin root, but Macedo-Roumanian has a foreign word altogether. In some elements Meglenite agrees especially with Istrian. On p. 51 Dr. Weigand carefully sums up the phonetic peculiarities of this hitherto unknown dialect. Finally, it has an unusual amount of Slavonic words, as indeed might be surmised from its being surrounded by Bulgarian settlements. As the dialect must soon disappear, the author has deserved well of philologists in preserving its fast vanishing features.

The Rouman in these parts has, indeed, a weak basis for the preservation of his nationality: the country, geographically and linguistically (judging by the numbers who speak the language), belongs to the Bulgarians, and Bulgarian influence is paramount. The Greek, however, is eagerly looking out for what may fall to his share when the parts of the sick man are distributed; and he resents any self-assertion of the Rouman, whom he regards as an inferior being.

Dr. Weigand does not give a favourable idea of the physical characteristics of the Meglenites. The eyes are dull and small, and the cheek-bones are high; the habits of the people are dirty. They sleep in their clothes, he tells us, "as is generally the case in Turkey"—the use of beds being unknown. The houses are of one storey, and in a filthy condition; the family eat and sleep in the same room. The furniture is scanty, consisting of a few pots and pans, and a round table without legs, which ordinarily hangs on the wall. It is placed on the floor and the family squat round it to eat. But these are characteristics, as any traveller will acknowledge, of most villages in Turkey. The wants of the inhabitants are few. Ljumnitsa, which may be considered much in advance of the surrounding places, can furnish bread, cheese, the everlasting paprika—a vegetable producing very hot pepper—and onions. These form the ordinary diet of the inhabitants; there is also kids' flesh and, in winter, pork. The vineyards furnish a kind of red wine, which is mostly sold; from the grape brandy is also made. In general, the people are very sober.

Dr. Weigand has collected some interesting specimens of their folk-lore. They are great believers in vampires, and in old times when a man died a stake was driven through his body so that he should not become a vampire. It is supposed to come from the grave of a wicked man, and in the form of a huge bat to suck the blood of sleepers. Sometimes, in the guise of a man, it attacks human beings in lonely places and tears out their entrails.

We have endeavoured by some extracts from the more important parts to call attention to this interesting monograph. There are so many difficult problems connected with the Roumans: their mysterious origin; their disappearance from the pages of history for so long a period; the strange types to be found among them; and, chief of all, their language, with its vocabulary full of Slavonic, Greek, and Magyar words, to say nothing of the fundamental Latin, and that frequently of such a wonderful kind. Whatever may be the faults of the dictionary of Cihac, it cannot be denied that it is full of curious information. The Chrestomathy of Dr. Gaster enables us to survey the language from its earliest documents (in the sixteenth century) till 1830. The work of Dr. Weigand contributes valuable material for a complete study of the dialectology of the language, whenever the time for that may come.

THE ARAMAEAN INSCRIPTIONS OF SINJERLI AND THE NAME OF THE JEWS.

Queen's College, Oxford: June 26, 1893.

Owing to my absence from England, it is only now that I have been able to study the remarkable inscriptions found by Dr. Von Luschan at Sinjerli in Northern Syria, one of which has been exhaustively edited by Prof. Sachau under the title of "Die altaramäische Inschrift auf der Statue des Königs Panammu von Sam'al." In these texts the kings of Samalla or Sinjerli call themselves kings of Ya'di, a country which Prof. Sachau is unable to identify. But the Tel el-Amarna tablets come to our help.

In these mention is made of "the Yauda" as Dr. Scheil first pointed out, who are represented as serving in the Egyptian army in connexion with Aziru in the neighbourhood of Tunip or Tennib in Northern Syria (see my translation of the tablet in the Records of the Past, New Series V., pp. vi., vii.). As Yauda is the Assyrian way of writing the name of the Jews, the mention of these Yauda in Northern Syria before the age of the Exodus has not been easy to explain. But Yauda would also represent phonetically the Ya'di of the Sinjerli inscriptions; and since the geographical position of the Yauda agrees with that of Ya'di, I think we need feel no hesitation in identifying the two words. The relation of the name to that of Judah thus becomes an interesting question, more especially when we remember the Hebraising tendencies of the Aramaic inscriptions of Sinjerli.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE Albert medal of the Society of Arts for the present year has been awarded to Sir John Bennet Lawes and a like medal to Mr. John Henry Gilbert "for their joint services to scientific agriculture, and notably for the researches which throughout a period of fifty years have been carried on by them at the experimental farm, Rothamsted."

THE De Morgan gold medal of the Mathematical Society has been unanimously awarded by the council to Prof. F. Klein, of Göttingen, in recognition of his many contributions to the advancement of mathematical science.

At the last monthly meeting of the Zoological Society, silver medals were presented to Mr. Donald Cameron, of Lochiel, and to the representatives of the late John Peter Grant, of Rothiemurchus, in acknowledgment of the protection which they had given to the osprey on their family estates in Scotland, and also to Mr. George Stewart Mackenzie, in acknowledgment of his successful efforts to introduce the water-buck into this country.

At the annual general meeting of the Royal Statistical Society, held last Tuesday, Mr. Charles Booth was re-elected president for a second term; and the silver Guy medal of the society was presented to Mr. J. Glover, for his valuable series of papers on "Tonnage Statistics," which have now extended over forty years, from 1850 to 1890. It was stated that the present number of fellows is 981, and that the income for the past year was £2,391, showing a credit balance of £508.

THE Geological Society has resolved that an index shall be prepared to the first fifty volumes of its Quarterly Journal, at an expenditure not exceeding £450. It is proposed that the index be issued early in 1895, in two numbers in paper covers, uniform with the Quarterly Journal, and as a supplement to Vol. 50.

THE June number of the Geographical Journal (Edward Stanford), besides a report of Prof. Bonney's paper entitled "Do Glaciers excavate?" contains also a long article on "Pytheas, the Discoverer of Britain," by Mr. Clements R. Markham, which is illustrated with two maps. The writer begins with a sketch of the history of Phocaea and its colony Massilia, and then gives an account of the state of geographical knowledge and of nautical skill in the third century B.C. His opinion is altogether favourable to the veracity of Pytheas (whom he compares throughout with Columbus); and he even goes so far as to identify the places he touched at by calculating their latitude from the length of the longest day as fixed by him. Orcas he identifies with Unst Island, the northernmost of the Shetlands; and he is disposed to think that Thule was Norway, not Iceland. His conclusion is:—

"We may, therefore, accept as an established historical fact, that Pytheas of Massilia obtained the first information respecting the Arctic Regions, and that he was the discoverer of the British Isles."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

PROF. E. A. SONNENSCHNEIN, of Mason College, Birmingham, has been invited to read a paper at the Philological Congress at Chicago on July 12; his subject will be "The Scientific Emendation of Classical Texts."

THE last number of the Babylonian and Oriental Record (David Nutt) contains an article entitled "Researches in Hunno-Scythic," by Prof. Kiraly de Dada, of Pesth. It is the anticipation of a large work he has in hand upon the old national script of the Hungarians. That the Hungarians once possessed such a script is attested by Latin chroniclers of the middle ages; and the alphabet of it was published by John Telegdi, a Magyar student in Holland (Leiden, 1598), and afterwards by Hickee (Oxford, 1703). But the knowledge of it had become so utterly extinct in Hungary that its very existence has been denied. However, an inscription in this writing was found in 1866 in one of the Unitarian churches of Transylvania: and the writer claims to have since discovered a great many more, from which he has compiled a table of more than thirty letters, with their equivalents. The mode of writing is always from right to left; words are separated by a dot above the line, sometimes by four dots; the letter ç is generally suppressed, except at the end of words. The form of the characters shows that they were originally cut with a knife round sticks, as the old chroniclers relate. The writer finds some resemblance between them and the so-called "runiform" characters of the Yenissei inscriptions. Altogether the subject is a curious one, about which we should like more detailed information.

WE have received a dissertation on "The Tragedy Rhesus" (Boston: Ginn), which was presented by Prof. J. C. Rolfe, of Michigan, for the degree of Ph.D. at Cornell University so long ago as 1885. It was then written in Latin, but has now been re-written in English, with many additions and corrections. The author shows an exhaustive acquaintance with the vast amount of German literature upon the subject (it does not appear from his citations that any English scholar has specially written on it), and then proceeds to examine the question of the authorship of the play from the statistical point of view, which is so much in vogue at American universities. For example, he gives six tables of peculiar words in the Rhesus, which are to be found: (1) nowhere else, (2) nowhere else in tragedy, (3) elsewhere only in Aeschylus, (4) elsewhere only in Aeschylus and in Sophocles, (5) elsewhere only in Aeschylus and in Euripides, (6) elsewhere only in Sophocles—though he does not himself attach excessive weight to this evidence. We must be content here to quote his conclusion:

"The Rhesus is not the work of Euripides. It was written by an Athenian, who lived between the end of the Peloponnesian War and the time of Demosthenes, who made a well-meant but not wholly successful attempt to write a play of the old school, strict in its metrical structure, and avoiding the peculiarities of the school of Euripides. He naturally took Aeschylus as his model. Being familiar with the plays of Sophocles and Euripides, he consciously or unconsciously followed them somewhat, especially the latter, which probably set the fashion in his time. He had more poetic than dramatic ability."

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

HELLENIC.—(Annual Meeting, Monday, June 19.)

In the absence of Prof. Jebb, the chair was taken by Prof. Lewis Campbell.—Among those present were Dr. Charles Waldstein, M. Romanos, the Greek Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. Walter Leaf, Mr. Ernest Gardner, the Rev. B. H. Alford, Mr. Talfourd Ely, Dr. Sandys, the Rev. W. Wayte, Mr. Theodore Bent, the Rev. Dr. Holden, Admiral Sir E. Ommanney, Mr. D. G. Hogarth, Mr. F. G. Kenyon, Mr. H. G. Dakyns, and Miss Emily Penrose.—Prof. Lewis Campbell said he was sure that all would regret the absence of Prof. Jebb, from whom they had expected an instructive address.—Mr. George Macmillan, the secretary, read the annual report, of which the following are the most interesting portions:—"In last year's report it was promised that in the course of 1892 would appear a full account of the excavations carried out upon the site of Megalopolis by members of the British School at Athens, and also an ordinary volume of the Journal, though a thinner one than usual. This plan has necessarily undergone modification in consequence of the unforeseen expansion of the report on Megalopolis. The volume, which is just ready, will be found to contain an exhaustive treatment of the subject alike from the historical and the archaeological point of view; and the council feel no doubt that members will be satisfied to accept it, and Mr. Headlam's paper, already issued, in place of any Journal for 1892. In the meantime, as the publication of this report was inevitably delayed, it was decided to push on the ordinary issue of the Journal, and the first part of volume xiii. was accordingly produced in April. To preserve the continuity of the series this volume is described as for 1892-93. With it was sent out a special monograph by Mr. A. C. Headlam, on ecclesiastical sites in Isauria, which suggests a very interesting development of the society's work, as illustrating the relations of Hellenic research with the early history of Christianity. As the society has from the outset contributed to the support of the British School at Athens, it will be of interest to members to know that the school has had another successful session. The number of efficient students has been above the average, the excavations at Megalopolis have been carried to a successful conclusion, and other important pieces of work have been done by students in Athens itself, which have borne or are likely to bear fruit in the form of papers in the society's Journal. In the course of March the council were called upon to consider a scheme, initiated by Mr. Churton Collins, for the extension of the popular study of the Greek language. Though feeling that the movement was one that the society might well encourage, the council doubted whether any practical control or responsibility should be undertaken. In the event, a committee, consisting of Prof. Jebb, the President of Magdalen, Mr. Leaf, Mr. Dakyns, Mr. Ely, Miss Harrison, and Mr. Macmillan, was appointed to confer with representatives of the University Extension bodies at Oxford, Cambridge, and in London, on the possibility of extending and developing the elementary study of Greek both in London and the provinces. This committee is still sitting, and the council are as yet quite unable to say what the outcome will be; but it is at least interesting to note that the lectures on Greek literature, art, and history delivered under the various University Extension organisations have in some instances led to a desire to acquire a knowledge of the Greek language. The council will probably have something to say on the subject in their next report. Sixty-one new members have been elected during the year, while 25 have been lost by death or resignation. This shows a net increase of 36, and brings the total number of members up to 755. Five new libraries have joined the list of subscribers, which now amounts to 112. On the whole, the progress of the society, both in regard to work done and to the increase of its members, has been as good as in any previous year. It is exactly fourteen years since the inaugural meeting was held on June 19, 1879. There has been a steady advance year by year towards the attainment of the objects which the society was founded to promote."—The chairman said they would all feel that the report was eminently satisfactory. The best evidence, however, of their labours consisted in the sumptuous record of the long-expected excavations at Megalopolis which lay before them, and which gave most interesting details of Greek civic life in the fourth century B.C. The extension to the library was most acceptable, as the old room was almost impossible. Now they would all be able to read in the library with comfort. He welcomed the idea of encouraging the study of Greek, which he had known pursued with valuable results even when it was begun at a late period of life. He hoped the committee would be successful in its endeavours in this direction. He moved the adoption of the report.—Dr. Waldstein seconded the report. He said that, before the birth of the society, no facilities existed in this country for the publication of works on Greek archaeology. The direct work and still more the indirect influence of the society had effected in this respect a positive revolution. From that society had sprung the British School of Athens, which in the last few years had made a phenomenal advance. To that progress the chief contributor had been Mr. Percy Gardner. The results of that school were not vague hypotheses, but in many cases irrefragable conclusions.—Mr. Ernest Gardner then gave a brief account of the labours of the last year, of which the principal items referred to were fragment of the balustrade of Nike Apteros found by Mr. V. Yorke, and the French excavations at Delphi, including the Treasure-house of the Athenians, a piece of Attic work of the period of the Persian wars. Indeed, Delphi promised to be as rich in treasures of ancient life as Olympia itself; and though it had not fallen to the lot of our countrymen to carry out those researches, the impulse to the excavation of Delphi was due mainly to Dr. Waldstein. The German excavations in Athens itself had also been fruitful of results.—The secretary then mentioned that a proposal had been made that the society should undertake or assist in excavations at Alexandria, where lay a rich and almost untouched field for the labours of the Greek archaeologist.—Mr. Theodore Bent gave a short account of his researches in Abyssinia, and particularly of the ancient cities of Koloe and Axum.—Prof. Jebb was re-elected president, and Prof. Lewis Campbell and Rev. Dr. H. A. Holden were elected to vacancies occurring among the vice-presidents. The following were elected to vacancies on the council: Mr. Bernard Bosanquet, Lady Evans, Mr. F. B. Jevons, Prof. William Ridgeway, Mr. R. W. Schultz, and Prof. W. Wyse.—At the preceding meeting of the council 21 new members of the society were elected, including the Bishop of Durham, M. Romanos, the Chargé d'Affaires for Greece, and Prof. T. H. Wright, of Harvard.

FINE ART.

ENGRAVINGS AND DRAWINGS by OLD MASTERS.—Messrs. DEPREZ & GUTENST have always on hand a selection of WORKS by the best Masters. Collections arranged, valued, and purchased. Prints and Drawings mounted and framed.—18, Green Street, Charing Cross Road, W.C.

EGYPT EXPLORATION FUND.

THE EXCAVATIONS AT DAYR EL BAHARI.

For the first time since the Egypt Exploration Fund has existed, the society has received permission to excavate one of the temples of Thebes. It is an urgent duty for me to express my gratitude to M. de Morgan, the present director of the Ghizeh Museum, not only for having granted to the society one of the choicest spots in Egypt, but also for having considerably facilitated my work by lending me a tramway. It is absolutely necessary to have one in such a place, where the debris have to be carried to a considerable distance, in order to be quite sure that nothing of interest is being hidden in the course of the work.

All travellers who have been at Thebes know the majestic cliff, in the form of an amphitheatre, at the foot of which is Dayr el Bahari (the Northern Convent), known by that name since the Copts built a convent over the ruins of the old sanctuary. The temple is quite different from all others in Egypt, being built in successive terraces, the highest of which leans against the mountain on its northern and western sides. The length of the temple was much greater than its width; the sanctuary was a rock-cut chamber, in the axis of the building, and opened on the upper terrace.

Mariette first excavated the temple. Following the central avenue which leads to the sanctuary, he cleared a great part of the southern side, throwing over on to the northern side all the rubbish which he could not get rid of. The most important part of his discoveries consisted of the supporting wall of the upper terrace, with sculptures depicting a naval expedition to the land of Punt; the rock-cut sanctuary of the goddess Hathor, where the goddess is seen in the form of a cow, suckling the young queen, Hashepsu, or Hatasu as she is incorrectly called; and the great hall of offerings. On the northern side, Mariette, and after him M. Maspero, dug out part of the portico at the foot of the upper terrace, and a small sanctuary corresponding to that of Hathor, which was found full of mummies of recent date.

I settled near Dayr el Bahari at the end of January, and started work at once in the part which Mariette had left untouched and covered with mounds of rubbish I began with the upper terrace. I was obliged, owing to the steep slope, to establish two lines of tramway, the upper one carrying the rubbish to a short distance, the lower one taking it a long way off, to what is called the birket, a large depression used in former times as a claypit. Though I could not work so long as I wished, having been stopped by the fast of Rhamadan, the excavations led to important results. I cleared completely the northern half of the upper terrace, the description of which was quite unknown, and which is separated from the rest by a stout wall preserved only in its lower part. This wall, in which there are two doors, is the southern limit of a part of the building, having a decidedly funerary character. I suppose it was connected with the burial-place of Thothmes I., which is perhaps somewhere in the neighbourhood.

The western door leads to a long hall, with well preserved sculptures of gigantic proportions, showing Hatasu and Thothmes III. making offerings to Amon. Next to it is an open court limited on the north by the mountain, on the east by the remains of a chamber with columns. From that court one enters into a small rock-cut chapel, the funeral chapel of Thothmes I. The ceiling, well painted in blue with yellow stars, is an Egyptian arch. The heretical king, and after him the Copts, have scratched out the figures of the gods Osiris, Anubis, &c.; but the king is well preserved. He is seen there with two different queens: one of them, Ahmes, is well known, the other one, Senseneb, so far as I know, has not yet been met with. An iron door has been put to the chapel by the authorities of the Ghizeh Museum.

Just before the door of this chapel is a building unique of its kind among Egyptian temples. It is a great square altar in limestone, to which access is given by a flight of steps. Until I discovered the staircase, I was in doubt as to the nature of the building. I thought at first that it might be a mastaba, the construction which covers the tombs in the Old Empire. The people who plundered the temple in ancient times evidently had the same idea, for they pulled down a corner of it, in order to see whether it concealed a pit. All my doubts were removed when I could read the inscription. It says that a royal person—who is clearly Queen Hatasu, though her name is hammered out—"built a large altar in white stone to her father, Ra Harmakhis"; meaning perhaps her deified father, Thothmes I. The altar is a platform, 16 feet by 13 feet and 5 feet high, with ten steps leading up to it. It had a low parapet like the terraces, in order to prevent the offerings from falling into the court, and probably there was a smaller altar in hard stone placed on the top. It is the only altar of this kind known in Egypt. Mr. John Newberry, who, as an expert in architecture, gave me most valuable assistance, put back again some of the stones that had been thrown down by the plunderers; and, as all the blocks seem to be there, we hope to be able to restore the altar nearly complete next winter.

Another object, also unique, I found on a terrace above the chambers excavated by M. Maspero. It is one of the sides of a large shrine of ebony, more than six feet high, erected by Thothmes II. Ebony never being found in large pieces, the whole panel is made of small fragments held together by ebony pegs, which have been used with the greatest skill as part of the sculpture. This shrine was erected by Thothmes II, who says in the inscription that it was made of ebony "from the top of the mountains" in honour of his father, Amon. But everywhere the figure of Amon has been cut out with a knife, evidently by the heretical kings. It is the same with another part of the shrine which I discovered close by, a leaf of the folding door which closed it, which has rings of bronze for the bolt. It was a very difficult and delicate task to lift out the panel and to pack it, without running the risk of seeing the whole thing fall to pieces, as ebony is a very heavy wood. However, we succeeded in removing it without the slightest injury from the terrace where it had been lying for many centuries. It was encircled in a double frame and carefully packed in a box, made under Mr. Newberry's supervision. It is now on its way to the Ghizeh Museum, where it will have to be repaired by a skilled cabinet-maker before being exhibited.

The Copts who built their convent over the temple have practised the most ruthless destruction among the very beautiful sculptures which adorned it. They have scattered all over the building parts of a most interesting scene which I believe belonged to the lowest terrace. Some of its fragments are built into walls, others have been used as thresholds or stairs, others piled together with capitals and bricks in the clumsy partitions which they raised between the rooms of the convent. I carefully gathered and stored all the blocks I found belonging to that series which represented the transportation of obelisks and other heavy monuments. The most interesting of these blocks shows an obelisk lying on a high boat, where it has been placed by means of a sort of sledge on which it still rests. The high boat is towed by a small one rowed by several men. Unfortunately, the block is small; we see only the top of the obelisk, but we may hope next winter to find the remaining parts. It is the first time anything has been discovered relating to the transportation of obelisks.

The last thing I found is a very curious inscription concerning the birth of Hatasu and her accession to the throne. It is on the supporting wall of the upper terrace. We see the god Anubis rolling an enormous egg, and goddesses suckling the young queen; further we come to her enthronement by her father. Thothmes I. is seen in a shrine, stretching forth his hands towards a young man, who is the queen. The young man is hammered out, but still discernible, as well as the long inscription which accompanies the pictures and which relates how Thothmes called together the grandees of his kingdom, and ordered them to obey his daughter. There is an obscure allusion to his death, and a description of the rejoicings when she ascended the throne. The date, I believe, may be interpreted in this way: that the first of the month Thoth, the first day of the variable year, and the beginning of the seasons, or of the natural year, fell on the same day.

This short summary shows how rich a place is Dayr el Bahari, and how much we may expect from further excavations, which I hope will be resumed in the autumn. I must add that in the rubbish I found a great many Coptic letters written on potsherds or on pieces of limestone. They contain the correspondence between certain monks called Victor, John, Abraham, Zacharia, &c. They usually begin with a salutation, and sometimes with the formula: "In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." These letters have all been sent to Europe, and are the property of the Fund.

EDOUARD NAVILLE.

MR. FRANCIS JAMES'S WATER-COLOURS.

MR. FRANCIS E. JAMES has on view at Mr. Van Wisselingh's (the Dutch Gallery) in Brook-street, Hanover-square, a very varied collection of water-colours, several of them being pure and simple flower pieces, like those by which he first won the attention of the connoisseur, though the bulk of them are rather landscape studies or studies of effects and of architecture in England, Germany, Venice, and the coast by Spezzia, to which last-named locality Mr. James threatens to banish himself every winter. Mr. James's earlier landscape work had much of Dewint's breadth and fulness of tone, and something even of his learned simplicity. Nor in the later manifestations of Mr. James's frank and engaging art are these great qualities of a master of English water-colour in any way forgotten. But a perhaps more recent influence—that of Mr. H. B. Brabazon—is, it may be, now likewise discernible; and, to boot, Mr. James's own gifts as a colourist, subtle and observant, and one who has the right to be fearless, are not only what they always were—apparent—but actually dominating. His treatment of flowers has, of course, been always wholly his own. That is evident whether it be studied in the drawings of flowers only, as in one or two wonderful orchids—Mauce Orchids in particular—with whose difficulties he has quite triumphantly grappled, or in such a drawing as that of "The Window, Rottenburg," in which the homely flowers of the German peasant are framed by window-sill and shutter, and by the board announcing—in German, of course—the presence of some village school. But Mr. Francis James is now well nigh as original in pure landscape or cloud studies, as, for example, in "Rain Effect, Venice"—the gathering scudding storm over the length of the lagoon—and in the quite masterly drawing, so clean and so decided, so delicate yet so free, of an English wheelwright's shop, with its open doors and its waggons. Again, he is completely himself, with vision and with methods of his own, when he addresses himself, not at all in the spirit of the architectural draughtsman, to an occasional record of such beautiful combinations of colour and illumination as may be seen in this or that church interior. To this class of drawing belongs his most silvery vision of the "High Altar of the Kaiser Kapelle at Nuremberg," and his rich and forcible "Side-Altar in St. Lorenz," executed last year, and this year's admirable drawing of a similar theme, "Behind the High Altar, St. Mark's Venice." Mr. James's work commends itself most to the most tasteful and the most refined. It must escape nobody.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MESSRS. BLADES, EAST, & BLADES have been authorised to publish a selection of the pictures presented to the city of London by Sir John Gilbert. The reproduction will be by the collotype process, direct from the pictures themselves. The volume will contain a preface by Mr. A. G. Temple, director of the Guildhall Art Gallery, giving a brief account of Sir John Gilbert's life and work.

MR. A. A. WOOD, chairman of the library committee of the corporation of the city of London, will give a reception in the Guildhall Library and Museum, on Tuesday, July 11, to meet the Archaeological Institute, which will then be holding its annual meeting in London. On this occasion, there will be a special Shelley exhibition in the reading-room, and an exhibition of pictures of Old London by Mr. Philip Norman in the upper art library; while examples of the presses of early London printers and other rare books and MSS. will also be on view.

THE following have been elected members of the Royal Society of British Artists:—Messrs. Gilbert Foster, H. G. Hewitt, N. A. Lorraine, Wm. Manners, Arthur Ryle, G. Hillyard Swinstead, W. E. Tindall, Leonard Watts, and Walter West.

MESSRS. SOTHEYBY will be engaged in selling throughout next week miscellaneous engravings. Most of them are from the collection of the late Dr. Norman Cheevers, who had accumulated a vast number of historical portraits, &c. From other collections, there are a series of tickets engraved by Bartalozzi, packs of old playing cards, mezzotints of the last century, and the publications of the Arundel Society.

MR. STANLEY LANE-POOLE has presented to the National Portrait Gallery a life-size statue of his great-uncle, Edward Lane, the orientalist. It was modelled by his elder brother, Richard James Lane, who is better known as a lithographer than as a sculptor.

THE Gresham committee of the corporation of London are considering the question of decoration of the Royal Exchange. Sir Frederic Leighton has offered to paint and present one of the frescoes, and the cost of another has been undertaken by Mr. Deputy Snowden.

VARIOUS learned bodies in France, including the Académie des Inscriptions, have adopted memorials to the Paris municipality, urging the importance of preserving as a public monument the old Faculté de Médecine, which is in danger of destruction. This building, which is situated in the Rue de la Bucherie, contains a theatre which was inaugurated in 1744 by the Danish anatomist, Jacob Winslow.

Repertorium für Kunstwissenschaft, xvi. 1 and 2. The present number of this scholarly periodical contains fewer articles of general interest than usual. There are notes upon certain early paintings in Valencia by Dr. Justi, and a study of the effect of Roman Triumphal Arches upon Renaissance architecture. Max Lehrs continues his exhaustive studies of early engravings in the smaller collections, and there is an interesting article on old lace-books, by E. von Ubisch. Some critical notes on the Burlington Fine Arts Club's exhibition of Flemish Art likewise deserve mention.

MUSIC.

"TRISTAN UND ISOLDE."

THE performance of Wagner's great music-drama at Covent Garden on Wednesday evening was one of considerable interest, and yet—for truth will out—it was not the best that has been heard in London. Only last season it was given under specially favourable conditions. To criticise is to compare, and any falling off from a high standard must be recorded. Frau Moran-Olden, the new Isolde, has a powerful voice, enters thoroughly into the spirit of her part, and, moreover, is evidently an actress of wide experience. But she sang, or rather declaimed, with such energy in the trying first act, that she was unable to do justice to the love music of the second act. Her intonation, at times, was very uncertain. Every allowance must, however, be made for a first appearance in such an exacting rôle. Frau Moran-Olden enjoys a high reputation in Germany, and she will, doubtless, display her best powers in "Die Walküre." Herr Max Alvary was the Tristan. This accomplished artist, too, was not in the best voice; but his dignified deportment and intelligent acting made amends for the weakness in his singing, specially noticeable in the love-duet, and in one of the can-can phrases in the third act. His acting in this last act was full of nervous passion. By the way, how wonderful are the momentary lulls between those feverish paroxysms of Tristan; and how extraordinary is the gradation of intensity! From a purely musical point of view, this third act displays Wagner's power of development in a specially striking manner. The close of the second act may be dramatically effective, but musically it is an anti-climax. But in the third act we have ebb and flow, and each time the musical waves, as it were, advance higher, until the thrilling threnody is reached. Miss Esther Palliser as Brangäne deserves special praise. Vocally she was equal to the task, while her acting was at all times impressive, and not in any way forced. Mr. D. Bispham was an excellent Kurvenal. Herr Steinbach, the new conductor, is evidently a man of considerable ability, and well versed in Wagner's scores. But on Wednesday he showed a certain anxiety and excitement; a conductor must feel deeply, yet not show those feelings. But Herr Steinbach was amid entirely new surroundings, and it would be unreasonable to judge him from this trying test. He is evidently a Wagner conductor of high rank.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MR. ALBERT B. BACH once threatened that he would write about Loewe and sing his Ballads until the genius of the composer was fully recognised. And he is as good as his word, for he gave a concert last Thursday week, at the Steinway Hall, with what may be practically called a Loewe programme, for it included nine of the composer's Ballads. Loewe has been overshadowed by his great contemporary Schubert, and Mr. Bach deserves all praise for trying to rescue his name from the oblivion into which it has fallen. But in his enthusiasm he seems to adopt a method calculated to bring about the very reverse of what he is aiming at. Loewe possessed dramatic instinct; but his melodies have not the charm of those of Schubert, while his pianoforte accompaniments cannot be named in the same breath with those of Schubert, Schumann, and other modern composers. A little of Loewe goes a long way; a little would create interest, but ballad after ballad becomes somewhat monotonous. Thus did the late Mr. Walter Bache try to persuade the public to admire Liszt, but tried in vain; and if Mr. Bach thinks by much singing he will convert a perverse and questioning generation, we fear he will suffer a similar experience. He is an excellent interpreter of the Loewe Ballads, and the sympathetic and intelligent way in which he is supported by his wife at the pianoforte adds to the effect of his renderings. But excess of enthusiasm has spoilt many a good cause.

Miss Verne (Miss Mathilde Wurm) gave a Pianoforte Recital at St. James's Hall on Friday afternoon, June 23. She performed Schumann's Fantasia (Op. 17) with good taste and marked energy. It was played in the proper spirit; but this, of course, Miss Verne caught from her illustrious teacher, Mme. Schumann. She was also heard in Bach's Italian Concerto and pieces by modern composers. Mlle. Irrac, the talented young violinist, gave a satisfactory rendering of some Tartini Variations.

Mrs. Henschel held a "Recital of Song" in the evening at St. James's Hall. She sang old English, Scotch, Irish, and Welsh songs, also songs by Arne, Bishop; and she charmed her audience. Mr. Henschel accompanied, and so well that one found one's self at times listening to the pianist rather than to the vocalist. The programme, however, included other features of interest. Mr. Henschel's choir, under his direction, gave a most refined rendering of Wilbye's wonderfully quaint and delicate part-song, "Adieu, sweet Amaryllis," and of another by Pearsall. They also sang a clever setting of Herrick's "Music, thou queen of heaven," by Mr. Henschel. A performance was also given of Schubert's setting of the 92nd Psalm for solo, quartet, and chorus, which was composed, and on this occasion sung, to the Hebrew text. The music is simple and dignified. The solo singers were Mrs. Henschel, Miss Hortense Carver, and Messrs. C. Carlyle, Hayden Bailey, and Dan Price.

Señor Sarasate gave his fourth and last concert at St. James's Hall on Saturday afternoon. He repeated the Goldmark Suite for piano and violin. The composition certainly does not display marked originality; but it is most skilfully worked, and improves on second hearing. The slow movement still appears to us the best of the four. The eminent violinist played four Slavonic Dances by Dvorák, remarkable for their freshness, skill, and charm. Mme. Berthe Marx gave a clever performance of some pianoforte solos, including the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and took part with Señor Sarasate in the "Kreutzer" Sonata.

On Monday evening the fourth Richter concert took place at St. James's Hall. The programme was specially interesting. It opened with Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, and closed with that master's Symphony in A; and of both works admirable renderings were given. However familiar may be the Symphonies of Beethoven, Dr. Richter by his earnestness and energy seems to throw new life into them. The programme included the first scene from Act iii. of Wagner's "Siegfried." The music of this scene is of great interest; but among the many wonderful pages of the music drama, its merits are not perhaps fully recognised. A concert performance therefore serves a good purpose. The solo parts were taken by Miss Agnes Janson and Mr. Eugène Oudin; the former, especially, deserves praise for the bold declamatory manner in which she interpreted her part. Mr. Oudin was heard to advantage in an interesting Aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling."

Herr Benno Schönberger gave a Pianoforte Recital at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. There was at times a little exaggeration in his reading of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 27 No. 1.); but, on the whole, the performance showed character and intelligence. He played two pieces by Scarlatti; and in the former, again, there was a little too much storm and stress. Schubert's Impromptu in G—or, to be more correct, G flat—(Op. 90, No. 3) was, however, charmingly rendered. Herr Schönberger seems to have a special affection for Schubert's music. Another performance deserving of mention was that of Mendelssohn's Capriccio (Op. 16, No. 2), which was played with great finish, dash, and at a daring rate. It was encored. The programme included pieces by Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, and other modern writers. Herr Schönberger is one of our best pianists.

so goodnatured, so desirous of pleasing.... As the story is quite up to her usual level its popularity is conceivable."
Morning Post.—"Aunt Johnnie" is a refreshingly bright society story, a variety of the class that is not too often met with. The attraction it exercises is due in a great measure to a vein of real feeling.... Altogether the story, which is written with the author's usual verve, is full of movement and vivacity."

Publisher's Circular.—"It is always a pleasure to turn to a novel written by John Strange Winter, and in the present case the pleasure is accentuated by the fact that 'Aunt Johnnie' is better than most of this author's works.... The story is well told, there are clever touches on every page, and the delighted reader devours every line of the book, for John Strange Winter uses very little padding in her writings, and with every page the story is advanced a peg. We congratulate the author on this her latest success."

Saturday Review.—"There is a great deal of go and spirit in the book; much of it is amusing."

"Our friends of the Principality have in 'Owen Rees' a treat in store in the form of a well-written story. The object of the book, which is to illustrate the life, habits, and

LITERATURE.

William George Ward and the Catholic Revival.
By Wilfrid Ward. (Macmillans.)

THERE is no falling off in the second instalment of Mr. Ward's memorial of his illustrious father: the hero of the story is as amusing, as amiable, and as stimulating as ever, and the biographer as lucid and as discreet. It is clear, of course, that by no means all the story is told. Ward exerted himself a great deal at Rome to promote the interests of the truth and the Church as he understood them. Here and there we learn something of the results, nowhere anything of the methods of his activity: there are only glimpses of his relations to ecclesiastical authorities in England. When he was dictating to everybody in the Dublin Review, he insisted on being subject himself to three theological censors, who complimented him on his docility. This is a little remarkable, as in 1859 (before he was editor) he wrote strongly and bitterly to Newman about a certain A. B.: "an omnipresent supreme inquisitor into every detail," "abounding (as I think) in most admirable instincts, but not a reasonable being in any shape." When he went first to live and teach at Old Hall, he wanted not only to teach the pupils theology, but to direct or inspire their spiritual training; and even when he had no connexion with the college, it spoilt his sleep to know that two of the professors encouraged the students to read the classics instead of the Greek Testament. Apparently the curriculum left little spare time for either, and not enough for both. It is not strange that most of the authorities of the college should have been against him: even Newman thought his position as a married layman teaching theology to future priests a false one; but his pupils were enthusiastic, and even suffered for their enthusiasm. The present Cardinal Vaughan, when he joined the college as vice-president, was soon fascinated; and Cardinal Wiseman supported him energetically from the first, and got his work recognised at Rome by special indulgences and the grant of a doctor's degree. His zeal as a squire was equally embarrassing: when he first tried to live at Northwood, he began by telling the priest in charge of the Cowes Mission, in the friendliest manner, that he was no doubt an excellent man, but he could not bear him, and intended to make the bishop remove him. But the bishop was not pliable.

Ward left Rosehill early in 1846 to live near Old Hall. Before 1847 was far advanced, he and his wife found they had only £5 left to take them through the quarter, when, just at the decisive moment, a Mr. McDonnell offered his son as a pupil at £300 a year. Ward conscientiously hesitated, but finally accepted on condition that he might send his pupil away at a day's notice if he proved refractory. His uncle died in September, 1849. Ward, who did not care about him, was astonishingly frank about the matter, and told a priest that his spirits rose as he thought of the approaching end, though he laughed heartily when asked whether he would do anything to hasten it. The Wards seem to have been a peculiar family. It was their custom when they quarrelled to arrange not to speak, and meet as strangers. Ward (who cared for for none of his family, except two aunts at Cowes, who were as charitable as himself) applied the family system rather superfluously to a cousin, who was a colonial governor, and to one of his brothers. They met at the play and forgot all about their quarrel, and solemnly exchanged affectionate notes next morning, apologising for the mistake and renewing the arrangement. He professed to know and care nothing about his children till they were old enough to be reasonable beings. Then they had perfect confidence and trust in him—all the more that he was free from "the parental heresy" of thinking that all children ought to look up to all parents. Two of his daughters gratified him by becoming nuns, and surprised him by telling him that they owed their vocation to him. The eldest was decidedly precocious: somewhere between ten and thirteen she discovered that her confessor gave her more advice than she wished. Ward held as independent a view of his duties as a landlord as of his duties as a father. He took a great deal of pains to see that his agent did not ill-use his tenants (he had no need to take pains to give liberally); but he never even tried to know or care about them. For eight years after he came into his property he did not attempt to reside. After three years' trial he decided that the secular tone of life at Cowes (his own favourite pleasure was comic opera) was bad for his health, and went back to Old Hall. In 1871 he built himself a house near Freshwater, which was his home till his death. From 1863 to 1878 he was editor of the Dublin Review, a task which he accepted very reluctantly and performed to the satisfaction of those whom he most wished to please. From 1869 to 1878 he was the soul of the Metaphysical Society, and no part of the book is more attractive than the account of his contributions to their somewhat barren debates. The society was drowned at last in the milk of human kindness: the members who differed as much as possible came to like and understand each other too well to care to argue. None liked each other better than Ward and Huxley. Ward characteristically proved his friendship by telling Huxley that he was the one member of the society whose errors could not be excused by invincible ignorance.

Ward was in his element in controversy, but only enjoyed himself in controversy with those whom he regarded as infidels: he disliked controversy with true believers, even when they were strangers. He suffered much from his dispute with Newman, of which he spoke himself as the great mistake and misfortune of his life. Newman, whom he did his best to keep from founding an Oratory at Oxford, said that Ward had been kinder in feeling to him than he to Ward. Very likely he was right. Ward said of himself that he had the intellect of an archangel and the habits of a rhinoceros: that quadruped has a thick hide, heavy hoofs, and, unlike Ward, a detestable temper. Newman did not find it easy to like even a good-tempered rhinoceros. Both Ward and Newman, like the rest of the Oxford converts, felt that they were intellectual exiles, though they had found their spiritual country. The group, which supported the Rambler and the Home and Foreign Review, endeavoured to naturalise the modern intellectual life as it was understood in the fifties among English Roman Catholics. Ward, who would have liked a frosh Papal Bull every morning with The Times at breakfast, sympathised with their discontent though not with their remedies, and was honestly anxious that Newman should put himself at the head of the movement. It was when Newman refused to do this, after a short trial, that he put himself at the head of a counter-movement for inflicting upon an unwilling world the last fragment of instruction to be extracted from the voluminous utterances of Pius IX. Probably Ward was right in thinking that bellicose Pontiff really believed he was instructing a rebellious race. Newman was certainly right in holding that Roman censures, as a general rule, were intended simply as instruments of government. Even Pius IX. was not allowed to commit himself so deeply as he wished. The famous Syllabus was published in a way which did not pledge his infallibility, though at the time Ward and many zealots believed that it did. In fact, the strongest impression that the book makes is that the famous ultramontane reaction was a sort of dream. All its leaders, from De Maistre onwards, were like blind men whose eyes were suddenly opened—to see men as trees walking. They saw the service which the papacy and the clergy at the height of their authority had rendered to civilisation and piety; and without asking why that authority had been so precarious and short-lived, they promptly concluded that the one condition of salvation for the modern world was to restore the authority of the clergy and the Pope. Very likely they fought the good fight. During the thirty years, more or less, which Pius IX. spent in denouncing tendencies which he could not check and asserting principles which he could not enforce, politicians and journalists found it much easier to caricature him than to answer him. He certainly raised the question whether infallibility is much use without inspiration: it is quite conceivable that an authority may be at once infallible and stupid, always giving the right answers to the wrong questions. Humanly speaking, the decisions of Rome are the decisions of a few score elderly Italians, who are accomplished and able and learned in all sorts of obsolete ways. There are a few hundred ecclesiastics, a few dozen laymen, all over Europe and America, who, indirectly or directly, have some chance of influencing them. Such decisions are less unlikely to be infallible than to be very helpful or very wise. The Home and Foreign party saw Rome very much as it was, and asked nothing from it except to be let alone, while not unwilling to recognise it as the appointed guardian of the priceless talisman of revealed dogmatic truth, which the faithful were to carry with them in their warfare. Both Newman and Ward repudiated their claim to disregard headquarters and fight for their own hand; but Newman sympathised very strongly with their desire to be permitted to come to close quarters with modern foes and to fight with modern weapons. Neither had any real sympathy with the downright obscurantism of Veuillot and Gaume, the real strength of whose position is very well brought out by Mr. Ward. Veuillot, as the demagogue of a peasant clergy and of illiterate devotees, was really in a position to effect far more than "liberal Catholics," with their elegant and ingenious appeals to the "romantic" sympathies of literary Paris. In one way there was something Protestant in the attitude of Veuillot and of Ward. Every believer, according to both, had the right and duty of learning all truth direct from Rome, just as, according to Mr. Spurgeon, every believer had the right and duty of learning all truth direct from the Bible. Newman, who turned out to be right, held that believers must wait for the Schola Theologorum to settle at its leisure both the authority and the meaning of Roman decisions (which, of course, are practically indisputable), and then to explain them, if not to explain them away: to outsiders this arrangement seems to provide the maximum of restraint with the minimum of guidance.

Happily, Ward's whole life was not absorbed in this dismal warfare. One of the first things he did after his conversion was to write elaborately to Mill and Sir William Hamilton on the fundamental questions of Theism. Among other things he asked Mill, who thought that miracles might be proved by adequate evidence, but only to believers in a personal God, whether the being of such a God might not be proved by any prophet who avouched his mission by publicly, after due notice, turning water into "good sherry wine." He was told by Sir William Hamilton that, assuming Theism, Polytheism was excluded and Monotheism established by the law of parsimony. In 1862 a "vert" who had come to Old Hall, lost his faith by reading Mill, and Ward vainly tried to bring him back. He learnt incidentally that Mill already cherished the curious belief in a finite and, on the whole, adorable Demiurgos, which puzzled his admirers when it was divulged in his posthumous essays. Mill, it is pleasant to know, fully appreciated the heroic ingenuity of the apologue of the philosophical mice who live in a piano and collect evidence that it plays itself. He also recognised the famous theory of "anti-impulsive effort" as a real contribution to psychology, though it did not disturb his confidence in "determinism." Mr. Ward has taken much discreet pains to state as exactly as possible how far his father's victories over Mill and Bain carry the reader on the road to Rational Theism. Unfortunately, the prolixity of his method left him no time to deal with the evolutionist form of Agnosticism. His extreme pertinacity and thoroughness, which imprisoned him for years in one contested question after another, limited his influence as a constructive thinker: others, with incomparably less penetration and precision and no greater depth, made a more general, perhaps a more lasting, impression. It may be he will be remembered after all chiefly as a melancholy humorist, who explained that he could not like his horses any more than his pills, and used to invite his friends to see him knock up half a dozen in an hour because he would not or could not learn to rise in his stirrups, and told one of his pupils as he turned back from a ditch, which his groom assured him he was well able to clear, that he was "an example of faith without hope"; who jested with Faber as to how a pious second-hand bookseller should spend eternity, and agreed at last that when he had done binding the book of life he might catalogue the angels. They nearly quarrelled on the question whether, as Faber held, a sinner could be absolved who honestly thought he was sorry (though not from the highest motives) for what he had done, or whether, as Ward and Newman held, it was necessary that he should reach the further point of really meaning not to do it again.

G. A. SIMCOX.

Fleet Street Eclogues. By John Davidson.
(Elkin Mathews & John Lane.)

THERE is no shepherding done in Fleet Street, nor do newspaper men talk in eclogues. But this little book is aptly named, and by none will its unquestionable charm be more keenly felt than by journalists. For they, more than most men, live a double life. Their calling exacts from them a day-to-day attention to what one ambitious member of their class calls "the progress of the world"; but they are conscious—the best of them, at any rate, are—that the vanities in their work are more abounding than the verities. The vanities are the foam at the top—the reputations of yesterday, the sensations of to-day; the verities are the things which it is of little use to write about in newspapers, for neither the man in the street nor the man on the rail will read them. One of the trio of pressmen in Mr. Davidson's first eclogue says:

"Ambition, and passion, and power
Come out of the north and the west,
Every year, every day, every hour,
Into Fleet Street to fashion their best:
They would shape what is noble and wise:
They must live by a traffic of lies."

Perhaps this is putting the fact strongly, but as so put it is the more easily realised.

An age of talk is necessarily an age of print; and only an infinitesimal part of the talk deserves to be recorded, only a many-millionth part of the record will survive as history. There is another side to the story, of course, and the journalist who magnifies his office does so by the clearest right in the world. Without his aid, though the truth were spoken, it would seldom be heard; and though noble lives were lived and great things done, the world would know little about them. Were it not for his valiant pen, things evil would often pass for things that are good, and all manner of moral and intellectual bondages would make the horizon of life narrow and dim. But let Mr. Davidson expound this other side:

"Nor are we warriors giftless:
Deep magic's in our stroke;
Ours are the shoes of swiftness:
And ours the darkling cloak:
We fear no golden charmer;
We dread no form of words;
We wear enchanted armour,
We wield enchanted swords."

The great charm of the book consists in the happy rural note which is struck on almost every page, and with so much effect that it disperses the gloom of a typical Fleet-street haunt. A trio or quartet of pressmen talk with the frankness of their tribe about things that concern them—mostly with a grim recognition of their true worth and meaning. But ever and anon breaks in, from one or other, some allusion to far-off hills and valleys, to sights and sounds in the green country: and one feels that the dismal surroundings are at once transfigured. Fleet Street becomes a place of song; the outer fog is lifted; the inner stuffiness is exchanged for a fragrance of the fields; and these much-knowing and adventurous men talk a simple language, as unlike the vernacular they write as Fleet Street in its prosaic moods is unlike this transfigured region. In the first eclogue, which is called "New Year's Day," the conversation turns on the dark side of newspapers. They are "dragons that hide the sun." But Basil interrupts an eloquent passage of detraction, which is spoken by Brian, with the remark:

"Through the opening gate of the year Sunbeams and snowdrops peer."

Brian is not quite silenced. He still insists:

"These dragons I say have doomed Religion and poetry."

Sandy, however, moved thereto by Basil's happier mood, disposes of the dragon theory in lines of great force and beauty:

"They may doom till the moon forsakes
Her dark, star-daisied lawn;
They may doom till doomsday breaks
With angels to trumpet the dawn;
While love enchants the young,
And the old have sorrow and care,
No song shall be unsung,
Unprayed no prayer."

In another eclogue, which marks the advance of the year to Good Friday, it is Brian who strikes the first rustic note—

"... give me words
Of meadow-growth and garden plot,
Of larks and blackcaps"—

but it is Menzies who sustains it best, in a delightful rural picture of which these stanzas contain part, and only part :

- "The osier-peelers - ragged bands—
In osier-holts their business ply;
Like strokes of silver, willow wands
On river banks a-bleaching lie.
- "The patchwork sunshine nets the lea;
The flitting shadows halt and pass;
Forlorn, the mossy humble-bee
Lounges along the flowerless grass.
- "With unseen smoke as pure as dew,
Sweeter than love or lovers are,
Wood-violets of watchet hue
Their secret hearths betray afar."

We hope it is permissible to take one more extract—there are many more one would like to take—from this delightful book. The year has worked round to November; and Basil bids one of his complaining friends "be out of London," in a passage which is a perfect etching, in words, of a winter picture :

- "Be out of London; off!
Command your soul; away,
Where woods their wardrobes doff
To give the wind free play.
Brocaded oak trees wait,
Reluctant to undress;
But the woods accept from Fate
Their lusty nakedness,
And with a many-armed caress
Welcome their stormy mate."

It is needless to insist on the merit of such verse as this. The passages quoted speak for themselves, and for the whole book. To the facility and fancy that were so conspicuous in Scaramouch, there is here added a perfectly natural touch. An odour of violets, a gleam of primroses, a breath of the hills and trees greet us in these pages. And as though this were not enough, Mr. Davidson lavishly throws in, at the end of the volume, a tragic ballad of singular power and beauty. In its kind, indeed, this is perhaps the most memorable volume of the year.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

The Refounding of the German Empire, 1848—1871. By Col. G. B. Malleon. (Seeley.)

THIS addition to "Events of Our Own Time," from Col. Malleon's accomplished pen, is worthy of a very good series. His judgments on men and things, indeed, are sometimes, perhaps, rather too absolute; his portraits are, occasionally, too crudely drawn; and we shall challenge a few of his statements. But his narrative of the memorable series of events, which he has called the "Refounding of the German Empire," is, in the main, singularly instructive and just; his delineation of the chief personages, who played conspicuous parts in that great drama, is, usually, lifelike and correct; his historical point of view, as a rule, is true; and his style is pleasing, if not always accurate. As for his description of the gigantic wars which heralded this new birth of time, we think he has dwelt too much on mere battles, and not enough on large operations in the field—the most valuable parts of the military art; but his sketches of battles are generally good. On the whole, considering his very narrow limits, this little volume deserves much praise. It is more useful than many a big book on the subject. The misprints, however, are far too numerous; and there are some mistakes that are hardly errors of the press. For instance, (p. 10) "1811" should be 1813, with reference to Frederick William of Prussia; (p. 12) June 20, 1792, not June 20, "1791," was the date of the rising of the mob of Paris; (p. 42) a gun is loaded at the breech, and not at the "breach"; (p. 90) "frowning" mistrust, we suppose, is in the stead of growing; (p. 109) "struggling against" means struggling for; (p. 141 note) Italians should stand for "Italian regiments"; (p. 189) "Tobitschan" should be Tobitschau; (p. 235) we have never seen the Geisberg spelled the "Gaisberg"; (p. 237) there was no "Fifth" Bavarian Corps in the German Army: the Second Bavarian is probably meant; (p. 239) the Second Army should be read for the "Second Army Corps"; (p. 279) the Crown Prince, and not "Prince Frederick Charles," commanded the Third Army and the Army of the Meuse; (p. 282) "Buzaney" should be Buzancy; and (p. 283) "Terron" Tourteron. Then, again (p. 2), the Emperor Francis did not "yield the Ionian Islands to France" at Campo Formio, for they were not his to yield; (p. 44) it is hardly English to write that "Turkey appealed from the dictates of the Czar"; (p. 80) Francis Joseph did not endeavour to win the consent of a "nephew" in 1863-4; and (p. 124) "mathematically improbable" is a false expression. A writer, too, of Col. Malleon's stamp should not use such words as "recuperate" and "solidarity," the one American, the other French; and even "mobilisation" is a bad exotic. We refer to these blemishes, however, in no carping spirit; we wish to direct the author's attention to them.

Col. Malleon's view of the paramount causes that produced the modern German Empire is, in our opinion, well conceived and accurate. The principle of nationality was the underlying force; but a purely personal element was the most powerful factor. The Empire was the work of Bismarck, Moltke, and Roon, more or less directed by King William, who is, we think, rather underrated in this work; and but for these three men it would not have been formed. Great men, indeed, not "movements," or abstractions of the kind, have constructed the continent of this age. But for Radetski, Nicholas, and Felix Schwarzenberg, Austria would have succumbed in 1848-50; Cavour created modern Italy; and Mazzini and his tongue-valiant patriots, and the philosophers of the Frankfort Assembly, did little for Italian or German unity. Bismarck, beyond dispute, was the master spirit who called into being the Teutonic Empire; and Col. Malleon's portrait of this bold man, if somewhat harsh in outline, is true and lifelike. The minister, indeed, of King William did not, probably, go as straight to his work as he is said to have done in these pages; he perhaps temporised and paused a good deal, but his policy and aims are clearly described. Bismarck was a man of fraud and lying as well as of blood and iron; he was the scheming fox as well as the lion; and it remains to be seen—for the moral government of the world is, after all, a fact—whether the work he accomplished will be enduring. No one can doubt, however, that from first to last his policy was able, and even masterly, if utterly unscrupulous, false, and shameless. He set before himself distinctly the object of breaking up the Germanic system, of driving Austria out of her place of power, and of making Prussia the head of a united Germany—the phrase, however, is not correct; and how he compassed his ends is well told in this book. He took care to secure the alliance of Russia, as a support for Prussia in any event, and this was his policy through his whole season of power. He cajoled and even befooled Napoleon III., who certainly did not take his measure, and paralysed France at the right moment. He then set Austria cleverly against the Federal States in the affair of Schleswig Holstein in 1864; picked a quarrel with her when the pear was ripe; duped his confiding master and made him draw the sword; and fell on her when ill-prepared, with a more powerful army, having made Italy an accomplice in the deed. The result justified his expectations; yet Col. Malleon has hardly pointed out fully how fearfully hazardous was Bismarck's conduct. All Germany was against Prussia when she went to war; and had Eugene of Savoy or the Archduke Charles been in the place of Benedek in Bohemia, Austria would not have been conquered in three weeks: nay, Prussia might have been blotted out as a State. The gambling of Bismarck and his brute force were very inferior to the wisdom of Cavour.

We must pass over Col. Malleon's sketch of the reorganisation of the armed strength of Prussia: it is rapid and slight, but not superficial. He has not attempted to assign their exact parts to Roon and Moltke in this great work of reform; but Roon had most to do with constructing the machine, and Moltke with preparing its action. Nor can we dwell on the petty Danish war, though the prelude to the great war that followed. Col. Malleon describes well, on the whole, the nature and course of the short contest between Prussia and the Lesser States in 1866. It is a notable example how a small force, if ably directed, with a settled purpose, may prevail over large and ill-led armies. In his account of the great campaign in Bohemia Col. Malleon omits a good deal on which we could wish to have had his judgment. For instance, what is his view of Moltke's advance on double and widely distant lines, while Benedek was on the march from Olmütz; and does he think that the Austrian chief missed a grand opportunity to defeat his enemy? In this, however, as in other instances, Col. Malleon rather avoids strategy; and yet strategy is, in every war, the one part of it that has permanent interest. In one of his general views we venture to differ decidedly from his opinion. He approves of Moltke's direction of Prince Frederick Charles and Herwarth into the heart of Bohemia before the Crown Prince began his march; and this, doubtless, proved, in the event, successful. But had Benedek been a real general this very movement should have been disastrous; it exposed the Prussian armies to be beaten in detail, and, indeed, as Col. Malleon admits, it might have placed the Crown Prince in the gravest danger. Col. Malleon accepts the conclusions of the Austrian court, that Clam Gallas was not much to blame. But few impartial writers will agree with him; and for our part, we think that Benedek ought, to have drawn him from the Iser sooner than he did, and, employing him to cover his left wing, have fallen with his centre and right on the Crown Prince. Col. Malleon hardly alludes to the movements which brought on the great fight of Sadowa, but his account of the battle is good and instructive. We think, however, that he rather underrates the difficulties and the distance of the Crown Prince's march; and if he truly points out that the First Army was in considerable danger for some time, he scarcely refers to what, nevertheless, is the judgment of more than one able writer, that Benedek might have attacked with success. He correctly shows that the loss of the battle was caused by the weakened condition of the Austrian centre; but he does not tell us that this was largely due to disregard of Benedek's orders: his 2nd and 4th corps had not kept the positions he had meant them to hold, as is fairly allowed by the Prussian staff.

The story of the relations between France and Prussia which led to the great war of 1870 is very clearly told in this volume; but the subject is generally well known. Col. Malleon does not sufficiently dwell on the efforts made by Napoleon III. to strengthen and improve the French army, rendered fruitless by stupid routine and faction; but he describes fairly enough the Emperor's policy, irritable and weak, and baffled by the guile of Bismarck. He adopts the view of "Scrutator" and of the late Mr. Fyffe, that the immediate cause of the rupture was the Prussian telegram that stirred Paris to frenzy; and if so, the men in power at Berlin were almost criminal in their unprincipled conduct. The war, however, was one that was to happen; it was like the war between Athens and Sparta, and between Carthage and the Roman Republic—the struggle for supremacy of hostile races. Col. Malleon indicates quite correctly how utterly inferior the French army was to that of a united Germany, in numbers, organisation, and military worth; and France could hardly have escaped defeat. He does not, however, as was the case in 1866, refer much to the great operations in the field: whether the French could have made a dash against Steinmetz between July 30 and August 2; how far a great commander could have redressed the balance of fortune against France; why Moltke did not attempt to pursue his routed enemy after Wörth and Spicheren; why the Army of the Rhine was allowed to escape; what Bazaine—given many chances which Napoleon assuredly would have seized—might have done between August 14 and 18; and why the Germans attacked at Mars la Tour—he scarcely alludes to these momentous questions. His descriptions of the battles, however, are fair, though we think him at fault in some particulars. The immense disproportion between the French and the Germans at Wörth is pointed out, and the fight is not incorrectly described; but justice is hardly done to the heroism of the defence; and the attack of the 1st Bavarian Corps, perhaps the decisive stroke, is not mentioned. The account of Spicheren is much too long; and here, again, it is not clearly shown that the appearance of the 13th German division was the true cause of the retreat of Frossard. The description of Mars la Tour is good; but the extraordinary remissness of Bazaine's conduct, who ought to have crushed his foe to atoms, is not placed in sufficient relief; and there is a mistake as to the first attack of the Prussian cavalry. Col. Malleon, however, has narrated Gravelotte very well: he properly ascribes the loss of the battle to the erroneous disposition of the Imperial Guard, a fault of the incapable Bazaine; he shows how bad were the German tactics; and yet we are rather surprised that he does not do more justice to the magnificent efforts of the French right wing.

We cannot praise Col. Malleon's account of the memorable and fatal march to Sedan; it is indistinct, inaccurate, and in parts erroneous. He points out truly, indeed, that this disastrous movement lost to France her only army in the field, and that had this simply fallen back on Paris the issue of the war would have been wholly different. But the operations of Macmahon are not made clear; not a word is said about their extreme recklessness; and in some particulars the narrative is wrong. It was not only Palikao's scheming to save Napoleon's tottering throne, it was also an ambiguous despatch from Bazaine that sent the Army of Châlons to the Meuse; and Macmahon never thought of going near Verdun, his object was to reach Metz from Montmédy. His march—a flank march of the very worst kind and almost certain to end in ruin—is not traced with a firm touch; and its enormous danger is not indicated. On the other hand, the fine arrangements of Moltke are not clearly or fully set forth, especially the detaching of two corps from Metz to co-operate with the Army of the Meuse—a really good strategic movement; and the celebrated interview which preceded this took place on the 24th and not on the 20th of August. Col. Malleon does not examine the question—one of the greatest interest and of supreme importance—whether, had Macmahon been a great chief, he could have escaped on the 31st of August by a bold and rapid march on Mézières, but good judges believe that this might have been done. His sketch of the battle of Sedan is, in the main, correct; but the phases of the struggle should have been more distinctly marked. In one important point he is, we are convinced, mistaken: the Germans "before Sedan" could not have been "240,000 men all told"; this estimate includes the 6th corps, many leagues away, and far to the west, and the Würtembergers, who were storming Mézières; and it does not make allowance for the immense losses incurred at Wörth, and, above all, at Gravelotte. We notice this because we were the first to point out Moltke's grotesque mistake—we shall not use a more harsh epithet—as to the numbers of the armies engaged at Gravelotte; and Col. Malleon, we hope, will correct this error. The "carelessness as to the discovery of truth," charged by the great Athenian on the historians of his day, is conspicuous in most narratives of the war of 1870.

In his sketch of the second part of the war Col. Malleon takes the true point of view; and his broad conclusions are essentially just. He repudiates the shallow and cynical notion that France and Paris ought to have laid down their arms, and submitted to the yoke of the conqueror: this would have been worthy of the Prussia of Jena. He equally scorns the offensive judgment repeatedly found in Moltke's book, that France was driven into the field by noisy demagogues; this is the philosophy of the Yorks and the Cobourgs; and Moltke was very nearly made sorry for it. Col. Malleon, too, does ample justice to the energy and organising powers of Gambetta. Wrongheaded as that remarkable personage was, he was, nevertheless, a man of genius; and the hatred and terror he inspired in Germany affords the measure of his extraordinary gifts. But Col. Malleon evidently lacked space when he came to deal with this part of his work; he scarcely notices passages of the first importance. For instance, while he points out how fatal to France was the surrender of Metz before the due time, he hardly dwells on the guilt of Bazaine, and we do not believe that the sortie at Noisseville was a vigorous or even a sincere effort. We are surprised that he does not bring out more fully the admirable resource and skill of Chanzy. The retreat of that great warrior from the Loire to the Sarthe was an operation of the finest kind; and the stand he made at Le Mans makes it hardly doubtful that, had he been in command at Gravelotte, the Germans would have been well beaten, immense as was their superiority of force. Col. Malleon—and we fully agree with him—has little faith that the new German Empire will have the stability and endurance of that of the great Charles. The two structures, in fact, have little in common: the one, in the main, marks the triumph of order and law in a barbarian age; the other is a creation of force and fraud, tricked out in fine names that are not true. Prussia rules Germany by the power of the sword, and she has a Poland on the Rhine as well as on the Vistula. Her annexation of Alsace and Lorraine has brought about that league between Russia and France, unwritten perhaps but not the less real, which may yet realise Napoleon's words and make the continent half Republican and half Cossack. The memories, too, of the wars of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries make it very unlikely that the German race will hold together for a great length of time; and France may find again a Richelieu or Mazarin, a Turenne or Napoleon.

THE JUBILEE OF THE FREE CHURCH.

Thomas Chalmers: Preacher, Philosopher, and Statesman. By Mrs. Oliphant. (Methuen.)

The Free Church of Scotland: her Origin, Founders, and Testimony. By Peter Bayne, LL.D. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.)

Scotland's Free Church. By George Buchanan Ryley and John M. McCandlish. (Archibald Constable & Co.)

THE publication of these three books has no doubt been suggested by this year's celebration of the jubilee of the Free Church of Scotland. Mr. Bayne's work, in particular, is the complement to Mrs. Oliphant's. Mrs. Oliphant is an enthusiastic admirer of Chalmers; but she does not look at the work of his later years quite from the Free Church standpoint. Mr. Bayne writes with all the old-fashioned fervour, and even in the old-fashioned style, of a "Disruption Worthy." To him Chalmers is much, but the Free Church is ever so much more. The essentially detached literary artist dominates Mrs. Oliphant's book; the earnest partisan dominates Mr. Bayne's.

Mrs. Oliphant's volume, however, is not one that will add to the literary reputation of its author. It is—it could not fail to be—a piece of bookmaking. To the extent of three-fourths it is Hanna, whose Life of Chalmers is a final and almost faultless work. The remaining fourth is not Mrs. Oliphant at her best. The very capacities which have made her a success in fiction fail her here. She excels in the patient delineation of family life, in presenting the environment of men and women and its influence upon their character and conduct. Here she has virtually no opportunity of showing this art—a power in which she is without a rival even among the younger novelists of the time. Chalmers was one of those men who are possessed immediately after their first appearance in public life by some public, or at least extra-personal, enthusiasm. Chalmers in particular was governed by a series of such enthusiasms. In spite of a curious little incident of an emotional kind, which was divulged in his last years, and of which Mrs. Oliphant certainly makes the most, Chalmers would appear to have had no youthful escapades of the ordinary type, no affairs of the heart.

"He had an excellent wife," Mrs. Oliphant says, almost with a sigh, "congenial to him in every way, a woman who kept his path smooth and entered into his plans and thoughts; and that is all we know of her—everything, it is true, that is necessary, but yet nothing at all. His family consisted entirely of daughters, for whom he had a preference (as is said) over sons—but neither do we know anything of them."

Had Chalmers's wife and children in some fashion or other interfered with the gratification of his ambition, or rather of his aspirations, had Mrs. Chalmers failed her husband as "Charlotte" failed Scott, how well Mrs. Oliphant would have told the story! As it is, she is seen at her best—or at all events such of her best as she allows to be exhibited here at all—in her treatment of the strength and weakness of Chalmers's temperament, his fervour and also his impatience. For the rest, she is not so well qualified to tell the story of Chalmers's public life as many a Free Church minister with not one-fiftieth of her literary ability, but familiar with that Spiritual Independence of which she knows little and about which she cares less. Up to the point when what has come to be known as the Ten Years' Conflict (which resulted in the formation of the Free Church) commenced, her book is as satisfactory as a digest or compilation of the kind can well be. She gives a good portrait of the fiery, yet essentially practical, young Scot, who gave some anxiety to his five parents; who, when a tutor, vindicated his independence against an insolent (or at least thoughtless) employer; who even bearded the university authorities in St. Andrews; who, in fact, all through his life submitted with the utmost difficulty to opposition; who met with great success in his professional career—he was beyond all question the first preacher of his time in Scotland, if not in Great Britain—but who never lost his head. Mrs. Oliphant further gives a good representation of Chalmers engaged in what he will probably remember longest by—his "territorial" work among the poor in Glasgow. As a preacher, as the author of the once celebrated Astronomical Discourses, perhaps even as the founder of the Free Church, he may be forgotten. But he will be long remembered for having anticipated modern methods of dealing with the problem of poverty in great cities.

It is positively refreshing to come across a book so full of genuine, if also antiquated, enthusiasm as Mr. Peter Bayne's on the origin of the Free Church. It beats even that of Mr. Ryley and Mr. McCandlish, who, between them, and with the help of really exquisite type, paper, and illustrations, have produced what may be termed a jubilee gift-book. Mr. Ryley and Mr. McCandlish are no doubt very good Free Churchmen. Mr. Ryley describes the Disruption as "that great act of conscientiousness and sacrifice in 1843 that made eminent Scotchmen 'proud of their country' and added fresh nobility to the Christian world by the new impulse it gave to allegiance to Jesus"; and Mr. McCandlish endeavours, and with great success, by the aid of financial and other statistics, to demonstrate the extraordinary progress made by the new body during the past half century. But their volume is much more occupied with the history of Scotland, from the ecclesiastical point of view, before the Disruption than with the Free Church. It is, in fact, a manual of the ecclesiastical history of Scotland from the Disruption standpoint. As such, it is well worth reading, in virtue of its accuracy, its lucidity, and (in spite of its inevitable bias) its moderation in tone. But whoever desires to see the Free Church movement and the founders of the Free Church as these seemed to observers that happened also to be approvers and admirers, should read Mr. Bayne's book. He looks at Chalmers, Candlish, Cunningham, Guthrie, Buchanan, and Begg, through the spectacles of, say, Hugh Miller. He admires the "Disruption Worthies" as the first German Protestants admired Luther and Melancthon. It would be easy to find fault with Mr. Bayne's book: here and there it is eloquent even to the verge of turgidity. But he never sinks the man of letters altogether in the adorer or the partisan. Let his book be regarded then as a vote of thanks, as toasting the Pious and (possibly) Immortal Memory of the Free Church Founders.

Yet, when all this is allowed, most readers of the volumes of Mrs. Oliphant, Mr. Bayne, and Mr. Ryley, can hardly help thinking of the future rather than of the past. In what position fifty years hence will be that communion which even now is less the Church of Spiritual Independence and of Chalmers, Candlish, and Cunningham, than of the new (and Germanised) learning, of Prof. Bruce, of Prof. Dods, and above all of Mr. Henry Drummond, who has performed the extraordinary feat of securing for his version of modern Scottish religion a larger circulation than that attained even by modern Scottish fiction, who is indeed the rose in the buttonhole of present day Presbyterianism?

"CLAW for claw, and the devil take the shortest nails," as Conan said to the Devil." We are not aware whether Dr. Conan Doyle traces his lineage to the redoubtable hero of this famous proverb, but we hardly know anyone else at the present day who might engage in a fight with a person not much less formidable in his own line than the devil on similar terms. The Refugees is almost the true Dumas—all the more so that it has the defects as well as the merits of the master. If it had not been that "the young men," whenever they attempted independent work, always failed completely, we should really think that Dr. Doyle had come upon a cache of private work by Auguste Maquet or Octave Feuillet, written when they were under the charm. There is hardly any direct imitation—the nearest approach to it is the prison-breaking of the castle of Portilhac, which doth something smack of a similar proceeding at Rueil. But the whole method, the whole facture, is right Alexander except in one point. Dr. Doyle has not succeeded—as his master, rarely but sometimes, did—in drawing a man. There is no Porthos, no D'Artagnan, no La Mole even here; and as for Athos—but Athos was made once in heaven, and they broke that mould. We do not care in the least for Catinat; why will Dr. Doyle call him "De" Catinat? His master spoke of D'Artagnan because it is usual before the vowel, but he never speaks of "de" Coconnas or "de" Saint Aignan; while as for "De Maintenon" and "De Montespan" as women, "it is to make shudder." Amos Green is rather a trouble: some compound of Voltaire's L'Ingénu and of that dreadful Tarvin, who, had it been possible, would have spoilt The Naulahka. "De" Montespan is not a live creature beside her younger self Tonnay-Charente (fancy de Tonnay-Charente!) when she vied with la Vallière and Montalais—Aura, veni! as thou camest thirty years ago in thirteen little grubby Belgian volumes hired from Rolandi's! But the things they all do, and the way they all do it, are simply beyond praise. There are those, we believe, who regret the change from Paris to the backwoods: not so we. It is all good: would it were as long as the Vicomte de Bragelonne itself! And it is quite astonishing to see how, without the least touch of plagiarism, save in very little matters like that above noticed, Dr. Doyle has caught his master's faire. The scene shortly after the opening, when Catinat comes back from Versailles and sees Amos holding the dragonnader by the heels over the balcony, with the subsequent interposition of Condé, is simply miraculous. We are inclined to believe that not Maquet, not Feuillet, not Fiorentino, but Dumas himself wrote it. It is possible to find faults besides those which we have indicated. Adèle need not have been quite such a stick. The friar should have been not drowned but roasted—the Flemish Bastard would have done it excellently, and could have been killed all the same afterwards. Madame de Maintenon has degenerated almost as much as her rival since she came to see Scarron, and Bragelonne saw her; though we are bound to admit that Dr. Doyle has made her a much less contemptible and detestable person even here than our humble reading of all those recent documents—which he thinks have rehabilitated her—bears out. But what does all this matter? Did not the great Alexander himself nod—yea, vehemently? Let the author of The Refugees go on, and, by the bones of Bicarot, he may give us a "Bastion Saint-Gervais" or a "Vin de Porto" itself before he has done!

The present reviewer fears that he ought not to undertake the criticising of any work by Mark Twain. Great men have discovered a great man in the author of The Innocents Abroad and A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur. They must be right, and the present reviewer must be wrong. It is possibly very funny to fill eight mortal pages with the interrogatory of a supposed modern inspector who has to give (and refuses) a certificate to the Ark as a passenger ship. It is possibly very funny to fill nine more with an elaborate "Petition to the Queen of England" to relieve Mark Twain of income-tax on the profits he draws from his English sales. All we can say is that it makes us yawn. We can see fun in Shakspeare and fun in Mr. Stockton; humour in Aristophanes, and Ariosto, and Mr. Anstey; a true japiishness in Rabelais and Richter, in Lucian and Lever, in the Goliardists and in "Gyp." The Tale of a Tub is fun, and the Astonishing History of Troy Town is fun; the laugh comes without effort over Iludibras and Heine, over Calverley and Caran d'Ache. All sorts and conditions of fun there be, and in most, if not all of them, there shall be unfeigned delight. But if there is fun in this volume of Mark Twain's (except a certain faint and overwrought strain of it in the mock romance of "The Enemy Conquered") this reviewer avows himself a conquered enemy. He admits that he does not understand fun, and has no notion of humour.

It may be that the current twist or eddy (to keep up the metaphor of current better) that mistakes laboured eccentricity for humour, is not imperceptible in Mr. Thomas Pinkerton; but there are also other and better gifts in him. It had wanted comparatively little to make of Arnold Bolsover's Love Story rather a brilliant novel. The little is wanting, and the book is something of a nondescript. For one thing, Mr. Pinkerton does not draw with quite sufficient directness from the live model. His figures are cleverly conceived, but they are too much "out of his own head." Biscoe, for instance, the rich brewer, reminds one of a figure of Theodore Hook's. He is not exactly unnatural; but he has a purely conventional naturalness, and, as a matter of fact, the convention is growing a little stale. Bolsover the banker is in something the same plight. Again, the "wrecker" Lenardo is left an entirely incomprehensible figure. Most people who keep their ears open in these days have heard of "wreckers"; but these estimable gentlemen are generally supposed to have a distinct and obvious interest in these performances; and what Mr. Lenardo could gain by bringing down Bolsover's bank is the very reverse of obvious. The women—Lilias Roy, Rose Dumoulin, Mrs. Sampford—are rather better; and the child Liana is very good of her kind, though we have been, as the rich dissenter said to Coleridge, "overrun with these articles" lately. But, on the whole, the cleverness of the book exceeds its craftsmanship. There are the makings of two or three good novels in it; but there is hardly one made, and the English is sometimes a little odd. What is to be "perspicuous in your choice?" Has it any connexion with being perspicacious?

The last novel that we read of Miss Annie Thomas's made us a little afraid that this well tried practitioner in a certain kind of fiction, who has filled many an empty afternoon for many a novel reader since the days of Denis Donne, was "writing herself out." We were, however, utterly mistaken; for her present venture is quite up to her old level. What that level is cannot be necessary to dwell upon at this time of day. Utterly Mistaken begins with love-making and ends with the making of love; but the persons concerned are not the same, and they are kept in connexion with each other after a sufficiently ingenious fashion. We never like to see an old hand out; and we congratulate Mrs. Cudlip on getting hers in again.

Isaac Eller's Money is an addition to a class of novels which has become rather numerous lately—studies of Jewish life in England. It cannot be said that these studies, whether made from the inside or the out, have usually presented a very pleasant picture of the Chosen People. In Mrs. Dean's book, however, there are no very high lights and no very lurid shadows. The worship of nothing particular, except the Golden Calf, and the observance of no very exquisite standard of taste and manners, are the chief crimes charged against the Eller and Goldberg families, the latter of which does not behave more cruelly or insolently to Barbara Lassen, the poor cousin who has copper hair and sapphire eyes, than Christians or ordinary women might. The success of the book, which is something more than a small success, lies in the figure of a certain Bruno Klein—a by no means bad little man who paints a little, writes a little, has more than a little money, and a vast deal more than a little opinion of himself. If not new in class, Klein is sufficiently differentiated in individuality.

It would be cruel to say much about the first story in the last number of Arrow-smith's Library. "B. M. Vere" has almost everything to learn in novel-writing—chronology, the dialect used by Irish moonlighters, the proportion of deaths permissible in an ordinary story, the way in which live people talk. "A Chef d'œuvre," on the other hand, though not a masterpiece, is a very fair average attempt.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Greek Poets. By J. A. Symonds. Third Edition. (A. & C. Black.) It was the happiness of the late Mr. Symonds to give as readily as he received. All his studies of Greek poets have one common merit: they are fresh and satisfying accounts of books which few of his readers or hearers have the leisure to read for themselves. Often, too, there is something even for these few. No critic has done such justice to the "radiance" of Euripides, though he is perhaps a little overloath to admit that there was a shabby side both to his pathos and to his cleverness. Like Aristophanes, he often played to the large class whom most writers on Greek art and letters too readily style the class which never engaged in sound domestic education. The suggestion that Sparta imported lyric poetry, as England used to import oratorios, is decidedly illuminating. The essay on mythology did a good deal to clear the air when it first appeared, and is not obsolete now. Mr. Symonds hardly said the last word or exactly the right word about the comedy of Aristophanes; but at least he saw with one eye in a country where most are blind. The most personal thing in the book is the writer's sympathetic curiosity about the side of Greek life which finds no place in Christendom. He does not regret it; it is the exception when he condemns it, as in the comparatively early essay on the Anthology. Generally his attitude suggests the young and wise Telemachus patronising poor Circe in her ruined bower. It would not be easy to find in English such a handy account of the history of the Anthology or of the different species of Greek epigrams, all equally adapted to be written up in public: the hortatory epigram would be in place on the pedestals of Hermae, the amatory might be hung up with garlands at the door of the beloved, the satirical might be left behind them by a party of revellers going round at night at the door of whoever they wished to insult. The present edition is enriched with a lively paper on Herondas, more entertaining—even to scholars who do not want to emend him—than the obscure and fragmentary original. It is enlarged by several additional translations. Perhaps the most remarkable is the following from Theognis (pp. 237-254). The original always reminded Mr. Symonds of Shakspeare's most pompous sonnets:

"Lo, I have given plumes wherewith to skim
The unfathomed deep, and lightly hover around Earth's huge circumference. Thou shalt be found
At banquets on the breath of paeon and hymn:
To shrill-voiced pipes with lips of seraphim Lovely young men thy rapturous fame shall sound;
Yea, when thou liest lapped in the noiseless ground,
Thy name shall live, nor shall oblivion dim Thy dawn of splendour. For these lands, these isles,
These multitudinous waves of refluant seas,
Shall be thy pleasure-ground where through to come,
Borne on thy steed, but wafted by the smiles
Of Muses violet-crowned, whose melodies, While earth endures, shall make all earth thy home."

Otherwise there is very little change. No attempt has been made to fuse the essays on the drama, which overlap a good deal. Even the oversight (probably due to over-diligence in consulting Pindar at first hand), which led Mr. Symonds to say that Aristophanes was "preserved in his integrity," is left uncorrected. In future editions it might be desirable to give the dates of the different studies, which have been arranged for the first time in the chronological order of their subjects.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have added to their "English Classics" an annotated edition of Macaulay's famous essay on Warren Hastings, by Mr. K. Deighton. Like other volumes of the series, it seems to be intended primarily for the use of native students in Indian colleges; and to this we must attribute the otiose paraphrases of familiar words, and the worse than otiose philological notes. It is not often that the editor commits actual mistakes; but we have noticed one blunder of the worst kind. In his account of the early days of Hastings, Macaulay says: "The boy went up to London, and was sent to school at Newington." We should have thought it sufficiently clear to anyone that Newington Butts was intended; and so the place is written in full in Gleig's Life. But Mr. Deighton must needs append in a note, "Newington, a small town in Kent, about forty miles from London." Indeed, we do not find any indications that he has read Gleig's Life, which, despite Macaulay's not undeserved censure of its method, must always remain the standard authority for many of the facts. Other useful books which do not seem to have been consulted are: Sir Elijah Impey's Life by his son—which would have saved Mr. Deighton from saying that Hastings and Impey were of the same age; Dr. Busteed's Echoes from Old Calcutta (second edition, 1888)—a storehouse of curious information about Hastings and Francis; and Mr. H. Beveridge's elaborate, though not conclusive, rejoinder to Sir J. Stephen, entitled The Trial of Nanda Kumar (Calcutta, 1886). But it would be unjust not to add that Mr. Deighton has made good use of the better known volumes on the subject

—the recent Lives by Sir Alfred Lyall and by Captain Trotter, the special treatises of Sir James Stephen and Sir John Strachey, and the records of Hastings's administration edited by Prof. G. W. Forrest. From these materials he has compiled three appendices on Nuncomar, the Rohilla War, and Sir Elijah Impey, which fairly represent the present trend of opinion on those controversial subjects. In conclusion, we would draw attention to a point of some literary interest. Twice in his essay on Warren Hastings, Macaulay plagiarises from his own "Lays of Ancient Rome," written earlier, though not yet published. We subjoin the prose passages only, assuming that the corresponding verses will be in the minds of all our readers. In his description of Haidar Ali's devastation of the Carnatic, he says:

"The English inhabitants of Madras could already see by night, from the top of Mount St. Thomas, the eastern sky reddened by a vast semicircle of blazing villages."

And again, when depicting Indian scenes as vividly present to the imagination of Burke, he talks of:

"The bazars humming like bee-hives with the crowd of buyers and sellers."

The first quotation embodies an odd misprint, which has never been corrected. Macaulay had visited Madras; but it needs no typographical knowledge to realise that blazing villages inland would not be best seen by looking seaward.

Finnish Legends for English Children. By R. Eivind. (Fisher Unwin.) This is a very pleasant and readable rendering for those who do not care for the somewhat faulty metrical translations which have hitherto appeared of the Kalevala. The Legends consist of the adventures of our old friends Wainamoinen, Semminkainen, Ilmarinen, and a host of other Kalevalic heroes and heroines. They include the forging and losing of the Sampo (the magic mill that could grind out flour, salt, money, and good luck at the same time); the stealing of the sun and moon by Souhi; the making of the Kantele or Finnish Harp from the bones of the giant Pike; wooings, fightings, and weddings, and the creation of the world by a Lady and a Duck. The tales are supposed to be told by an old Finnish travelling merchant, Pappa Mikko, who is storm-bound at a farm, to a little girl, Mimi, and her brother Antero. Though not to be compared with the Arabian Nights or Hans Andersen, there is plenty of the marvellous in this little work; and we trust our young friends will enjoy the prose version of the fifth epic of the world as much as we did. There is a capital table for the pronunciation of proper names, and there are seven illustrations which (although they have not much to do with the Legends) are excellent pictures of Finnish life. Of course, in a translation mistakes will occur; and we trust that such strange phrases as "rocks back and forth," p. 56, "the next day it was still storming," p. 84, and "when he was through" (for "when he had finished") p. 101, as well as the grammatical slip "thou may not," on p. 108, will disappear in a future edition.

Great Characters of Fiction. Edited by M. E. Townsend. (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.) The papers which compose this volume are so gracefully and sympathetically written that one does not like to speak of the book in terms that savour of depreciation; but it is impossible to regard it with feelings of entire complacency. Had it really fulfilled its title, no fair exception could have been taken to it; for a series of genuine character-studies would doubtless have done something to give young people an intellectual as well as a purely emotional interest in the literature of great fiction. The twenty papers collected here are, however, simply summaries of very well-known novels, which may be perused much more profitably, as well as much more pleasurably, in their complete form than in a necessarily bald and inadequate synopsis, from which all the purely literary charm of the original work has, of course, vanished. The editor is of opinion that her own essays and those of her collaborators will, in each case, induce young readers "to study the work for themselves, without telling enough of the story to spoil its interest, if, perchance, they are not acquainted with it." Could we share this opinion, the force of our censure would be largely broken, though we should still doubt whether it were really necessary to "induce" any ordinary girl to read such books as The Newcomes, David Copperfield, Westward Ho! Adam Bede, or Wives and Daughters. As a matter of fact, however, nearly every one of the score of stories laid under contribution is summarised with a fullness which, for the majority of young readers, will rob the book itself of at least three-fourths of its attractiveness; and they will simply say, "What is the use of reading a book when I know all about the story?" Of course there may be, and probably is, a wiser minority to whom these pleasantly-written papers will serve as appetisers; but we take it for granted that the editor and her colleagues have done their work with the idea of profiting young people in general and not merely a select few. That history, philosophy, science, and criticism should be presented in Liebig extracts is, we suppose, more or less inevitable; but we must say that in the case of popular fiction we see no necessity whatever for a boiling-down process, such as that which has its result in the present volume. Nor does it seem to us that the adjective in the title is at all adequately justified by the selection made. Agnes Wickfield, Amyas Leigh, John Halifax, and Molly Gibson, to name only four out of a possible ten, are characters who are in various ways interesting or attractive; but we do not think it would occur to anyone but the writers of this volume to describe them as "great." Indeed, with every wish to do justice to the work of ladies to whose own books of fiction we owe many pleasant hours, we find it impossible to commend a volume which, had it no other defects, would at any rate have the grave defect of obvious superfluity.

Rhyming Legends of Ind. By H. Kirkwood Gracey. (Thacker.) Anglo-Indians, from Warren Hastings down to Sir Alfred Lyall, have often solaced their exile with the practice of verse-writing. But they have not yet produced a professional poet. For genuine feeling and technical accomplishment, we know of none to surpass Henry Derozio, an East Indian of Portuguese descent, who died in 1830, at the early age of twenty-one. An interesting life of him, with extracts from his poetry, was written by Mr. Thomas Edwards (Calcutta, 1884). In the vein of satirical humour, which Anglo-Indians chiefly affect, perhaps the most successful effort is Lays of Ind., by an Hussar officer who wrote under the name of "Aliph Cheem." Mr. Gracey has chosen to adopt the irregular metres and rhyming tour de force of the author of "The Ingoldsby Legends." Here is an example:

"In those days were no trials
With intricate files;
No orders of court
And that sort of sport;
No charge was read out, no jury empanelled,
Nor vengeance by codes of procedure entrammelled.
No havildar came from a neighbouring police station
To do nothing and call it an investigation;
No witness was asked for a truthful narration
Of facts that had birth but in imagination,

Then questioned and bullied and coaxed by vakeels

Till he cannot distinguish his head from his heels;

No! Justice was short and there lay no appeals."

By the way, an author who styles himself B.A. on his title-page should not twice scan "marital" as though the penultimate were short.

A Life of Love and Duty. Being a Memoir of Commodore Goodenough. Edited by his Widow. (S.P.C.K.) Few can have forgotten the thrill that ran through England in 1875, when the excellent Commodore Goodenough, like Bishop Patteson, fell a victim to the faithless natives of Santa Cruz. His life of simple duty well deserved telling, and the heroism which the crew of the Pearl exhibited at the time of the fatal affray forms a striking setting to its sad ending.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH is engaged upon a work dealing, in two volumes, with the Political History of the United States. The first volume will probably be published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co., in the course of the autumn.

The Ancestors of our Future Queen is the title of a little volume by Mr. Louis Felbermann, author of "Hungary and its People," which will be published immediately by Messrs. Griffith, Farran & Co. The book, which will be dedicated by special permission to the Duke of Teck, deals with the history of the Duke's ancestry on the maternal side, which is traced back to Samuel Aba, who married the sister of St. Stephen, and subsequently became the King of Hungary. It will contain reproductions of family portraits, relics, and mementoes, from the collection at White Lodge.

It is announced that Miss Marie Corelli has just finished a new novel, which will be called Nehemiah P. Hoskins, Artist: a Faithful Study of Fame.

MR. WILLIAM WINTER has been entrusted with the task of writing a biography of the late Edwin Booth. There will be a special edition, containing portraits of the actor in the principal characters in which he used to appear.

MR. ALEXANDER GARDNER, of Paisley, has in the press a realistic record of a soldier's experiences in the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny, which will be entitled At the Front, by One who was There.

In his series of "Climbers' Guides," Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish immediately The Mountains of the Cogne Range, by Mr. George Yeld, and the Rev. W. A. B. Coolidge, the latter of whom is one of the two general editors of the series.

UNDER the title of Our Country, Mr. Elliot Stock will issue immediately a volume containing forty biographical sketches, with portraits, of prominent men of Northamptonshire. The literary part of the book is by Mr. W. Ryland D. Adkins; the portraits by W. B. Shoosmith.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRUBNER & Co. will publish immediately an illustrated treatise on Labour Saving Machinery, and its effect in the displacement of manual labour in various industries, by Mr. James Samuelson.

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS will shortly publish a sixpenny edition of Charles Reade's It is Never too Late to Mend.

MESSRS. JAMES BLACKWOOD & Co. announce the following:—James Ingleton; the History of a Social State. A.D. 2000, by Mr. Dick; A Man of Mystery, by Mrs. Harcourt-Roe; and Lady Glenroy; or, The Mystery in the Moonlight, by George McKeand.

AT a general meeting of the new society, formed for publishing works relating to the navy, held on Tuesday, July 4, the Marquis of Lothian in the chair, it was resolved that the name be "The Navy Records Society," and its objects were defined to be:—(1) The editing and publication of MSS. illustrating the history, administration, organisation, or social life of the navy; (2) the reprinting of rare or generally inaccessible books of naval interest, and the publication of translations of similar MSS. or works in foreign languages. The annual subscription was fixed at one guinea; that paid by members now joining freeing them to the end of 1894. And the following council was elected: President, Earl Spencer; vice-presidents, Lord George Hamilton, Admiral Sir R. Vesey Hamilton, the Marquis of Lothian, and Prof. J. R. Seeley; secretary: Prof. J. K. Laughton; treasurer: Mr. H. F. R. Yorke; members of council: Prince Louis of Battenberg, the Hon. Henry Bell (Lord Provost of Glasgow), Mr. Walter Besant, Hon. T. H. Brassey, Rear Admiral Bridge, Mr. Oscar Browning, Prof. Montagu Burrows, the Rev. Dr. H. Montagu Butler (Master of Trinity College, Cambridge), Lieut.-Gen. Sir Andrew Clarke, Vice-Admiral Colomb, Admiral Sir Edward Fanshawe, Mr. C. H. Firth, Dr. Garnett, Major-Gen. Geary, Mr. David Hannay, Mr. Sidney Lee, Rear Admiral Sir Lambton Loraine, Sir A. C. Lyall, Mr. Clements R. Markham, Capt. S. P. Oliver, R.A., Commander C. N. Robinson, R.N., Mr. J. R. Thursfield, Capt. W. J. L. Wharton, R.N., Capt. S. Eardley Wilmot, R.N.

THE next monthly meeting of the Library Association of the United Kingdom will be held at 20, Hanover-square, on Monday, July 10, at 8 p.m. The following papers will be read: (1) "A Note on an Indicator Difficulty in Small Libraries," by Mr. Cecil T. Davis, Librarian of the Wandsworth Public Library; (2) "Indicators versus Card-charging; with some reference to the Intercourse between Librarians and Readers," by Mr. Alfred Cotgreave, chief librarian of the West Ham Public Libraries; (3) "The Betting Evil in Public Libraries," by Mr. J. Elliot, librarian of the Wolverhampton Public Library.

WE are glad to see that Messrs. Longmans have begun to issue a cabinet edition of Mr. S. R. Gardiner's History of the Civil War. The great work, of which this is a continuation, began as long ago as 1863, with the early period of the reign of James I. Twenty years later, the ten volumes that carried the story down to the outbreak of the Civil War were published in a cheaper form; and now we are to have, uniform with them, the three volumes in which are described the military operations, the political intrigues, and the execution of the king. There are four coloured maps, and several plans of battlefields. We cannot refrain from quoting the last paragraph of the Preface:—

"I wish it were possible for me to give adequate expression to my sense of the obligation under which I am to Mr. Firth. He has generously allowed me to draw on his vast stores of knowledge concerning the men and things of this period, and has been always ready to discuss with me every point of importance as it arose, often very considerably modifying the opinion at which I had originally arrived."

MR. EUGENE PARSONS, of Chicago, has sent us the second edition, revised and enlarged, of a pamphlet which he first published in April of last year, entitled Tennyson's Life and Poetry. Its object is explained by its second title, which is "Mistakes concerning Tennyson." The author has certainly been most praiseworthy in ascertaining the true facts and dates about the Laureate's life, and he has also succeeded in proving that the ordinary American sources of information are crammed with minor blunders, copied from one another. But he need not have made so much of the misstatement that Tennyson settled in 1869 "at Petersfield, in Hampshire." The house of Aldworth, though actually in Sussex, is very close to the borders of both Surrey and Hampshire; and—though we do not know it as a fact—it is quite possible that Petersfield was at one time the postal address. At the end of the pamphlet is a useful list of translations of Tennyson's works, of which no less than twenty-five are into German. As we have before remarked in the ACADEMY, by far the most popular of Tennyson's poems on the continent is Enoch Arden, of which there are nine versions in German, seven in French, two in Dutch, and one each in Italian, Spanish, Danish, Hungarian, and Bohemian.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

MR. SAMUEL ALEXANDER, of Lincoln College—who won the first Green prize with an essay, afterwards expanded into a volume, on "Moral Order and Progress"—has been appointed to the chair of logic and mental and moral philosophy at Owens College, Manchester, which is vacant by Prof. Adamson's removal to Aberdeen.

PRINCIPAL CAIRD and Prof. Adalbert Merx were not present to receive honorary degrees at Dublin last week. But in addition to those already mentioned in the ACADEMY, the honorary degree of LL.D was conferred upon the Rev. John Hall, and that of Master of Engineering upon Colonel Sir Charles Wilson.

LORD JUSTICE KAY has added £1500 to the sum of £3000 given by him two years ago to Jesus College, Cambridge, for the purpose of endowing studentships in theology, to be called the Lady Kay studentships.

WE have received from the Cambridge syndicate for local lectures a detailed programme of the summer meeting, to be held during August, which is open not only to University Extension students and to teachers, but to any one who holds a certificate showing that he is likely to profit by the instruction given. Prof. Jebb is to deliver the inaugural lecture on the evening of Saturday, July 29, his subject being "The Work of the Universities for the Nation, Past and Present." The course of study is divided into two main sections. One will consist of a series of lectures illustrating the progress and methods of scientific discovery, together with courses of practical work in the university laboratories and museums. Among the single lectures announced are: "John Dalton," by Sir H. E. Roscoe; and "The Astronomical Theory of the Great Ice Age," by Sir R. S. Ball. The other section will consist of lectures intended to give an outline of some of the chief political, economic, social, and literary movements in England and the empire, which have contributed in the recent past to produce the present. For example, Prof. Jebb will lecture on "The Influence of Greek Thought on Modern Life"; Mrs. Henry Fawcett on "The Social Progress of Women during the last Hundred Years"; Prof. H. Sidgwick on "The History of Modern Political Ideas"; and Dr. Verrall on "The Effect of the Classics upon English Literature." In addition, there will be various lectures on art, literature, education, and general subjects. In particular, we may mention that the Rev. Dr. Montagu Butler will lecture on "Some Distinguished Trinity Men of Sixty Years ago," Mr. Edmund Gosse on "The Literary Movement in England during the last Hundred Years," and Vernon Lee on "Landscape, with some reference to Impressionism."

In the advertisement of the examination for scholarships at Trinity College, Oxford, to be held next November, we notice the following clause, which we believe to be novel:

"Candidates may, on entering their names, give notice that they are desirous of obtaining the status without the emoluments of a scholar. If any such candidate is elected to a scholarship, the college will elect to an additional exhibition of equivalent value."

MISS EMILY PENROSE has been appointed principal of Bedford College, London. Mr. Arthur Bernard Cook, of Trinity College, Cambridge, and G. Albert Laundry, late professor of art at Queen Margaret College, Glasgow, have been appointed to teach Greek and fine arts in the same college.

SIR J. W. DAWSON has resigned, under medical advice, the principalship of McGill University, Montreal, which office he has held since 1855.

DR. ALFRED GUDEMAN, reader in classical philology at Johns Hopkins, has been appointed to a professorship in the same subject at the University of Pennsylvania.

MR. A. H. EDGREN, who recently returned from America to Sweden, has now accepted the chair of Romance languages and literature at the University of Nebraska, where he was formerly professor of modern languages.

THE University of Pennsylvania has conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Science upon Prof. D. G. Brinton, in recognition of his numerous contributions to the linguistics, ethnology, and archaeology of America.

THE death is announced of M. Jean-Pierre Rossignol, in the ninetieth year of his age. He had been professor of Greek at the Collège de France for no less than forty-eight years, and a member of the Académie des Inscriptions since 1853, when he succeeded Burnouf.

TRANSLATION FROM THE PORTUGUESE.

TWO SONNETS OF ANTHERO DE QUENTAL.

I.

"The Palace of Happiness."

In dreams an errant knight I seem to be;
Through deserts, under suns, by night obscure,
Love's paladin, I search for eagerly
The enchanted house of Happiness secure!

But now I'm faint, and worn, and like to flee,
My sword is broken, and my mail unsure. . .
When lo! I sight it shining, suddenly,
In all its pomp and airy formosure!

With many a blow I strike the gate, and cry:
"The Wanderer, the Disherited am I . . .
Ye gates of gold, to my complaining ope!"
With a loud noise the golden gates fly wide . . .
What faces me, o'ercome by grief, inside?
But deathlike quiet and darkness without hope!

II.

"Mora-Amor."

That coal-black steed whose tramp so full of might
I hear in dreams, when darkness cloaks the sky,
Which at full gallop I have seen pass by
In the fantastic causeways of the night, Whence comes he? Or what regions out of sight
And full of terrors has he crossed, or why
Seems he so dark and wondrous to the eye,
Why tosses he his mane as though affright?

A cavalier of dread and mighty gait,
Whose port is calm yet terrible to view,
From head to foot in shining armour dressed,
Bestrides the uncanny beast quite fearlessly.
And the black coursier says—"I'm Death!" (and you?)
'Tis I am Love!" his rider makes reply.

EDGAR PRESTAGE.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for July is a strong number, and will doubtless attract the attention of some of those eminent New Testament critics whose work Prof. Ramsay regards as wholly vitiated by their erroneous views on the relations of the Church and the Empire in the first century. A somewhat important article on the latter subject is contributed by Prof. Ramsay to this number. It takes for its text a letter to the editor by one whom all critics, Biblical ones included, delight to honour, Theodor Mommsen. This veteran scholar is "well aware that neither in theory nor in argument is there much to add by him to what he set forth in his paper, Religionsfreie nach römischem Recht, published two years ago, and agreeing mainly with Ramsay's views. "Nevertheless," he thinks, "it may not be amiss to sum up the case in the sense required by Ramsay, and to state some points where he is obliged to differ from him."

We have thus a triangular controversy before us, in which that vornehm manner, that sits so well upon Mommsen, is finely contrasted with the kindly and deferential tone of Prof. Sanday, and the impetuous energy of Prof. Ramsay. Then follows Dr. Bruce's able and original essay on St. Paul's doctrine of sin: exegesis is clearly not dead yet. Dr. Bruce prefers the second edition of Pfeiderer's well-known work on Paulinism to the first, on grounds which deserve the author's consideration. Mr. Rashdall sends us a model university sermon on Abelard's doctrine of the Atonement. It is not often that the phrase "the reconstruction of Christian doctrine" is heard in St. Mary's Church; not often, too, that a word is said anywhere for Abelard, whose doctrine of the Atonement Mr. Rashdall takes to be "as noble and perspicuous a statement as can even yet be found of the faith which is still the life of Christendom." The venerable Bishop Hervey concludes his studies of the chronology of Ezra iv. 6-23, which are probably some of his best work, though they would doubtless have gained in value could reference have been made to recent investigations on the Book of Ezra. Dr. Taylor gives some valuable early evidence for the existence of the passage, Mark xvi. 9-20; and Dr. Stalker discourses eloquently on a difficult saying of Christ.

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for July maintains the character of the magazine for solid learning and advanced criticism. Dr. Koster (the successor of Kuenen at Leiden) applies the historical criticism to the narratives respecting the ark in Samuel. The chief result is that the ark remained in the possession of the Philistines till it was reconquered by David, so that the unhistorical notices of the ark which precede 2 Sam. vii. 15-19 (notices, however, based upon historical narratives, the main points of which can be conjectured) are only valuable as illustrating the change that passed over the early Israelitish conception of this holy object. Dr. van Manen, in continuation of his first paper, discusses with great fulness the contents of the fragment of the Gospel of Peter. He finds no trace of Docetism, not even in ver. 10 ("and he was silent, as though he suffered no pain") nor in ver. 19 ("My power, My power, thou hast left Me"); and he holds, with Bakhuyzen, that the second part of the letter of Serapion in Eusebius forms no part of the original epistle of Serapion to the church of Rossus, but is an independent letter, and refers to another gospel regarded as Docetic. The second edition of Baldersperger's interesting book on the Conscientiousness of Jesus is reviewed by van der Bergh; and among the shorter notices we may mention that of Montefiore's Hibbert Lectures by Dr. Oort, who directs special attention to the last and longest of the lectures. While agreeing with it in the main, he thinks that Montefiore's reply to Schürer and others is only valid up to a certain point. Kuenen, at any rate, has given a perfectly just description of Jewish piety.

THE TODD MEMORIAL LECTURES.

I.

WHEN that widely-read scholar, learned archaeologist, and lovable man, Dr. James Henthorn Todd, died in 1869, some of his friends proposed to found in his honour a lectureship of the Celtic languages, and with this object gave and gathered sums amounting to about £1300. The lectureship, or as it is now called, the Todd professorship, was accordingly founded, endowed with the fund above mentioned, and connected with the Royal Irish Academy, of which institution Dr. Todd had been president. Four professors have held the chair, namely, Dr. Atkinson, the late Mr. Hennessy, the Rev. Dr. B. MacCarthy, of Youghal, and the Rev. Edmund Hogan, S.J. Dr. Atkinson's lectures on Irish lexicography and on the Passions and Homilies in the Leabar Brecc, were published in 1887, and reviewed by the present writer in the Transactions of the Philological Society for 1889 and in Bezzenger's Beiträge xvi., pp. 29-64. Only three of Mr. Hennessy's lectures have hitherto been printed; and these, together with the lectures of Dr. MacCarthy and Father Hogan, form the subject of the following notice.

Mr. Hennessy's lectures contain the text and translation of a fragmentary story preserved partly in the Book of Leinster (circ. 1150) and partly in the Book of the Dun (circ. 1100). A copy in pp. 49-68 of a vellum in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, marked XL. (of the existence of which Mr. Hennessy was unaware), is made up by joining the two fragments, and does not fill the lacuna between them. The tale is called Mesca Ulad "the Intoxication of the Ulaid," and tells how, after a great feast at Emain, the Ulaid, led by Cúchulainn in his war-chariot, made a furious inroad into Munster, and wrecked Temair Luachra, after baffling an attempt to burn their braves alive in that fortress. As to its merits as a work of art, like all the Irish sagas, like almost all mediaeval literature, the whole exists for the sake of the parts, not the parts for the sake of the whole. Interesting details in the story are the account of the origin of the Irish elves (p. 2); the description of the feast held by King Conchobar (p. 12); the tabu (geas) imposed on the king not to speak before his druids (p. 12), with which compare Dion Chrysostom, xlix. 4 (Κελτοὶ δὲ οὐκ ἀναμύθουσι Δρυῖδας . . . ὅτι ἔνευ τοῖς βασιλεῦσιν οὐδὲν ἐξῆν πράττειν οὐδὲ βουλευέσθαι); the description of the Ulster chieftains by the Druid Crom Deróil and their identification by Cú-rúí (pp. 26-40), which reminds one of the τεῖχοςκοπία in the third book of the Iliad; the portrait of Cúchulainn as "a little black-browed man" (for bec bráilub), p. 28; the picture of the Dagda (p. 32) riding invisible, like Sir Galton in the Morte d'Arthur, through the Ulster host, and his amusement—killing twice nine men with the rough end of his iron staff, and then reviving them by laying its smooth end upon their heads; the spear of Celtchair, pp. 36, 38^b, which portended battle by shooting forth showers of sparks, and burnt its wielder unless it was quenched in a cauldron filled with the blood of dogs and cats and wizards.

Although the Irish type has been employed, the Irish text is tolerably correct; * but the translation is full of that guesswork which deforms the publications of most native Irish scholars. Thus, in p. 17, ll. 1, 2, Bricriu's boast: is airdaru diin sanas na da neoch aile éigem is rendered by "it is more dignified for us to whisper than for another to cry." But in p. 45, l. 25, the very same phrase (substituting damsa "to me," for diin) is translated "it is fitter that I should know than any other person." The true rendering is, of course, "a whisper is clearer to us [or to me] than a scream is to another."*

So i caustul fri cnessaib dóib, p. 30, l. 36, is rendered by "girding their bodies round." But i caustul fri cnes dó, p. 38, l. 13, is rendered by "to the surface of his skin." Again, in p. 30, l. 17, the hero Loegaire's golden hair is beautifully compared "to the crest of a birch-tree at the end of autumn" (ra cir mbeithi sa derved faganair). Mr. Hennessy renders this by "to a honeycomb!" at the end of harvest." Some other corrigenda may be given in parallel columns:

These mistakes are, indeed, lamentable: no continental celtologist would have made them; but they will surprise no one who has examined the lengthy list of blunders in Mr. Hennessy's translation of the Vision of Mac Conglinne, which Dr. Kuno Meyer has pointed out and corrected in his edition of that singular specimen of mediaeval literature.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LONDON LITHUANIAN BIBLE OF 1660.

British Museum: July 3, 1893.

Bibliographers will be glad to hear that a fragment of the extremely rare Lithuanian Bible (see the ACADEMY, April 18, May 9, 16, 30, June 13, 1891), commonly called the Chylinski Bible, printed in London about 1660, has been discovered and secured for the British Museum. This Bible was never printed in its entirety. A portion of it without title-page (which probably was never printed), consisting of 416 pages, is in the Library of the Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical Seminary at St. Petersburg. The fragment before me is also without title-page, and consists of 176 pages, ending with Joshua xv. 63. It is printed in double columns; the type, which is roman, is very small but clear, and the size of the book is octavo. I subjoin an exact transcript of Genesis, chapter i., verses 1, 2:—

- "And a pradžios sutwres Diewas Dagū ir Ziame.
- "O Ziame buwo pusta ir tuszczu, ó tamsibe buwo and prapulties. ó Dwasia Diewo krutejo and wadenin."

JOHN T. NAAKÉ.

"THE HOLY LAND OF PUNT."

London: July 1, 1893.

The following are extracts from a very interesting letter received by me lately from Prof. Sayce:—

"What will especially interest you is the discovery made at Contra-Syene by Prof. Schiaparelli in a tomb which was discovered last year, just before his visit to Assouan. An inscription in it states that Hurkhuf, who was buried in it, had been sent on an exploring expedition to the south by Pepi II (of the Vth Dynasty), and that he brought back many gifts from the king of Ammaan, including a Denga dwarf from the Land of the Holy Spirits, which danced divinely like the Denga dwarf which the deceased Chancellor, Urdudu, brought back from the land of Pun in the time of the king Assa (of the Vth Dynasty)."

"Léon des Avenchers speaks of dwarfs on the upper Yuba called Dokos, or Dongos (Bulletin de la Société de la Géographie de Paris 1866, v. ii., p. 1.)."

The expedition of Hannu to Punt has been hitherto supposed to have been the earliest. But that of Hurkhuf dates back between 5000 and 6000 years. A thousand years separates it from the second expedition—that of Hannu—which in its turn was a thousand years earlier than the mission of Queen Hatasu, so boastfully avowed to be a wonder to gods and men. As this mission went in an entirely different direction from that taken by Hannu, it must have gone to a different country. If the Periplus of Hanno (the date of which no one can even conjecture) was a record of the voyage of Hannu to Pount, it is clear that, in order to reach that country, he sailed towards the far west, through the Straits of Gibraltar and down the west coast of Morocco. This inscription is important as connecting Pūn with dwarfs and with the West, for Amenti (the Egyptian "Land of the Blessed") simply meant "the West" (ement), as Erebus (ereb) also did. "The Holy West," says Bunsen, "was the Land of Truth." But the East was regarded as "the filthy East." In the Book of the Dead we read, "I have not eaten food where Osiris is in the filthy East."

Bunsen says Pūt of the Scriptures (Punt) "is admitted to mean in the strictest sense Mauritania." Nowhere are there to be found fuller authorities as to Put or Pount than in that learned work, Die Semiten, by J. G. Müller, whose references are well worthy of attention:

"The old suggestion," he says, "that Put refers to the Libyans was confirmed by Champollion and Bunsen (Egypt I., 572). This was opposed by Ebers, who placed Put or Pount in the East."

As for the Lubu or Lehabim, both are there (Gen. x.) mentioned as sons of Mizraim, but Put as brother's sons of Ham, and the former were by the Greeks held to be the Egyptian Libyans in the narrowest sense. Therefore, in Nahum iii. 9, Put and Lubim, though mentioned together, are distinguished—the former [i.e., the people of Put or Punt] as in the West, and the latter as the Eastern. In the land of the Western, to the west of the Triton Lake, are the city of Putaea (Ptol. iv., 3, 39) and the river Fut (Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 2); yet both are assimilated, and the Egyptians gave them the general name of Tamahu, Tamhu, and Tehennu." (See also Pliny's Hist. Nat. v. 1.)

But there is an interesting bit of evidence on the point which has hitherto escaped attention. It is admitted that Put was connected with Tarshish. Now there can be no doubt that Jonah sailed to a Tarshish in the far West—a port either on the coast of Spain or on the Atlantic seaboard of Morocco. Berber folklore comes in here with singular weight. In the ancient seaport of Massa (a name which occurs in Genesis) there is a venerable temple, which Leo Africanus says was partly built of whales' bones, to commemorate the fact that a prophet was swallowed by a whale, and was cast up alive on the seashore there. He discusses the subject at some length, and the people of Sus are all familiar with the tale. The temple is so sacred that, though it is now covered with sand, the Sultan, during his late raid into Sus, paid it a visit. At Joppa, from which Jonah sailed, there were preserved interesting memorials, not of Jonah, but of Perseus—the bones of the sea monster slain by him, and the chain that had bound Andromeda. It is a curious fact that the word Jone, or Yone, in the ancient Berber of the Canary Islands (opposite Massa), means a Magus or prophet. The most convenient access to the sea from Poun or Pount in the Dra Valley is at Massa.

In the Asiatic Quarterly for July is a letter from myself on "Racial Dwarfs in the Atlas and the Pyrenees," in which there is an allusion to my discovery of the existence of very ancient and greatly venerated ruins, called Poun or Pount, in the district of Warzazat, at the head of the Dra Valley, south of the Atlas. The Cherif of Warzazat, who happened to be at Tangier last spring, was able to convince Mr. Walter B. Harris that I was right, and offered to go with him to the place. Assuming that Queen Hatasu's mission to Pount was historical, three and four thousand years have elapsed since any attempt has been made to reach the cradle land of the Egyptian race, that birthplace of their oldest gods, "the Holy Land of Punt," "the brightest of all the divine lands."

In a subsequent letter Prof. Sayce says:—

"I discovered the name of the Biblical Punt in an inscription of Nebuchadnezzar three years ago, which led to some correspondence in the ACADEMY. It is mentioned in connexion with Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of Egypt, and was garrisoned by the 'Ionian' troops of Amasis. I suggested that it might be Pelusium or Barka. The Germans, however, preferred some place on the Arabian coast. All that is clear is that it was part of the dominions of Amasis."

Prof. Sayce might have safely gone farther West than Barka, as far as the Did and the Dra, where there are still to be seen puzzling citadels or castles, evidently built by some great military power, not the Romans, for they knew nothing of Southern Morocco, otherwise we should have heard from them of Punt and the dwarfs of the Atlas.

But there is a curious proof in our constellations of the early history of that country. The story of the Yone who was swallowed by the whale, came to Greece in two ways. One story told how Hercules went to Atlas to learn astronomy from him, and how he leaped in full armour down the throat of a sea-monster, slew it, and afterwards escaped, after having been, like Jonah, three days in its belly. The name of Hercules (Herkla) is still a household word near Massa. Another, and a later, tradition may possibly have come through Persian sources. Perseus delivers Andromeda by slaying a sea monster, and turns Atlas into a mountain by showing him the Gorgon's head. A native of the country near Massa, who was my servant in 1887-8, often told me wonderful tales of the petrifying effects of the stare of a dubbhah (a hyena)—a belief that is wide-spread, but nowhere so prominent as in Sus. I am disposed to think that this story of Perseus came to Greece after the Persian occupation of North Africa, and was preserved in the names of stars and constellations. This would show that some at least of our constellations came from the land of Atlas, the astronomer, and identifies Mount Atlas as the seat of the earliest civilisation. The fact that Homer knew so much more of the Atlas country than later Greek writers, may be due to traditions of it brought back by Ionian mercenaries.

Referring to the discussion as to the dwarfs of Mount Atlas, Prof. Sayce says:—

"I return you your book with many thanks. Your name will henceforth be attached to the discovery of dwarf races in North Africa, as Schweinfurth's is to that of the dwarfs of Central Africa. It is one of the most important discoveries that have been made for a long time. I wonder if your dwarfs have anything to do with the Neolithic people who carved the forms of animal, birds, and men on the sandstone rocks of North Central Africa, when the Sahara was a fertile plateau."

AN ERRONEOUS READING IN DANTE'S "DE MONARCHIA" (ii. 3).

Stanhoe Grange, Norfolk: July 1, 1893.

In tracing the descent of Aeneas, Dante claims that he was noble in respect of all three continents; and to prove his connexion with Africa, he refers to his ancestress Electra, the mother of Dardanus, whom he describes as the daughter of the African king, Atlas. In support of this statement he quotes Aeneid, viii. 134-6.

All the modern editors of the De Monarchia (viz., Witte, Fraticelli, and Giuliani) make nonsense of this passage by printing:

"Dardanus . . .
Electra, ut Graii perhibent, et Atlantide cretus," an impossible Virgilian hexameter,* which involves an absurdity in any case, since Electra and Atlantis are, of course, one and the same person.

Strangely enough, this blunder has been perpetuated by an English scholar, Mr. F. J. Church (in his translation of the De Monarchia), who has at the same time involved himself in another, by rendering the corrupt line, "Dardanus . . . whom the Greeks call the son of Atlas and Electra," thus confusing Atlantis, "the daughter of Atlas," with Atlas himself. He has unfortunately further confused the matter by calling Electra "grandmother" of Aeneas, a too literal translation of Dante's avia. Aeneas's descent from Electra, as given by Servius (in Aen. viii. 130), with whose commentary Dante was doubtless acquainted, is as follows: "Ex Electra, Atlantis filia, et Jove Dardanus nascitur; ejus filius Erichthonius; ex eo Assaracus; ex illo Capys; ex illo Anchises; ex illo Aeneas."

SCIENCE.

SOME GEOLOGICAL BOOKS.

Text Book of Comparative Geology. By E. Kayser. Translated and edited by Philip Lake. (Sonnenschein.) It is the good fortune of British geologists to find in the strata of their own country an exceptionally complete epitome of geological history. But the possession of this advantage tends, not unnaturally, to a certain self-sufficiency, which renders it of the first importance that the student should from time to time throw open the windows of his narrow habitation and sweep his eye round the geological horizon. A course of comparative geology is a most refreshing exercise to those who fancy they can see in the rocks of Britain the geology of the whole earth, dwarfed as in a convex mirror. Prof. Kayser, of Marburg, felt that in our ordinary manuals of geology too little space was given to stratigraphy. With the rapid growth of geology there has arisen the necessity of splitting up the subject into distinct branches; and if we have treatises devoted specially to petrology and to palaeontology, why should not stratigraphy enjoy a similar distinction? Such was the origin of his Lehrbuch der geologischen Formationskunde. It contained an admirable sketch of the successive formations as developed in Germany—though the advanced student desiring a knowledge of German geology will probably prefer to consult Lepsius's Geologie von Deutschland—and it also treated, rather fully, of the development of the various formations in other countries, at least in Europe. Mr. Lake has thus been led to translate it as the basis of a Comparative Geology. The translation itself is excellent, and the editing, so far as it has gone, is undoubtedly good. In the early part of the work, the editorial hand is much in evidence; but in the latter part it may often be sought in vain—an inequality of treatment explained in the preface by the "greatness of the subject and the limits of space." Mr. Lake has had experience on the Geological Survey of India, and is no doubt competent, if he enjoyed a free hand, to deal broadly and satisfactorily with the great subject of Comparative

* The first syllable of Atlas and its compounds is invariably long in Virgil, though Ovid sometimes shortens it, e.g. Metam. iv. 368.

Stratigraphy. But the present work decidedly needs expansion.

The Earth's History: an Introduction to Modern Geology. By R. D. Roberts. (John Murray.) This is a capital little book written by the secretary to the Cambridge and London University Extension Syndicate. Dr. Roberts's official position has brought him into close touch with the leaders of the Extension movement, and has given him ample opportunity of knowing the needs of the class of students which this movement seeks to reach. Moreover, as an old lecturer himself, he can judge how these needs can be best met. His contribution to Mr. Murray's series of "University Extension Manuals" may therefore be accepted as an example of the way in which natural science may be advantageously presented to the student of Extension classes, and of the standard which such teaching may be expected to attain. Dr. Roberts has selected geology as his text. Like most writers who have set forth the teaching of Hutton and Lyell, he enlarges on the ruin and renovation of the rocks, and seeks to trace the origin of the superficial features of the earth. Geological evolutionism has had its fascination for the writer; and, following in the wake of Prof. Hull and Mr. Jukes-Browne, he contributes a chapter to the story of the evolution of the British Isles. Dr. Roberts has shown in this little volume that the study of the earth's history may be presented in such guise as to be at once attractive to the taste and stimulating to the intellect.

Borneo: its Geology and Mineral Resources. By Theodor Posewitz. Translated by Frederick H. Hatch. (Edward Stanford.) During a residence of three years in Borneo, Dr. Posewitz had exceptional opportunity, as a mining engineer, for studying the geology of the island. For the benefit of German readers, he carefully summarised the mass of geological and mineralogical information enshrined in Dutch publications, notably in the Jaarboek van het Mijnwezen in Nederlandsch-Indië; in like manner he ransacked the English sources of information; and, combining the materials thus obtained with the results of his own observations, he has produced the best book yet written on its special subject. The growth of British influence in Borneo in recent years has led to numerous inquiries in this country regarding its mineral resources. Posewitz's book was therefore well worth translating. Dr. Hatch, while an officer of the Geological Survey, undertook this work, and has produced an excellent translation. But it seems rather a pity that the opportunity was not taken of editing the work. As three years elapsed between the appearance of the original work and that of the translation, much might have been advantageously added. At any rate, the "Notes" at the end, which accumulated while the German work was passing through the press, should have been incorporated in their proper place in the text. The translation, however, is thoroughly trustworthy, and the accompanying maps are worthy of special commendation.

Annals of British Geology, 1891. By J. F. Blake. (Dulau.) Several attempts have been made to publish a systematic record of the progress of British geology; but they have hitherto failed, partly from lack of energy in keeping the chronicle well up to date, and partly from the scanty demand for such works of reference. Prof. Blake's enterprise will assuredly not fail from the former cause. With remarkable spirit, he has undertaken, single-handed, a very heavy task; and he is decidedly to be congratulated on the way in which he has brought out the first two volumes. Not only do we find in each a clear summary of all the important work of the year with which it deals, but there are also occasional notes of a critical character, indicating almost invariably the hand of a master. It is not encouraging to read in the Preface to the volume for 1891, that "the first volume has resulted, at present, in a considerable loss." When the work becomes better known, its value will probably be more appreciated; for no one who desires to keep abreast of geological progress in our country can well do without this admirable digest of recent work.

A Catalogue of British Jurassic Gasteropoda. By W. H. Hudleston and Edward Wilson. (Dulau.) This Catalogue represents a very solid piece of work, which deserves grateful recognition by the practical palaeontologist. When the notion of bringing out a new edition of Morris's famous Catalogue of British Fossils was abandoned, it was felt that certain sections might be taken up with advantage by specialists; and the present volume may be regarded as an instalment of such an undertaking. Mr. Hudleston has an exceptional knowledge of Oolitic gasteropods, while for the Liassic forms he has secured Mr. Wilson's co-operation. He alone who has undertaken similar work is likely to have a just conception of the labour represented by such a mass of bibliographical references, or of the critical judgment needed in facing the difficulties of identification and synonymy.

The Jurassic Rocks of the Neighbourhood of Cambridge. By the late Thomas Roberts. (Cambridge: University Press.) A melancholy interest attaches to this admirable little memoir. It was the Sedgwick prize essay for 1886, and its author was for some years assistant to the Woodwardian Professor. Already the author of much palaeontological work, excellent in itself and full of promise for the future, Mr. Roberts was unhappily cut off in the fullness of physical and intellectual vigour. His chief work had been directed to the study of the Jurassic rocks near Cambridge, and their correlation with those in other parts of this country and of the continent. The posthumous essay has been edited by Mr. Henry Woods, of Cambridge, and is introduced by a preface from the pen of Prof. Hughes, who fitly describes it as "indispensable for the student of Cambridge geology, and most valuable for all specialists in the Jurassic rocks."

Fossil Plants as Tests of Climate. By A. C. Seward. (Cambridge: University Press.) This excellent little work, which forms the Sedgwick Prize Essay for the year 1892, will be welcomed as a contribution from the botanist towards the solution of some problems profoundly interesting to the geologist. Fossil remains of plants, notwithstanding the fragmentary state in which they generally occur, are regarded as having exceptional value as thermometers indicating changes of climate in former periods of the earth's history. Mr. Seward has been at the pains of collecting and comparing the opinions of palaeobotanists—often of a conflicting character—regarding the climatic meaning of fossil floras; and, though not formulating any very definite conclusions of his own, has tendered acceptable aid to the geological inquirer by putting him in possession of the views of those best qualified to be heard on this difficult subject.

Volcanoes—Past and Present. By Edward Hull. (Walter Scott.) To the long list of popular works on volcanic phenomena, Prof. Hull has thought it worth while to add another. His contribution to the "Contemporary Science Series" is a volume which presents few noteworthy features, and indeed seems open in many ways to improvement; but at the same time it is a work which may be decidedly useful to those who desire, without probing deeply into the subject, to gain a general notion of volcanic and seismic phenomena.

Man and the Glacial Period. By G. Frederick Wright. (Kegan Paul & Co.) In contributing a volume to the "International Scientific Series," Prof. Wright, of Oberlin Ohio, has selected a theme of exceptional interest. The relation of man to the Great Ice Age is as fascinating to the public as it is perplexing to the geologist. Most of Prof. Wright's book is occupied with a popular and not altogether satisfactory description of glacial phenomena; and the real interest of the work centres in a single chapter, in which he discusses the evidence of man's existence during the glacial period, especially in North America. He has no hesitation in carrying man's existence back to the glacial epoch, but then he contends that this period is not so remote as has often been supposed. On many points connected with glacial matters, Prof. Wright has got into warm controversy with certain geologists in the United States; but it cannot be denied that he has produced a volume which, if not scientifically accurate on all points, is at least very readable. Prof. Haynes, of Boston, contributes an appendix on "Tertiary Man," in which he follows the cautious lead of most English anthropologists.

SCIENCE NOTES.

At the general monthly meeting of the Royal Institution held last Monday, the following donations were acknowledged towards the fund for the promotion of experimental research at low temperatures: Mr. Ludwig Mond, £500 (in addition to former donations); Mr. Robert Hannah, £50; Sir Walter Gilbey, Mr. H. A. Blyth, and Mr. J. Blyth, £21 each. Thanks were also returned to Mr. W. Schooling for his present of portraits of Sir G. B. Airy, Prof. J. C. Adams, Prof. Cayley, and Dr. W. Huggins.

THE Commissioners for the exhibition of 1851 have made the following appointments to science research scholarships for the year 1893, on the recommendation of the authorities of the respective universities and colleges. The scholarships are of the value of £150 a year, and are tenable for two years (subject to a satisfactory report at the end of the first year) in any university at home or abroad, or in some other institution to be approved by the Commissioners. The scholars are to devote themselves exclusively to study and research in some branch of science, the extension of which is important to the industries of the country. The list of scholars and of the nominating institutions is as follows: H. W. Bolam, University of Edinburgh; G. E. Allan, University of Glasgow; J. W. Walker, University of St. Andrews; A. Lapworth, Mason College, Birmingham; J. E. Myers, Yorkshire College, Leeds; A. W. Titherley, University College, Liverpool; E. C. C. Baley, University College, London; J. C. Cain, Owens College, Manchester; Ella Mary Bryant, Durham College of Science, Newcastle-on-Tyne; J. D. Granger, University College, Nottingham; Mary O'Brien, University College of Wales, Aberystwyth; F. G. Donnan, Queen's College, Belfast; J. A. McPhail, McGill University, Montreal; N. R. Carmichael, Queen's University, Kingston, Canada; W. H. Ledger, University of Sydney.

WE quote the following results of scientific observations from the report of the council of the Marine Biological Association at Plymouth:—

"Mr. Cunningham has continued his observations on the rate of growth and probable ages of young fish, a paper on which was published in the November number of the Journal. He has also continued his experiments on the colouration of the underside of flat-fishes. Since Christmas he has been occupied in an inquiry into the question of the destruction of immature fish, the first results of which appear in the May number of the Journal.

"Mr. Cunningham has also succeeded in artificially fertilising the eggs of the flounders which he has reared in the laboratory tanks during the last three years from a length of half an inch; the eggs developed, and the larvae were artificially fed for ten days after the absorption of the yolk-sac. This result is of great importance and interest.

"Mr. Holt has been at work now for eighteen months upon an investigation of the fisheries of the North Sea, and his papers in the Journal for November and May supply a large amount of important information. The council contribute to the expenses of the Cleethorpes Aquarium of the Marine Fisheries Society (Grimsby), in return for Mr. Holt's use of their laboratory and tanks.

"Mr. Garstang has captured a large number of rare forms during the past year, on which and on other points of interest he contributes a weekly note to Nature, and he has added five new species to the list of the British fauna. As a result of his work during the past year, an intimate knowledge of the localities of the fauna has been acquired, so that specimens can be obtained without delay."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE Prix Decennial of 20,000 francs (£800), awarded every alternate year by one of the five branches of the Institut "for the work or discovery best calculated to honour or profit the country, which may have been produced during the best ten years," has been adjudged by the Académie des Inscriptions to M. James Darmesteter, professor of Zend at the Collège de France. In the voting there were no less than nine ineffectual ballots; but at the eleventh ballot M. Darmesteter obtained twenty-three votes, as against seventeen votes given to M. de Sarzec, formerly French consul at Bagdad. The two great works of M. Darmesteter that won this recognition are: Chants Populaires des Afghans (published by the Société Asiatique, 1888-90), and his translation of the Zend Avesta (published by the Musée Guimet, three vols., 1892-3). We may add that the three other winners of this prize, when awarded by the Académie des Inscriptions, were Dr. Jules Oppert, Mariette-Bey, and M. Paul Meyer; and that each of these except Mariette is also a professor at the Collège de France.

THE Rev. Dr. M. Gaster will contribute a paper on the Hebrew sources of the newly discovered Revelation of Peter to an early number of the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society.

PROF. JULIEN VINSON proposes to print in the Revue Linguistique, with notes, Grealhead's "Dissertation on Basque," which is preserved in Lord Macclesfield's Library at Shirburn, among D'Urte's MSS., from a copy made by the Rev. Llewellyn Thomas, of Jesus College, Oxford. Its date is about ten years earlier than W. von Humboldt's "Berichtigungen und Zusätze über die Cantabrische oder Baskische Sprache," which appeared in Adelung's Mithridates (1817).

WE have received the third annual report of the Judith Montefiore College, at Ramsgate. (Wertheimer, Lea & Co.) Besides a record of the lectures delivered during the past year, and of the progress of the library, it is rendered permanently valuable by two papers of the Rev. Dr. M. Gaster. One is a lecture upon the origin and sources of the Schulchan Aruch; that is to say, the code of ritual compiled by Rabbi Joseph Caro about the middle of the sixteenth century. The other is a description of one of the most precious MSS. in the Montefiore Library, known as the Sepher Assufoth, which has never yet been published in full, though it has been used by several Jewish scholars. This is a vellum codex of 181 leaves, which must have been written by a German Jew in the Rhine provinces about the beginning of the fourteenth century. While substantially a legal compilation from various authors, it possesses a special interest for folk-lorists, as containing many curious local customs, superstitions, and even children's games. From a linguistic point of view it is of great importance, as being perhaps the only non-liturgical and non-biblical Hebrew text which has the vowel points added. From an examination of these, Dr. Gaster concludes that the German Jews of that time must have read Hebrew with the so-called Spanish pronunciation, and that, therefore, the so-called German pronunciation is of quite modern origin.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CLIFTON SHAKSPEARE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, May 27.)

DR. ARTHUR B. PROWSE, president, in the chair.—Mr. Leo Grindon, in a paper on Greene's "Friar Bacon," said that Greene's immoral record repels one from his writings. Water from a fountain tainted cannot be good drinking, though perhaps there may be some pretty flowers upon the margin: when we read poetry or the drama, we should look for something to lift us into a better state of feeling, that shall foster our desire for the beautiful, and this is not to be found in this play. Greene's way of introducing the supernatural is one to produce discontent. Of all the characters in the play, only two can be considered attractive. Prince Edward shows himself as a good type of the gentleman, in the surrender of his longings for the hand of the Keeper's daughter; and this, without question, is one of the redeeming features in the play. Margaret's character furnishes one more illustration of the splendour of a good woman's nature. Greene's language is correct: the metaphors, though ancient, are exact and appropriate; the metre and rhythm are blameless; and he lets us see that he is a scholar. It is difficult to feel, however, that we gain anything by a perusal of the play.—Miss Florence Herspath read a paper entitled "A Plea for 'Friar Bacon'." Objectors to Greene enumerate various and glaring defects: they accuse him of an extravagant indulgence in classical allusions, often ludicrously inappropriate; of a scholasticism unnatural and pedantic; of an imagination scanty and puerile; of a style inflated yet heavy; of a morality low and inconsistent; of a distorted and unworthy representation of England's earliest scientist; of a treatment of religion at once contemptuous and sarcastic. These charges, if true, would be heavy indeed; but many of them appear to be based upon a fundamental misconception of Greene's work: to be, in fact, the result of gazing at the play from a wrong standpoint. Greene is not a philosopher: still less is he the writer with a purpose. Vainly, therefore, should we expect from him lofty flights of elevated sentiment or laborious depths of profound reflection. In his view, a dramatist's mission is to be useful, if possible; but, at any rate, to amuse; and in this he undoubtedly succeeds. Writing for pleasure rather than instruction, he takes a broad, perhaps a shallow, view of life: he paints the world as he sees it, yet, in so doing, the very truth of his observation often furnishes moral lessons of no mean order. A man of the world, he brings a quick eye and a ready pen to his work, and he throws off vivid sketches of various social types as they flit across the human stage. Emperor, Scholar, Prince, and Courtier, all bear the sign-manual of the artist; each is sharp in its outlines and clear in its comprehension. Lacy's treatment of Margaret, which has been condemned as unnatural, and cited to Greene's discredit, marks a shrewdness of perception akin to genius. Lacy's passion is true but selfish; he loves Margaret, but he loves himself better. For Greene's presentment of the true nobility of love, we must turn to the charming creation of Margaret. It is, of course, impossible to deny that Greene's plays are disfigured by a redundancy of ornament often singularly misplaced. But such pedantry was the fashion of the time. The fact is, Greene's style is both inflated and simple. He possesses in unusual degree the power of variation, and passes with ease from the heights of declamation to the level plain of ordinary chat. His wit is original; his language vigorous; his dialogue bright and sparkling. Greene never jeers at religion, for which, in spite of his evil life, he had at heart a profound respect; and in Margaret's speedy renunciation of her conventual vows, we have ethical rather than pious satire. Judged by this play, Greene may be said as a writer to be smart rather than clever, depending chiefly for his interest on witty dialogue and bright characterisation; the scenes are occasionally laboured, but always telling; his sense of humour is great, his learning considerable, though he is somewhat too anxious to display its stores; his style is elegant, but often overflorid; his plot, simple, and well worked out; his pathos is limited and his depth of feeling small. But he had powers exceedingly varied, his plays differing widely in subject, style, diction, and stage-craft. He excels, however, in his treatment of genuine comedy; and his virtues are his own, while his faults are those of his time.—Mr. R. C. Tuckett, in a communication on "Greene as Playwright," said that although "Friar Bacon" is admittedly the best play Greene wrote, the strongest impression that it leaves is that of missed opportunity. Neither of the two threads of interest is fully developed. No one can be stirred by the catastrophe of the destruction of the head, though this seems the main point to which the play leads up. The feeling evoked should be a sense of pathos at the fruit and crown of many years' labour being swept away in a moment. Then Bacon should have been drawn as a character full of dignity. Instead of this, not so much learning as a quack doctor's magic is the attribute which Greene has given him. Bacon deserved better treatment; and the play is a failure for the want of this. The other main thread of the play is the love-story. Here again is the same failure to work up to an effective and powerful situation, which should appeal to the sense that exists in every audience for any fine stroke of dramatic art. Margaret is loved by the prince, and by Lacy; but so far as the playwright is concerned, no opportunity is made for bringing home her attractiveness in any striking way. So Lacy's test of her affection is apparently causeless, and her forgiveness has only the quality of pliant acquiescence. In each case a point is thrown away. This is precisely what Greene has done in his story Pandosto, as compared with "The Winter's Tale." Shakspeare's changes give dramatic life to the incidents.—Dr. Bertram Rogers read a paper on "The References to Oxford in 'Friar Bacon'." Roger Bacon and Thomas de Bungay belonged to the order of Franciscan monks, the first members of which arrived in England in 1224. Two of them journeyed to Oxford, and rented a house in the parish of St. Ebb's. Many members of the university joined the order, which attained great influence. But now even the site of the buildings is doubtful, except that the name is still preserved in a square known as Paradise Square, that name having been given to the garden or orchard which existed within the buildings. The order was dissolved by Henry VIII. in 1538. Of Thomas de Bungay very little is known. He entered the order at Norwich, and lectured as D.D. at Oxford in the Franciscan monastery in 1270. He subsequently lectured at Cambridge. Of Roger Bacon only a little more is known. He is said to have been born at Ilchester in Dorsetshire, of rich parents, about 1214. When he came to Oxford is not known. He attended Grosseteste's lectures, and left Oxford in 1245 and went to Paris, where he was made a D.D.; and on his return to Oxford, which took place before 1250, he was incorporated D.D. there. Oxford was in Bacon's time a strongly fortified town; part of the walls still exist. The most perfect part is in New College gardens. The four gates existed till 1776. One of them—Bocardo or the North Gate—long used as a prison, is mentioned in the play. At the time of Bacon the houses were only mud hovels, the streets were narrow and unpaved, and all household refuse was thrown out into the street, down the centre of which ran a gutter. A few oil lamps made darkness visible at night, and the frequent inquests show what the state of the streets was in those days. Inside the houses, the dirt and darkness can hardly be imagined. There were no chimneys; the smoke of the wood-fires was allowed to find its own exit. The windows were not glazed, but covered with lattice work. The floors were simply earth or earth covered with rushes, hiding those many abominations which Erasmus describes so graphically. Few men lived inside the college walls. In Bacon's day, what we may call the collegiate system began. When we consider Oxford as it existed in Greene's time, we are struck with the little difference that we find from the present. Brasenose College, though Greene introduces it into the play, did not exist in Bacon's time. In the play the beauties of Oxford and the learning of its scholars are made the subject of a not unnatural boast as to the superiority of that University over Hapsburg; but it is certain that Oxford was not then in its palmiest days. An event of some importance to Oxford was the visit of Elizabeth in 1564, when "Palamon and Arcyte" was acted. Oxford was at that time rich in poets. The two Heywoods, Edwards, Lyly, Peele, and Lodge, were all Oxford men. From a sanitary point of view, there had not been much improvement from the time of the Edwards. It was at the end of Elizabeth's reign that Sir Thomas Bodley founded the library known by his name all over the world. Dr. Rogers's paper closed with references from Hentzner, Harrison, and others, concerning the details of student life in Oxford in Greene's time.—This meeting brought to an end the work of the society's eighteenth session. The plays chosen for next session are "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," "Edward II.," "Love's Labour's Lost," Richard II., "King David," "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "Richard III.," and "Lochner." The hon. sec. (9, Gordon-road, Bristol) will gratefully acknowledge the receipt of anything for the society's library, which now consists of 582 volumes.

ARISTOTELIAN.—(Monday, June 12.)

SHADWORTH H. HODGSON, Esq., president, in the chair.—The annual report and financial statement were read and adopted. The officers for the ensuing season were elected as follows: Mr. S. H. Hodgson, president; Mr. S. Alexander, Prof. Bain, Mr. G. F. Stout, vice-presidents; Mr. B. Bosanquet, editor; and Mr. H. W. Carr, hon. secretary and treasurer.—A paper was read by Mr. Alexander on "The Demarcation between Logic and Psychology." The paper was followed by a discussion.

HISTORICAL.—(Thursday, June 15.)

B. F. STEVENS, Esq., in the chair.—Papers were read by Mr. George Hurst on "Pilgrimages," and by Mr. I. S. Leadam on "The Inquisition of 1517—Enclosures and Evictions." The latter paper, which will be published in the next volume of the Society's Transactions, gives the original text of the Lansdowne Inquisition, to which Mr. Leadam's former contribution served as a general introduction, together with a preface to the returns for each county included in the Inquisition.

METEOROLOGICAL.—(Wednesday, June 21.)

DR. C. THEODORE WILLIAMS, president, in the chair.—Mr. R. H. Scott read a paper on "Fifteen Years' Fogs in the British Islands, 1876-1890," which was a discussion of the fog observations made at the station which appear in the "Daily Weather Report." The winter is the foggiest season, and the greatest number of fog observations are reported from London, Yarmouth, Oxford, and Ardrosan. In the summer half-year the fog prevalence attains a local maximum in two different districts, viz., at Scilly, St. Ann's Head, and Roche's Point in the south-west, and at Sunburgh Head and Wick in the north. These are evidently sea fogs, accompanying warm weather. Mr. Scott has made a collation of the observations of fog and the force of the wind, and finds that fog almost invariably occurs only with calm or very light winds. The author says that it seems to be generally assumed that fogs in London are increasing in frequency and in severity. From the observations it appears that there is no trace of a regular increase either in the monthly or in the annual curve. All that can be said is that, taking the three lustral periods of five years each, the last of these, 1886-90, comes out markedly the worst, the successive totals being 262, 250, and 322.—A paper on "Upper Currents of Air over the Arabian Sea," by Mr. W. L. Dallas, of the Indian Meteorological Office, was also read, in which it is shown that there exists a regular arrangement in the vertical succession of the upper currents, and that the Doldrum region, and not the geographical equator, is really the dividing line between the currents of the northern and southern hemispheres.—Mr. E. D. Archibald gave an address on "Australian Climate and Weather," illustrated with lantern slides.

VICTORIA INSTITUTE, ANNUAL MEETING.— (Monday, July 3.)

SIR G. G. STOKES, president, in the chair.—The hon. secretary, Capt. F. Petrie, in reading the report of the society—whose object is to investigate all philosophical and scientific questions, including any advanced as militating against the truths of Revelation—referred to the value of the work recently done. The membership reached 1450: a constantly increasing number of men of science now joined it, and others showed their good will by aiding in its work. Papers and communications by Prof. Hull, Prof. Maspero, Dr. Lionel Beale, Sir W. Dawson, Profs. Seeley, Legge, and others, had been considered during the session; and among the subjects lately dealt with was "Snake Poisoning," by Sir J. Fayrer, the discussion on which brought together opinions of high value, including a statement in regard to a treatment which an Australian medical member had found constantly successful. Reference was made to many of the Transactions having been translated into foreign languages.—The president then delivered an address on the "Luminiferous Ether," which has been defined as "the medium whose vibrations are supposed to cause light, pervades all space, is imponderable, and infinitely elastic." He described the results of the investigations of men of science at home and abroad into the nature of that substance. The United States Ambassador moved a vote of thanks, dwelling upon the great interest attaching to the subject.

FINE ART.

MESRS. DEPREZ & GUTEKUNST have ON VIEW the most recent ORIGINAL ETCHINGS by J. McNeill Whistler, F. Seymour-Haden, Prof. H. Herkomer, R.A., and selections of the Works of Jacquemart, Bracquemond, Méryon, &c.—18, Green street, Charing Cross Road, W.C.

THE RUINED CITIES OF TIAHUANACO.

Die Ruinenstaette von Tiahuanaco im Hochlande des alten Peru: eine Culturgeschichtliche Studie auf Grundselbststaendiger Aufnahmen. Von A. Stübel und M. Uhle. Maps and 42 Photographic Plates. (Breslau: Wiscott.)

In his brilliant if not very solid account of the "Temple of the Andes," as he calls the Tiahuanaco ruins, Mr. Richard Inwards expresses a hope that "in an interval of peace some traveller will be found with the means, time, and inclination to make some definite efforts towards the further unravelling of this ancient stone riddle." This was in 1884, when the hope here expressed had actually been, to a large extent, already realised, although the results are now for the first time placed before the public in one of the most sumptuous volumes ever issued by the press of any country. In fact, the ground had been carefully surveyed, and accurate drawings and measurements taken of the chief monuments, in the year 1877—not, however, by Herren Stübel and Uhle, as might be supposed from the somewhat misleading title-page, but by Herr Stübel alone, whose name, coupled with that of Herr Reiss, has long been familiar to all students of American antiquities through their splendid work on the Necropolis of Ancon. Herr Uhle is honourably associated with the present work as an eminent antiquary, who has given most efficient aid in elaborating the explanatory text and elucidating many obscure points connected with the origin and significance of the stupendous megalithic remains strewn over the southern shores of Lake Titicaca.

Before discussing some of these points, it may be well to state that the work, a huge folio volume, forming a superb specimen of the printer's and of the binder's art, consists of two distinct parts—the Plates and the Text. In the first part itself, however, there is also a good deal of letterpress, one or more pages of descriptive or explanatory matter being interleaved, as in the Ancon, between the several plates. Thus are conveniently brought together all the illustrations—map, panoramic view of the Tiahuanaco district, ground plans of the chief groups of ruins, which are scattered over a somewhat wide area, sketches and photographs of the buildings and of all objects of interest, as well as photographs of the sites of the ruins and of the surrounding landscape contributed by Herr G. von Grumbkow. Of the various monuments here illustrated, the most striking are the wonderful monolithic doorway of Ak-kapana, with its curious symbolic sculptures, to which several plates are devoted; the so-called sacrificial stone now lying at the foot of the Ak-kapana hill; the smaller monolithic doorways of Pumapungu; the uprights of Ak-kapana presenting analogies to Stonehenge, but as a rule better dressed and mortised, with projecting ledges on their shoulders, apparently for the reception of horizontal connecting beams; the curious architectural pieces in lava (Andesite) and red sandstone, often exquisitely finished, but lying flat on the ground, as if ready for the mason, but never actually placed in situ, the works having been interrupted before the general scheme of building was completed. Among the illustrations are also other blocks of columnar type, some rudely carved into more or less conventional human figures, and two or three undoubted statues, besides a few specimens of the potter's art found among the ruins and in the neighbourhood, among which is a curious drinking vessel of hour-glass shape from Titicaca Island. All the illustrations reproduce the various monuments, their reliefs, and other carvings with the utmost fidelity. In this respect they stand on the same high level as those of the Ancon Necropolis itself, as may be seen by plate 21, where a specimen of weaving is borrowed from that work for the purpose of comparing its artistic design with some of the details on the Ak-kapana doorway.

In the second part, the whole subject of the Tiahuanaco ruins is discussed from the various geographical, ethnical, archaeological, and historical standpoints. These remarkable remains are thus made the groundwork of a learned disquisition on the pre-Columbian cultures of the early Peruvian and Bolivian peoples. All the more important monuments are studied in great detail: their dimensions, technical execution, sculptures, and other decorative features are carefully and even minutely described, and compared with other architectural structures still extant in various parts of the Andean uplands. The accounts, descriptions, and theories of previous observers—from Pedro de Cieza (sixteenth century), by whom they were first seen and on the whole described with singular accuracy (down to the numerous travellers) d'Orbigny, Squier, Tschudi, Wiener, Markham, Inwards, Middendorf—by whom the district has been visited in later times—are critically examined, their errors and misconceptions corrected, their untenable hypotheses rejected. A notable instance is the general assumption that the eminence at Ak-kapana is artificial, a pyramid, a fortress or the like; whereas it is shown to be not a mound but a natural hill, though evidently at some former epoch crowned with structures, the nature of which can no longer be conjectured.

Serious attempts are made to interpret the symbolical carvings on the façade of the Ak-kapana doorway, and to solve the enigma of the dressed blocks of all sizes strewn over the surface, especially in the Pamapungu district. These perplexing objects have been studied with infinite patience, and made to fit into a suggested general design of some structure seemingly devoted to religious purposes, but on too small a scale to be regarded as a temple in the ordinary sense, though still affecting the resemblance in outline and detail to such an edifice.

Lastly, the past and present condition of all the monuments is considered with a view to determining their origin, antiquity, and general purpose. A chief difficulty associated with these questions is the obvious fact that the general scheme of edifices—temples, palaces, or other groups of buildings at Ak-kapana and Pamapungu—was never carried out; while, on the other hand, some of the structures have been pulled down, and large quantities of the stones removed from time to time and utilised as building materials at La Paz and elsewhere. Nevertheless, enough remains to enable the authors to arrive at some general conclusions, which are supported with much solid learning, and with sound if not always convincing arguments. They hold the Tiahuanaco remains to be absolutely unique, distinct in character from any others in the New or the Old World, although here and there showing traces of later Peruvian (Inca) influences. Nor can the monuments be regarded with Mr. Clements Markham as representing the Cyclopiæ style, which is determined not by the mere size but by the treatment of the blocks. In Cyclopiæ structures architecture properly so called is undeveloped, and there is especially an absence of that constructive and ornamental treatment of façades, which is so eminently characteristic of the Tiahuanaco buildings. These, in fact, represent a type sui generis, which the authors propose to designate as "megalithic architecture," where the first term would serve to indicate their admitted general resemblance to such primitive structures as Stonehenge and the dolmens, while the second would emphasise the fundamental contrast between these rude beginnings of the builder's art and the really artistic works of Tiahuanaco.

In these works many constructive features point at a direct transition from wood to stone: that is, suggest a style of architecture developed in a region where timber was the only available building material, and then abruptly transferred to a region where stone had to be substituted for wood. As no timber grows on the elevated Titicaca plateau (12,800 feet above sea-level), it is inferred that the style was not here indigenous, but was introduced by a cultured people, intruders from some warmer forest-clad country. Then comes the question, who were these people, and from what quarter did they reach the bleak Bolivian tableland? Here the issues are narrowed down to three alternatives, summed up in the three words Toltec, Inca, Aymara. The authors have an easy task in disposing of Angrand and other Toltomaniacs, who see the hand of the Toltecs wherever two blocks are found superimposed between New Mexico and Chili.

The Inca theory, advocated with more plausibility, chiefly by Markham and Cunow, is also shown even on historic grounds to be absolutely untenable. The Tiahuanaco district lies, not in Peruvian but in Aymara territory, and was not even politically included in the Incas' empire till the reign of Yupanqui, not more than 130 years before the advent of the Spaniards: that is, at a time when the Ak-kapana builders had already passed into the domain of the fabulous, and become divine beings associated with the pre-Inca cult of Viracocha, "creator of all things." There remain the Aymaras, who in this particular controversy may be regarded as the beati pateres, though the question again arises, who and whence these Aymaras? Middendorf, who took them up after dropping the Toltecs, brought them unnecessarily from Yucatan or from some other part of Central America, arguing that they must, anyhow, have reached Titicaca from the north. But a migration from the south is here shown to be equally, if not more, probable; and Ber is quoted as suggesting that Tiahuanaco might just as well have been the cradle of Maya as Yucatan of Aymara culture. An independent evolution of different social systems in different environments seems to be a view still beyond the grasp of a certain school of ethnologists and antiquaries, who run to the ends of the earth seeking "affinities" and "origins" and "influences" where none exist, and who "affiliate" two cults or two peoples, no matter how many continents and oceans may intervene, if only both worship the same sun and moon, forgetting that after all there is but one sun and one moon for people on this planet to choose from.

The Aymaras, elder brothers of the Quechuas or Peruvians proper (the Peruvians of the Incas), are the true autochthonous element in the Titicaca basin, where they represent an older culture, characterised especially by megalithic structures, which are more numerous in their domain than elsewhere. This domain formerly extended from below Cuzco as far south as 21° south latitude, and even still comprises a great part of the Bolivian uplands, including the whole of the Tiahuanaco district. In pre-Inca times Tiahuanaco itself appears to have been one of the two distinct religious centres of Peru, the other being Paccaritambo, some sixteen or eighteen miles from the Inca capital, Cuzco. Tiahuanaco was specially dedicated to the worship of Viracocha, tutelary deity of the Aymaras, while Paccaritambo was the seat of the Quechua sun-worshippers. But when the sway of the Incas was spread over the whole of the middle Andean plateau, there was no longer room for two rival religious centres; and the political subjection of the Aymaras to the Quechuas was followed by the inevitable suppression of the Viracocha cult at Tiahuanaco by the Incas, shortly before the suppression of the Incas themselves by the Conquistadores. Such appear briefly to have been the politico-religious relations of the two great ethnical factors in pre-Columbian times, though these relations, as here shown, have been strangely obscured by Garcilaso de la Vega who, because of his Inca descent, has been blindly followed by nearly all writers on Peruvian subjects down to the appearance of the present work.

Many other points of great archaeological interest are dealt with in the same masterly way by our authors. Such are the material (chiefly Andesites and sandstones); the dimensions and weight of the larger monoliths (ranging from 100 to 150 tons); the means of transport to their present position, not only from distances of many miles, but in some cases across several inlets of Lake Titicaca; the marvellous technical skill displayed in dressing, smoothing, and polishing many of the blocks, and covering others with elaborate carvings, the only available implements being no harder than the stone itself. But the exigencies of space forbid the discussion of these multifarious topics, for which the reader must be referred to this noble monument of German industry, learning, and craftsmanship, honourable alike to explorer, authors, and publishers. Although it was found impossible to issue an English edition, as in the case of the Ancon Necropolis, the magnificent series of plates alone should suffice to secure it a place at least in all our large public libraries. It need scarcely be added that to all students of American archaeology the Ruinenstätte von Tiahuanaco will be found absolutely indispensable.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

WE understand that Mr. England Howlett, who has contributed to the July number of the Reliquary a learned paper upon "Heraldry," is engaged upon an article treating of the various customs relating to funerals and the rites of burial. He possesses immense collections upon this subject, gathered from all parts of Britain, and means to embody the result of his research in a volume dealing with death and burial from the antiquarian and traditional point of view. The Reliquary also contains an article by Miss Florence Peacock upon "Some Lincolnshire Bell Customs."

THE fiftieth congress of the British Archaeological Association will be held at Winchester, during the week beginning on July 31, under the presidency of the Earl of Northbrook. The Queen has accepted the office of patron of the congress.

THE annual meeting of the Guild and School of Handicraft, on the occasion of its sixth anniversary, will be held at Essex House, Mile End-road, on Saturday, July 15, at 4 p.m., when Cardinal Vaughan will deliver an address.

A PICTURE painted by the late Mr. Charles Jones, R.C.A., entitled "Reposing," representing a scene in Wiltshire, with sheep and cattle, has just been purchased by the committee of the Art Gallery at Cardiff for their permanent collection.

THERE was opened at Bath, last month, a very valuable collection of pictures, plate, china, and other articles of vertu, which is to be known as the Holburne of Menstrie Art Museum. It was formed by the late Sir Thomas Holburne, who died so long ago as 1874; and by his will it was bequeathed to trustees, for the benefit of the public, together with a sum of £10,000 for its endowment and maintenance. A building has been purchased for its adequate housing and display; and it has been placed under the charge of Mr. Percy H. Bate, as curator. The pictures alone number nearly three hundred, comprising works by Gainsborough, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir Peter Lely, Sir Godfrey Kneller, Hoppner, Murillo, Benjamin and Thomas Barker, Vandyke, Hogarth, Teriers, and George Morland. There are also a few choice examples of Flemish and Dutch schools; among them a portrait of Gerard Dow by himself. The silver plate includes a splendid collection of Apostle spoons, dating from 1337 to the end of the seventeenth century, and a number of seal-headed spoons of almost equal value. The museum further contains cases of agate cups, marbles, and bronzes, miniatures, Limoges and other enamels, coins, and medals, ivory work, Italian majolica, Wedgwood ware, Oriental, Sèvres, Dresden, Chelsea, Crown-Derby, Worcester, and other china.

WE have received a separate Part of the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, containing two papers on a block of red glass enamel, said to have been found at Tara Hill. The first is by Prof. Vincent Ball, director of the Science and Art Museum at Dublin who describes the history of the specimen, its chemical analysis, and its possible use in the arts. It seems to bear a close resemblance to the lumps of porporino found in Rome. Its composition is that of a kind of flint glass, coloured red with oxide of copper. It is a true enamel, but (for practical purposes) exhausted, since, on being fused, it now turns to a dark green. The second paper is by Miss Margaret Stokes. She first gives a detailed account of what is historically known about the art of enamelling as practised in ancient Ireland, and then proceeds to describe certain specimens of enamelled bronze ornaments, preserved in the museum of the Academy. These are beautifully illustrated in a coloured plate, which, we observe, has been printed at Frankfurt. Finally, she concludes,

"When we read the testimony of ancient writers as to the splendour of our ancient horse-trappings, and find enamelled bronze bits, loops, and clasps, all fragments of such furnishings discovered in this country, and now in our museums, it is impossible to avoid the suggestion that this lump of crimson enamel was raw material in the workshop of some goldsmith or jeweller in the Rath of Caelchu, on Tara Hill."

THE STAGE.

THE Théâtre Française company will remain in occupation of Drury Lane until the end of next week; but the departures from its original programme have been many and serious. The classical pieces have been found unattractive; Molière himself has been voted, by the wisdom of the town, dry and démodé. But popularity has fallen—and not wrongly, either—upon "Les Effrontés," "Le Gendre de Monsieur Poirier," and "Denise." The student of the stage—and presumably the reader of the ACADEMY—knows them all well. Some ill-luck has attended M. Mounet-Sully, who, having first been indisposed, has since been discovered to be inadequate; or, rather, his Hamlet has been pronounced not so much inadequate as inappropriate. We do not know whether he appears, as Mlle. Dudlay certainly does, in "La Reine Juana," of M. Parodi, on Monday or Tuesday next. If he does, he should have a good part, as this kind of thing suits him. We are glad M. Parodi's piece is to be done at last, as it is almost the only serious novelty to the real student of the stage; and the author of "Rome Vaincue" (in which Sarah used to be so great) may at least be sure of a respectful and cordial hearing.

THE Lyceum is about the only theatre—among those not devoted to foreign plays—which manifests any activity at the present time; and Mr. Irving, in sooth, is energetic enough for a dozen. Revival follows revival, each being a complete and perfect rehearsal for the forthcoming American tour. "Much Ado about Nothing" has been among the last; still later, however, is the revival, if so it may be called, of "Becket," which, as yet, can scarcely perhaps be said to have ever been actually withdrawn.

ON Monday, July 10, at 2 30 p.m., Mr. J. T. Grein, the director of the Independent Theatre, will give a dramatic "at home," at St. George's Hall, when the following triple bill will be presented:—(1) "The Cradle," a domestic incident in one act, from the Flemish of Emiel van Goethem, by A. Teixeira de Mattos; (2) "Dante," an idyll, by G. H. R. Dabbs and Edward Righton; and (3) "The Jerry-Builder," a parody, by Mrs. Hugh Bell.

MUSIC.

"DIE WALKÜRE."

LAST week, in writing about "Tristan," one could not but recall the performances of last season; and so on Wednesday, when the second section of the tetralogy was given, the past would intrude itself on the present. There are many practical difficulties in connexion with producing Wagner's later works—difficulties in obtaining the best artists, and, in the midst of a busy season, in having rehearsals sufficient to make everything go smoothly. It therefore seems hard to pick holes in the performance of "Die Walküre." One ought, indeed, to be thankful for the chance of hearing it at all. Comparison, certainly, formed the chief cause for discontent. Of the interpreters, one deserves special praise. This was Frau Reuss Belce, whom we heard with so much admiration at Karlsruhe in 1890, as Cassandra in "Les Troyens." Her Sieglinde is a remarkable impersonation; it is full of dramatic power, and there are in it wonderful touches of tender feeling. She is an accomplished actress; and one of her finest moments was when, quivering with emotion, she watched Siegfried pull the sword from the tree. She has a powerful voice, and uses it well, though there is a tendency at times to force the upper notes. Frau Reuss is one of the best Sieglindes that have been seen in London. Mme. Moran Olden was more successful as Brünnhilde than she had been as Isolde. Had not her intonation at times proved most uncertain, we should have pronounced it a very successful rendering of the part. Mlle. Meisslinger sang well, but is not suited to the part of Fricka. Herr Max Alvary, the Siegmund, acted, as usual, in a powerful manner. But he sang distressingly out of tune—and this, of course, affected the first and second acts. It is absurd to expect that a vocalist can always be in good voice, but it becomes a question whether an artist ought not, for his own reputation, at times, to decline to sing. Here again there are practical difficulties in the way. Wednesday is set apart for Wagner; people come from all quarters specially to hear the work rather than the vocalists, and a change at the last moment would prove highly inconvenient. Herr David Bispham was an excellent Hunding, though the part does not altogether suit his voice. Herr Wiegand was only fairly acceptable as Wotan. Herr Steinbach conducted in a painstaking manner, but he disappointed us. He is an intelligent and experienced conductor, but seems to lack the vis vivida necessary to reveal the full power of the orchestral score of "Die Walküre."

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MR. E. VAN DER STRAETEN, the 'cello player, gave a concert at St. Martin's Town Hall on Friday, June 30. The programme included three of his own part-songs for female voices. The setting of Longfellow's "Curfew" is simple and quaint. The accompaniment is interesting, but needs orchestral colour; the pianoforte fails to realise the composer's conception. "Youth and Age" is flowing and popular in character. The "Spinning Wheel" chorus seems the least satisfactory. The concert commenced with Godard's Sonata in D minor (Op. 104) for piano and 'cello, which was vigorously interpreted by Mr. Algernon Ashton and the concert giver. The thematic material in it appears to us more interesting than the thematic developments.

Mr. Jan Mulder, another 'cellist, gave his annual concert at the Concert Hall, St. James's-street, on Saturday afternoon. At the head of the programme there was a Quartet in D by Alexander Borodin, a Russian composer of some note in his own country, and even in Germany; his orchestral and chamber works, however, are unknown here. The Quartet was, therefore, a decidedly interesting novelty. It was somewhat difficult to judge of the new work, for the performance left much to be desired, especially in the matter of intonation; but the two characteristic middle movements created a strong desire to hear the music under more favourable conditions. Mr. Mulder deserves thanks for calling general attention to the composer. Borodin, like his contemporary César Cui, was engaged in scientific pursuits, and held a post under Government; he died in 1887.

The fifth Richter Concert took place on Monday, July 3, and the programme was of a very miscellaneous character. An important Wagner selection, with a stray piece by Liszt, followed, as a rule, by a Beethoven Symphony: this was once the normal Richter programme. It was by his Wagner and Beethoven performances that the eminent conductor won fame; but he probably feels that it will be well to enlarge the circle of his composers. Anyhow, the scheme this season has been of a more eclectic character. Berlioz's Overture to "King Lear" (Op. 4) was played: the composer read Shakespeare's play "in a delightful wood about a league from Florence," and then wrote his work. There is a fitful passion in the principal theme of the Allegro, and a certain dignity about the Introduction; and these qualities are certainly in keeping with the subject of the play. Still, Berlioz does not rise to the height of his argument, and there are many moments in which the clever orchestration alone sustains the interest. Berlioz felt deeply and thought earnestly; but at times he lacked the power of fully expressing those thoughts and feelings. "King Lear" is full of interest, and yet, as a whole, disappointing. The Overture had not been heard in London for some time. Schubert's Overture "Des Teufels Lustschloss" was introduced many seasons ago at a concert of the now defunct London Musical Society. It is clever and picturesque, but not great. It was written when the composer was in his seventeenth year, and, from this point of view, is remarkable. Mr. Ben Davies sang a song from Cornelius's "Der Barbier von Bagdad" successfully, but he did still better in the Love Duet from the "Walküre"; his reading of the Siegmund music was dramatic, and his conception of the part was both intelligent and earnest. Miss Macintyre sang the part of Sieglinde with much feeling, but her high notes were not always of pleasing quality. This Love Duet may be acceptable to those who can remember what is going on on the stage, but as concert music it is unsatisfactory. Wagner's music closely follows the gestures of the performers on the stage, and many a fine point is lost. Liszt's sparkling Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 was placed at the end of the programme. And now that Dr. Richter has found the right place for these clever Rhapsodies, let him keep them there. In the middle of the programme they always seem in the way. Was the "Götterdämmerung" March played at the opening of the concert in memory of the brave sailors who perished suddenly at sea? If so, the applause was singularly inappropriate. The rendering of the March, and indeed of all the instrumental music during the evening, was exceptionally fine.

NATIONAL OBSERVER.—"The book is one for all Mr. Kipling's admirers to rejoice in—some for that, and some for that, and not a few for well-nigh everything it contains."

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"The stories are full of life, vigour, and directness. They hold the attention, and dwell in the memory." OBSERVER.—"No one can fail to notice the rapid growth of Mr.
Kipling's work in strength and confidence. He is now in that rare region where he is independent of critics; the public will read and enjoy his works whether the critics like it or not."

DAILY MAIL GAZETTE.—"The completed book that Mr. Kipling has yet given us in workmanship, it can only be regarded as a fresh landmark in the progression of his genius."

LITERATURE.

TWO BOOKS ON THE OLD TESTAMENT.

THE HIBBERT LECTURES.—The Origin and Growth of Religion as illustrated by the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews. By C. G. Montefiore. (Williams & Norgate.)

La Littérature des pauvres dans la Bible. Par Isidore Loeb. Preface de Théodore Reinach. (Paris: Léopold Cerf.)

THERE is as yet a great dearth of good comprehensive books on the Old Testament from a modern point of view. We seem to need at least four books relating to what is technically called the "higher criticism." One, designed for the general use of intelligent students, should give, on the whole, less advanced critical theories than Dr. Driver's Introduction, while taking up precisely the same friendly attitude towards orthodox theology. Another, hardly less urgently wanted, should address itself entirely to the best qualified students, and make no concessions whatever to theological conservatism, while representing more completely than the excellent work referred to the present position of critical problems. A third should be altogether different in form, and consist of a series of volumes for students on separate groups of Old Testament writings, on the plan faintly exemplified in my own book on the Wisdom-literature of the Hebrew Old Testament (including Sirach). And a fourth should be less technical in form than any of the preceding, and should give a popular but not therefore a superficial sketch of the history of the Old Testament literature from an advanced critical point of view, somewhat analogous to the admirable but too little known work of Reuss, Geschichte der heiligen Schriften Alten Testaments (ed. 2, 1890). And who would say that we have less need of good introductory books on the history of the Israelites and of their religion? We have, indeed, Wellhausen's admirable Sketch of the History of Israel and Judah (ed. 3, 1891), and Mr. Oxford's unpretending compilation from Stade and Wellhausen, A Short Introduction, &c. (1887). We have also long had Kuenen's masterly book, The Religion of Israel to the Fall of the Jewish State (1874-75), the historical importance of which can hardly be over-rated, but which needs (as every book of this sort must need, twenty years after its composition) a thorough revision and correction. And quite lately Prof. Paterson has given us a translation of Hermann Schultz's Old Testament Theology, which is a store-house of well arranged material, and none the worse for most English readers because it is by an accomplished dogmatic theologian. I pass over a few other books of importance simply on the ground that they are either less comprehensive or less constructive than the above, and once more emphasise the crying need which exists for good introductory books, from different critical and theological points of view, on these two great departments of Old Testament study.

It may be added that while writing these lines I have received a copy of a work which, for ordinary students, is at once a good provisional substitute for a history of the growth of the Old Testament literature and a readable introduction to Old Testament critical problems—Prof. Wildeboer's De Letterkunde des Ouden Verbonds, &c. It is, I understand, likely to be translated into German, and so, to readers of German and Dutch, I cordially recommend it as a work of high educational value.

Mr. Montefiore has now added one more to our list of "comprehensive" books. He speaks depreciatingly of his qualifications, but so must every one do who takes up such a difficult subject. No one who is acquainted with Mr. Montefiore's critical and theological essays can doubt that his selection by the Hibbert Trustees was fully justified. His critical views, so far as one can see from this volume, are those of advanced critics in general; and one of his main objects is to prove the accuracy of the literary analysis by the historical intelligibility of the view of the religious development of Israel based upon it. I cannot here enter into a full criticism of the book; but I may venture to say that this object, at any rate, has in a high degree been attained, and that the book is indispensable to all who are interested in the historical study of religion. No more lucid and instructive theological handbook is known to me. Whether it is a manifesto of the Darwinian philosophy (?), I must leave others to determine. It belongs, at any rate, to that class of books which, not less truly than the works of Darwin, contribute to a sound philosophy of development, and it will aid powerfully in strengthening the historic sense of young students. Of course, however, by "development" Mr. Montefiore does not mean progress in a straight line. He is well aware of the law of reaction; he also allows quite room enough for the initiative of personalities in advance of their age. No enlightened theologian therefore can object to his book. Abraham, indeed, is given up, at least as an historical figure. It was time that someone should confess the truth, which ought long ago to have found its way into our schools and colleges, though I almost wish that some use could have been made of the Abraham narratives in the historical sketch of later Israelitish religion. Moses, however, is treated with a fulness which, from a positive and from a negative point of view, is equally satisfactory. "Behind Moses," says Mr. Montefiore, "there stretches back the dark and limitless prehistoric age. But with Moses the historic period begins."

Our knowledge of this great personage may be much vaguer than Ebers, for instance (see his historical novel, Joshua), supposes, and some may deny that it can be called strictly historical. But facts seen through a mist (and therefore seen incorrectly) are better than no facts at all; and a fact of reasonable inference it appears to be that "Moses" not only gave oral decisions at the desert sanctuary of Kadesh, but also in doing so deposited among his people the germ of the ethical monotheism of the Prophets. It is a comparatively unimportant matter, even from an "apologetic" point of view, to prove (if this be a hopeful critical problem) the Mosaic authorship of the Decalogue. All that a lover of historical religion need desire is (as I have said elsewhere) to be able to contradict the view that before the prophetic period the religion of the best men in Israel was essentially the same as that of Israel's nearest neighbours, Moab, Ammon, and Edom. Mr. Montefiore is of opinion that we can do this.

"Let us be satisfied," he says, "that at the fountain-head of Israel's religion there stood a man of high inspiration, or exalted genius, whose new and [comparatively] spiritual teaching, accepted, though ill-understood, by his people in the flush of a new-born enthusiasm, was destined to break forth, after a long period of danger and decay, into wider and more glorious developments" (p. 54).

It may perhaps be objected to Mr. Montefiore, that for a Hibbert lecturer he shows an undue anxiety for Moses. Let it be remembered, however, not only that he is in his own way a churchman, but that the great space between the Exodus and the appearance of Amos must be filled up somehow, and that Mr. Montefiore has critical grounds for thinking that the religion of Moses had an ethical complexion. I shall be interested to learn from the church papers how orthodox students and their teachers are impressed by Mr. Montefiore's first lecture. Addressing such persons I have myself admitted that the Decalogue (in an earlier form which cannot now be certainly reconstructed, and which must be more archaic than the form proposed by Ewald) may not improbably have come from Moses. But there is only a step between this view and Mr. Montefiore's complete denial of the Mosaic authorship of the Decalogue, just as there is but a step between the view that there are pre-Exilic elements in our Psalter which cannot with any certainty be determined, and my own complete denial of the pre-Exilic origin of any single Psalm (with the very doubtful exception of the xviiith). The critical facts which we have to interpret are delicate and to some extent uncertain, and there must be different shades of critical opinion; we can afford to differ both with our neighbours and perhaps with our former selves.

I must not, however, accentuate any minute differences of opinion. I am entirely at one with Mr. Montefiore in his protest against Hermann Schultz's laconic and uncomprehending rejection of the theory put forward by Kuenen (Religion of Israel, i. 361) to account for the novel appearance of spiritual prophecy. Schultz's book (too tardily translated) is likely to be so much used by students that it is worth while to point out that the passage referred to (chap. x.) is written rather from a dogmatic than from a historical point of view. To reject the help of the imagination in bridging over abrupt transitions makes a living conception of history impossible. If the persecution of Manasseh prepared the way for the deeper religious ideas of Jeremiah, why should not the persecution of Ahab have done a similar service to religion in the time between Elijah and Amos? Reject either hypothesis, and a connected history of the higher religion of Israel cannot be written.

I pass on to Isaiah. On the religious ideas of this royal prophet it would be difficult to speak with precision, without opening grave questions of higher criticism. The outlines of Isaiah's ministry are, however, correctly given, and Mr. Montefiore duly refers to the changes which passed over the form of the prophet's anticipations. On p. 132, Hoffmann's explanation of a difficult phrase in Isaiah i. 17 is referred to with approval. And yet, learned and ingenious as his argument is, it will, I fear, not satisfy philologists. Should we not correct חַסְדֵּי, and render "chastise the violent man"? On the same page it might have been noticed that in Isaiah xxix. 13 the prophet actually calls the priestly tōra of Jerusalem a mere "precept of men that is taught." Shortly before this Mr. Montefiore refers to Isaiah's contemptuous word for idols, elilim. He need hardly, from his present point of view, attach so much importance to Nöldeke's etymology. How Isaiah explained the word is pretty obvious. A prophet who virtually explains ariel (Isaiah xxix.) as ur el (fire of God) could not help understanding elilim to mean "nonentities." In the sketch of Deuteronomy I notice with interest a criticism addressed to myself on p. 192. The hopefulness of the author (or authors) may no doubt have been exaggerated. More might have been said, without undue partiality, in praise of Jeremiah, whose influence on later times, even apart from his own real and reputed works, permits us to argue back to a great personality. I notice that Mr. Montefiore, with a cautious conservatism in which he follows Kuenen, argues against the more advanced criticism of Stade. I am by no means confident that this conservatism with which I heartily sympathise can be altogether maintained, or that Kuenen himself would have permanently maintained it. But to penetrate these secrets of an ancient literature, we must not have on hand either a comprehensive introduction or not less comprehensive Hibbert Lectures!

On Habakkuk, at any rate, it is now possible to speak more positively. This prophet need not any longer be included in the same class as Jeremiah's opponent, the false or unprogressive prophet Hananiah. Budde, taking a step in advance of the critical analysis of his predecessors, has shown that, putting aside the post-Exilic psalm in chap. iii., the subject of the prophecy is, not the overthrow of the Chaldaean power, but the Chaldaean destruction of Assyria, which at the present moment still tyrannises over Judah (see Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1892, pp. 383-393). It is true Habakkuk does regard his own people as righteous (Hab. ii. 4), and thereby comes into conflict with Jeremiah's late summary of his earlier prophecies; but he is conscious that "the law is torpid," and that "justice goeth not forth unto victory" (Hab. i. 4). In other words, he is still in the thrill of excitement caused by the reformation of Josiah, though he begins to be aware that the reformation is not as deep as he had perhaps hoped. Habakkuk is not as clear-sighted as Jeremiah seems to have been from the first; but, so far as his vision allowed, he saw truly. For it is psychologically probable enough, as I have tried to show elsewhere, that the defeat and death of Josiah ushered in a period of moral and religious retrogression, during which, if Habakkuk prophesied at all, he must have spoken very differently of the supposed "righteousness" of his countrymen.

Mr. Montefiore's treatment of Habakkuk is a specimen of his treatment of the Prophets in general. Not content with tracing the historical progress of religious thought in Israel, he criticises as reverently as possible the great leaders in that movement. This side of the book will doubtless give it popularity; and instead of blaming him for deviating from the strictest historical impartiality, I think that he deserves high praise. For I am sure that he would have preferred to leave such criticisms to the reader. It is only because the tradition of two thousand years has blinded men's eyes to the weak points in those religious heroes, that it is necessary for any who have "added to their faith knowledge" to help their less fortunate brethren. With more space at his command, I think that Mr. Montefiore's criticism might have been keener (nor would I except even the Second Isaiah from the ordeal) and his appreciations warmer. Upon no prophet has he bestowed more pains than upon Ezekiel, but, from excessive condensation, he does neither himself nor his subject full justice. But I think that there are few finer pages in his book than those in which, after mentioning that the Prophets of the eighth century "helped to produce a particularism narrower and more fatal than that which they had destroyed," and that "in this tragedy, of which Israel is the hero, the nations only too readily assumed the villain's part," he remarks:

"But these blemishes and imperfections of their teaching were as nothing to the greatness of the work which was accomplished by the Prophets for their own age and for posterity. Parallels to many of their noblest sayings can pretty easily be collected from other religious literatures, both of the East and of the West. Deeper appreciation and fuller discussion of the dark problems of human destiny are to be found among the thinkers of India, and, here and there, among the thinkers of Greece. Ignorant as the Prophets were of any bodily resurrection upon earth, still more of any spiritual life beyond the grave, a whole province of religious aspiration was cut off from them. . . . But no other teaching of the ancient world can show a similar grasp upon the essentials of true religion, with a like absence of refuse and of dross. . . . There was nothing esoteric about it, no inner mystery, which only the initiated might learn. If the doctrine, 'Seek Yahveh, seek goodness,' is elevated, it is also direct; it may be general, but all can understand it. Hence it is to the religion of these men, free at once from superstition on the one hand, and from mystery on the other, that the monotheism of the modern world owes its origin and its form" (pp. 158-160).

Thus the Prophets of that early age succeed to the high place occupied by Abraham in the orthodox histories of religion. To Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah three religions owe their origin—Judaism, Islam, and (in all its varied forms) Christianity. At the same time, the lecturer is not disposed to reform religion by throwing aside all subsequent developments. He admits, nay, he insists with warmth, that if the religion of Judaism was no "soulless deism," it was the Law which prevented it from becoming so; and if theologians succeed in forming a fairer estimate of "legalism," it will be in no slight degree owing to Mr. Montefiore's learned and eloquent exposition. He also tells us that He whom most moderns call Christ and the apostle Paul ("one of the greatest religious geniuses the world has ever seen," in spite of his "incorrect criticism" of the Law) triumphed over grave religious dangers "by bringing into more habitual and emphatic prominence the immanence of the Divine Spirit in the souls of men and the universal fatherhood of God."

And excellent as the earlier lectures are, the last four are still better, partly because the material is so much fuller, but also because of the lecturer's keen interest in the development of ideas. I am myself specially interested in the seventh lecture, in which much is said of the Hagiographa. I am in general accord with Mr. Montefiore, who sees that the boldest criticism is also the safest, and who is, I think, well aware that to admit the late date of a book in its present form does not involve denying that some of the elements which enter into its composition may be old. I am surprised, however, to find that it is "barely possible" to assign Isa. xi. 1-9 to the Persian period. Mr. Montefiore is so careful not to put forward personal guesses, that I cannot help wondering who has supported this view. The spirit of practical wisdom was in all ages needed by a king, and the passage referred to presents no special point of contact with late books.

The author of these Lectures is better aware than most English scholars of the many-sided character of Jewish development in the "legal" period. He gives some instructive hints on the conception of religion under the form of wisdom (p. 398), characteristic of a large circle of late Biblical writers, and calls attention to the "semi-intellectual element" in the phraseology of the earlier Prophets. I think, however, that a larger combination of causes must be recognised, and among these I cannot refuse to include indirect Zoroastrian influences. Prof. Max Müller's recently expressed views cannot be here discussed, but I may mention that the only new consideration offered by him (Theosophy, &c., pp. 52-56) makes against his (critically untenable) view that Zoroastrian monotheism was borrowed from the northern Israelites. There is, I think, only one way to set aside the hypothesis of possible Zoroastrian influences on the religion of the writers of Psalms and Proverbs, and that is to deny the antiquity of any parallel part of the Avesta. This way is, happily, not chosen by Prof. Max Müller. Now, even in the Gāthas (the main part of which, at any rate, is substantially ancient, and represents ideas which were widely current when Psalms and Proverbs were written) we find that Zoroastrian religion had a strong intellectual element. The personified understanding of Ahura is synonymous with his spirit; and if we have to choose between holding that the "heavenly wisdom" of the Yasna is borrowed from the "wisdom" which Yahveh made from everlasting (Prov. viii. 22-31), and, supposing that the reverse of this be true, there can be no question which is the more critical course. All, however, that I contend for is that the prior existence of a strong intellectualistic current in Zoroastrian religion may have been among the causes of the appearance of a not less strong tendency in post-Exilic Jewish religion. And even if, by an excess of theological caution, this be denied, yet the historian of Jewish religion cannot refuse to use the facts supplied by the earlier (the Zoroastrian) religion to illustrate the growth of the later (the Jewish) religion. On the Zoroastrian analogies of other Jewish conceptions I have no space to dilate; but it is quite useless to refer, as someone has done, to Hermann Schultz's Old Testament Theology in opposition to these views, for the simple reason that German theologians in general are not much acquainted with the comparative history of religions. Nor have I space to do more than express high appreciation of the eighth and ninth lectures; the last is, no doubt, disproportionately full, and descends below the period marked out for the lectures, but for valid reasons. Two appendices are added—one on the date of the Decalogue, the other (contributed by Mr. Schechter) on legal evasions of the law in Rabbinical Judaism.

It is not often that a Jew takes up Old Testament studies at the point to which they have been brought by Christian scholars. Mr. Montefiore has done this in England; the lamented Isidore Loeb, amid many distractions and obstacles, essayed to do it in France. Loeb was, however, pursued by the idea that it was time for critical students in France to throw off the tyranny of German scholarship; he has tried to be independent, without any satisfactory result for that criticism which is, or should be, neither German, nor French, nor English, but international, though still for the most part carried on by German workers. Psychologically, there is much to interest one in these pages. But critically, those who have followed the researches of the last twenty years will not find much that is directly helpful. The stimulating passages which may, no doubt, be met with, derive their quality, not so much from their novelty, as from a certain piquancy of paradox, to which the author's Jewish origin and French surroundings have contributed in almost equal proportions. His main idea (which reminds one of Grätz and Renan, and is not without affinities to views of Lagarde's able young disciple, Rahlfs) is that among the exiles in Babylonia a class of men arose who professed to be specially the servants of God and to be more faithful to Judaism than other Jews.

"They had made a vow of poverty and humility, and believed themselves destined to atone for the faults of the Jewish people, and to suffer for it in order to merit its deliverance. . . . It was they alone, or almost alone, who returned to Palestine, and they continued to live there as they had lived in Babylonia. Jewish Palestine had, therefore, dervishes, as it were, devoted to a life of piety, humble and poor by principle and by profession. They probably formed associations or confraternities; they called themselves the pious, the righteous, the poor, the humble. Under the Syrian domination they attained a preponderating influence, and lasted on even beyond the Maccabean period. Pharisaism is altogether penetrated with their doctrines."

In an elaborate study of the Psalter, Loeb collects the apparent references to these persons, and catalogues their ideas under headings. In the first appendix he shows that the Eighteen Benedictions of the Jewish liturgy are largely based on the Psalter and on Isaiah or Pseudo-Isaiah, and offers the conjecture that they were originally the prayer of these "dervishes." And in the second he collects the metaphors in which the dervish-poets gave such charming illustrations of their ideas.

The second part of the book is devoted to a somewhat less elaborate study of the second part of Isaiah, which turns out to be altogether post-Exilic. Is it not a resuscitated ancient Jewish dialectician who has penned that remarkable 18th section of Part ii. on the references to Cyrus?

"His compliments and his homage are addressed not so much to the Cyrus of history as to those of the future who are to deliver the Jews; and it is even not impossible that in reality his Cyrus is a Messianic, an idealised Cyrus, and not at all the veritable Cyrus. Thus, in the non-Jewish world, Cyrus would be that which David became among the Jews; he would be a sort of pagan counterpart of the Jewish Messiah."

It is not surprising that views such as these should have been warmly welcomed by M. Maurice Vernes, whose position as secretary of the Société des études juives must have brought him into close relations with the most active of its members, the lamented author of this posthumous work. The third part, relative to the poetical passages in the prose books of the Old Testament, might almost have been written by M. Vernes, who has already argued in the most elaborate manner that the Song of Deborah itself is a post-Exilic pseudonymous composition. It contains, no doubt, some sections which will commend themselves to critics who know better than Isidore Loeb how to unite boldness with caution, but which are not as complete philologically as could be wished. The author had intended to include a study on the "First Isaiah," many parts of which he believes are really pseudo-Isaianic. On the whole, apart from the personal interest of the book, its chief value consists in the careful summaries of exegetical data. The emendations of the text, so far as they are new, strike me as disappointing. Ps. xxii. 17 (c) is emended from Isa. xxxviii. 13; but Olshausen and Bickell long ago saw the truth (o is a combination of two glosses). Even in such minutias as these we cannot afford to neglect the Germans.

T. K. CHEYNE.

The Life and Work of John Ruskin. By W. G. Collingwood. In 2 vols. (Methuen.)

As a biographer, Mr. Collingwood, if not brilliant, is painstaking; and doubtless this is better. In some respects he seems to have been painstaking even to excess, and his book might have been less faulty if it had been written and completed more quickly. As it stands, judging by the varying style and manner of treating the subject, it has been written at such various times and under such different conditions as to lose some of its essential unity; and it appears, in a measure, to be a collection of records rather than a compacted book.

As to the style, it is a little bald sometimes; but of this we are the less disposed to complain after reading some passages of fancy writing—attempts at Ruskinian diction, we presume—which are to be found in the chapter called "A Love Story" and elsewhere:

"When he got the chance of separate conversation, a jibbing Pegasus plunged him into perverse and inconsiderate behaviour"; "He had the face that caught the eye, in Rome a few years later, of Keats' Severn, no mean judge surely of faces, and poets' faces"; "More than one fair damsel would have been willing enough to receive his suit."

The attempt at an easy descriptive style is hardly better: "Shall I take you for a visit there—to Brantwood as it was in those old times?" and so forth. On the other hand, Mr. Collingwood's best writing is excellent: compact, forcible, and unostentatious. For example:

"With all his intellectual independence, Mr. Ruskin was, and is, the least selfish of men. The fact has been obvious to many a one who has taken advantage of it, and scorned it as a weakness. But there have been people at all times to whom his character was more estimable than his genius; people like Miss Mitford, who wrote (early in this year 1847) that he was 'certainly the most charming person she had ever known.' With unselfishness there generally goes an unsuspecting habit, too little on its guard against vulgar knavery and folly; and a passion for abstract justice, that does not stop to weigh consequences or circumstances, and is liable to end in disappointment and bitterness, like Shakespeare's Timon, 'When man's worst sin is, he does too much good' (i. 134-5).

Why should a man who can write thus, ever descend to affectations? The manner of treatment is as various as the style, ranging from condescending patronage of Mr. Ruskin to reverential recognition of his greatness, and interspersed here and there with quite intolerable jocoseness. Mr. Collingwood does not seem certain in his own mind whether his subject is an eccentric person chiefly deserving of pity and not unbecomingly treated, now and again, with a sly joke, or a really great man. When, after giving a quotation from Fors, he adds:

"I do not call those classical allusions pedantic, for they are the spontaneous suggestions of an imaginative and scholarly mind. I do not call the quotations from Humboldt coarse, for they are the plain speech of an outraged sense of decency—outraged in a way which less delicate natures cannot comprehend."

It naturally occurs to us that the "seeming impertinence," for which he apologises a few pages earlier, has become painfully real. The conviction is strengthened that Mr. Collingwood does not appreciate the real quality of the man he has undertaken to reveal to the world, by the frequent lackey allusions to royalty. Lectures at Woolwich had been given before "crowded and distinguished audiences, among whom was Prince Arthur" (ii. 109). "The gentle Prince [Leopold], with his instinct for philanthropy, was not to be deterred by the utterances of Fors from respecting the genius of the Professor" (ii. 147). Prince Leopold had "honoured" the Sheffield Museum by visiting it (ii. 192). A "royal party honoured the Slade Professor with their visit" (ii. 151). And then, in the midst of it all, come flashes of what seems to be perfect insight. To a dull man the following incident would appear too trivial for record, but Mr. Collingwood has understood its full force and significance:

"Two young visitors, once staying at Brantwood with Mr. Ruskin alone, mistook the time and appeared an hour late for dinner. Not a hint or a sigh was given that might lead them to suspect their error; their hungry host was not only patient, but as charming as possible. Only next day they learnt from the servants that the dinner and the master had waited an hour for them" (ii. 192).

The same mental grasp is visible in the closing passage of the chapter on "The Diversions of Brantwood":

"And so you go in to tea and chess, for he loves a good game of chess with all his heart. He loves many things, you have found. He is different from other men you know, just by the breadth and vividness of his sympathies, by his power of living as few other men can live, in admiration, hope, and love. Is not such a life worth living, whatever its monument be?" (ii. 201).

On the whole, facts and incidents have been carefully gathered and well recorded. Some critics have detected errors, but none of vital importance. Even here, however, there is a certain amount of incompleteness. The threads of the narrative are not fully followed, suggesting the idea that the writer had been so long over his task that he had forgotten how much he had already told and what there was yet to tell or complete. For instance, Carlyle is often mentioned—though hardly as often or as fully as his peculiar influence on Mr. Ruskin would seem to require—but we are never told how or when or where the two men first became known to one another. Again, there is an allusion to the Sheffield communists who, for a time, worked on the farm of the St. George's Guild. Their reign was brief, but for all that Mr. Collingwood says to the contrary they might be there still. The allusions to "Secretary Howell" should either have been fuller, or omitted altogether. In like manner the reference to the episode of Miss Octavia Hill is so vague as to be unmeaning; and in this case the vagueness cannot surely be due to any sense of delicacy, true or false, seeing that the whole history is written out in Fors. It is, as it seems to us, false delicacy—or is it only another lapse?—which leads the biographer to leave the story of Mr. Ruskin's marriage half told.

Evidently this book might have been better, or worse. As it is, it helps to a better understanding of one whose public life, with its many eccentricities, caused him to be undervalued by some, and unduly, because foolishly, exalted by others. Mr. Ruskin was himself a hero worshipper. From his youth up, as he has said, he has been "seeking the fame and honouring the work of others." But to be a true hero-worshipper, one must be great, not only that the choice of the object of worship may be right, but that the worship itself may be worthy. Mr. Ruskin in his hero-worship devoted himself to defending the fame of Turner and "explaining the power, or proclaiming the praise of Luini, of Carpaccio, of Botticelli, of Carlyle"; and his endeavour was, he said, "to bring others to see what I rejoiced in, and understand what I had deciphered." The persons who have made Mr. Ruskin the object of their hero-worship may have chosen well, but assuredly they seldom revealed greatness in their worship. Instead of bringing others to see what they rejoiced in, and understand what they had deciphered, they merely gushed. The Ruskin as revealed by the societies named after him was a quite unimportant figure compared with the man whose personality is made partly visible by Mr. Collingwood. The stress was laid on the eccentricities, which were many, but which, when the man is truly revealed, sink into insignificance, or rather, taking their true place and relation, give an added grace. Now we see that organising honest street-sweeping or road-making, was not an isolated incident, dictated by whim, but was a natural manifestation in the small of the same shining virtue which is revealed in Mr. Ruskin's greatest efforts. In like manner, we identify the chivalry which defended Turner with the chivalry in private life revealed in the anecdote already quoted. The nearer we come to Mr. Ruskin in the details of his private life, the better do we understand his public work, and recognise the greatness of his genius and the nobleness of himself. Mr. Ruskin has, long since, told his own story in his own way, and his writings were always a revelation of himself. Of Fors, in particular, this is true. The real John Ruskin, acute, generous, impetuous, wayward, always disinterested, is there. But the key to all this, which shall make the revelation complete, is to be found in a methodical personal narrative. Here the characteristics of the man are not only indicated, but illustrated. Mr. Collingwood helps to provide this. If he has not succeeded, in all respects, in revealing the real Ruskin, whole and symmetrical, to the world, he has given important aid in this direction, for which persons who think and read in a spirit of honest criticism should be thankful.

WALTER LEWIN.

Aberdeen Doctors: a Narrative of a Medical School. By E. Hill Burton Rodger. (Blackwoods.)

THERE is a romance of medicine like the romance of history and of war; and the author of this narrative, the daughter of John Hill Burton, the late Historiographer-Royal of Scotland, has come near to the production of a most admirable work. A little more precision of style, and the repression of a tendency at times to repeat or digress—not unnatural or unbecoming to the writer in "the melting mood" with a reminiscential vein—would have added much to the value of the book, which is sure to find a public far beyond that of medical men. The "Scot abroad," to use the familiar phrase of her distinguished father, will here meet many pleasant recollections of the North, and the general reader in the bypaths of the curious in history or literature will find a gleaming that will fully reward him.

The history of medicine in Britain is largely, as it still remains, the history of the Scottish medical schools. Many will recall the scene, drawn from the life by Smollett in his Roderick Random, of the examination in the London Surgeons' Hall, when surgeons in the navy got their degrees in as mysterious ways as Goldsmith received his at Padua; and how the men that trod the quarterdeck with Trunnion, Hatchway, and Pipes had an information that scarcely ran beyond the concoction of a bolus, or what could have been acquired from a Herbal and some elementary medical manuals. When Goldsmith remarked airily to Topham Beauclerc that although he was a M.D. of Padua he prescribed only for his friends, the wit hinted prescription to his enemies as more beneficial to all and to the poet himself, who was unable to diagnose and treat his own malady of fever.

The mediæval universities, as founded chiefly on canon and civil law, were but poorly equipped in the department of physic. The reader of Prescott cannot fail to remember the treatment of Don Carlos the son of Philip II. of Spain, or even of Charles II. at Whitehall—treatment that would now be hardly within the imagination of a "medicine-man" in the Dark Continent. Improvement came from the Low Countries, through Leyden and Boerhave, who died in 1738. Leyden and Utrecht rose above Bologna and Paris; and the influence of Boerhave was felt through the long educational and religious connections of the universities so happily described in the character of the aspiring juridical saddler in Scott's Heart of Midlothian.

Though the book lacks arrangement and plan, there is much that is very interesting in the account of anatomy in the days of Sir Astley Cooper, and in the "resurrectionist" time of the Irishmen Burke and Hare at Edinburgh in 1829. During the Revolution Paris was the El-Dorado of the anatomist, where bodies were a drug in the market, and ran from a franc upwards, in the regime of the great surgeon Desault, and his successor Bichat at the Hôtel-Dieu, contrasting strongly with Edinburgh, where a body cost from £8 to £14, and more so with Aberdeen, where the supply largely came through organised "lifting" from new graves by the medical authorities and others. The passing of the Anatomy Act has rendered impossible such cases as the following, quoted from the diary of a physician in London (p. 221):

"Got six packed—three for Edinburgh, one to Guy's, January 15. Packed two large, one small for Edinburgh. Jack and Butler drunk as before."

These professionals amassed, it seems, a fortune of £6,000, while others when not engaged in "working" bodies, would be "stealing teeth from wounded men in stricken fields, haunting the battle fields of the Peninsula, adding still further to the horrors of war."

Wherever the language is spoken, the names of "Gregory's mixture" and "Aber-nethy biscuits" have followed. On these and many other old worthies the book affords much bright information; and a very able chapter will be found devoted to the creation of the medical department in the Peninsular War by Sir James McGrigor, who performed a part similar to that of Baron Larrey under Napoleon, and whose skilful manipulation raised regiments from the hospitals at the critical time when the Emperor wrote to his brother Joseph that we could no longer hold the Peninsula. The old days come back again in the pages of Lever in the life of the army doctors with the Connaught Rangers and the Enniskillens; or in the Crimea, when, through official blundering, the proportion of deaths was nine from disease to only two in battle, with the tents in a morass, and the stores designed for Scutari rotting in the hulls of the vessels in the Bay of Balaklava.

Those who think, with Macaulay, that the "dignity" of history in the minds of Dryasdusts has done more for its corruption than any other illusion, and that more can be gleaned from a memoir or from Sir Wm. Temple's love-letters than from all the campaigns of Louis XIV., will learn from the volume before us a great deal of solid information about the educational and social ways in the north-east of Scotland during the last four centuries. The attention of Mr. Andrew Lang should be directed to the account of the erratic attempt of the famous Duchess of Gordon, the friend of Burns, to convert the most easterly town in the land into a Bournemouth, from which Sir Walter Scott is supposed to have borrowed the spa scenes in St. Ronan's Well. It seems an echo of another world. Yet years ago we heard from the head of a college in Oxford how, in visiting President Routh of Magdalen, the centenarian had innocently remarked that in the Parks they had the bracing air of Scotland tempered by the hills of Cumberland! There was no Engadine then; and that remark rose before us as we read of the poet Beattie and his son suffering from a wasting disease of the lungs in the old burgh of the Keiths at Peterhead, rival to the "wind-swept Troy."

From the old "mediciner" at King's College to Sir Andrew Clark is a long history. Both are here. The book is a contribution to the quatercentenary of the Northern university. By the alumni in arts and in medicine, as well as by a wide class of readers, it will be cordially welcomed as a narrative no less striking and well told than redolent of the perseveridum ingenium of the author's distinguished father.

W. KEITH LEASK.

Experiences of a Prussian Officer during the Russo-Turkish War, 1877-78. By Graf von Pfeil. (Edward Stanford.)

COUNT VON PFEIL served with distinction in the campaign of 1866 against Austria, and through the Franco-German war. He had won the Iron Cross. Two such campaigns would have satisfied most men—not so Count von Pfeil. Appetite quickens with eating; and on August 30, 1877, our author was informed that his application to enter the Russian army in the field had been complied with. It may be asked why this Prussian officer interposed in a quarrel that in no way concerned either Germany or himself. He is avowedly no philo-Slav. There is not a scintilla of enthusiasm throughout the book. This nineteenth-century Dugald Dalgetty seems to have enlisted from a sheer love of fighting. The Berlin correspondent of a London newspaper has gone so far as to state that the Count was a spy of the Prussian staff, and that he has now been rewarded with a command in a Silesian regiment near the Russian frontier. His special knowledge of Russia would then be of prime value in the event of a conflict between the two countries. There is not one tittle of evidence to support this assertion; but such reports are at least evidence of the stir which his book has made in military circles on the Continent. They also tend to show the breach between the two empires—a breach which only manifested itself after the Treaty of Berlin, and which this book will tend to widen.

While fully admitting the many excellences of these reminiscences, the want of sympathy shown by the author for his former brother officers in the Russian service jars on the reader. For the Russian private soldier (the Cossack excepted), he entertains a great respect; but, "as regards the Russian line officers as a body," he writes: "They do not necessarily require the same culture nor the same fundamental principles of character which distinguish the German corps of officers; for the whole nation, and, therefore also the soldier, stands on a much lower level than the German."

There are numerous references throughout the book to the unpopularity of the war. "All the much-vaunted enthusiasm for our oppressed Bulgarian and Servian brothers, which was got up by the Pan-slavists, was one of the grossest swindles that history has ever known." Later on, when he reached the Tsar's headquarters at Gomi-Studen, the Count tells us that, if a secret vote had at that time (September, 1877) been taken among the officers as to whether the war should be continued or not, three-fourths would have voted to return to Russia, and to leave the Bratushki ("little brothers"), the Bulgarians, to take care of themselves. The Count frequently heard officers of the Guard making use of such expressions as these: "Ah, if I were only lucky enough to be back in St. Petersburg," or "I'd give anybody a good round sum to give me a slight flesh wound." Let us hope that such cowardly utterances fell only from the lips of officers whom Vereschagin has satirised in his well-known picture—"Si jeune et si bien décoré!" The soldiers give the nickname of "pheasants" to their young officers who glitter with decorations, but are destitute of scars. When the Count reached the 33rd Elets Infantry Regiment in the Hainkiöi Valley, the brave commander of that brave regiment bore additional testimony to the universal distaste for the war. The Count comments on the "exasperating indifference" with which the Guards were received on their return to Russia. This does not apply to St. Petersburg, where the Guards received a fitting welcome. But I can myself testify to the chilling reception the Russian army met with from their own countrymen, as I happened to meet returning troops all the way from Moscow to Sevastopol.

In Bucharest the author made the acquaintance of Prince Alexander of Battenberg. As early as September, 1877, Prince Alexander was spoken of as the future Prince of Bulgaria, "but the young Prince strenuously opposed the idea, and declared that he would never accept the position." The Count's divisional-commander was Prince Sviatopolk-Mirski—a distinguished officer and now Ataman of the Cossacks. Prince Mirski's marital as well as military experiences began in the Caucasus. He married a Circassian; that is, he took her on trial for a year, and then returned her to her parents together with a sum of money. He afterwards married the daughter of the last King of Georgia. This "marvellously beautiful being" died in her first confinement; and it was not till many years later that Prince Mirski married his third wife, the daughter of a Russian landed proprietor. The prince, unlike his superior in command, General Radetski, was on the best of terms with his wife. General Radetski never wrote to his wife, and therefore considered arrangements for a fieldpost with the army quite superfluous. In other respects Prince Mirski and General Radetski had much in common, and both formed a striking contrast to their more brilliant colleague Skobelev.

The reputation of Skobelev, both at home and abroad, is immense. According to our author he "owed not the least part of his fame to the reporters, whom he treated very well and recommended for decorations" (p. 58). This is the earliest allusion to Skobelev in these Experiences, and it cannot be said that the allusions become more friendly as they proceed. The first time the author met him was on that memorable day, January 9, 1878. In the first week of 1878, the passage of the Balkans was decided upon. The plan adopted was for Skobelev to lead one column starting from Gabrova, and for Prince Mirski to lead another column starting from Travna, while General Radetski, the superior of both, held the Turks in front of Shipka. Englishmen will understand the position when they realise that Skobelev played the same part to Prince Mirski that Blücher did to Wellington. Skobelev did not arrive till the second day. Prince Mirski sent the Count to him to request him to come. Count von Pfeil excused himself for not speaking in Russian. Skobelev replied in German:—

"Speak whatever language you like—German, French, or English. It's all the same to me. You must have rather longed for me yesterday, but I never attack till I have all my troops together. I shall explain all later on to you, but now, before I ride to Prince Mirski, I must thank my brave troops; if you like, you can accompany me."

Then follows the most noteworthy passage in the book, a passage with which we must conclude our extracts:

"It is now well known, as we indeed had never for a moment doubted, that he had delayed intentionally, on mean grounds of personal interest, in the hope that Prince Mirski would be beaten, and that he (Skobelev) would on the following day wipe out the defeat and appear as the hero of the battle" (p. 209).

It is impossible to exaggerate the gravity of this charge. It has stung the friends of the late Gen. Skobelev to the quick. A very different view to Pfeil's is taken by Col. F. W. Greene in his History of the War. That high authority describes Skobelev's action on January 9 as "the most brilliant assault of the whole war, deciding the day and the fate of the entire Turkish army of Shipka." This is not merely a question of military doctors disagreeing, but of a national hero being represented as a scoundrel. In modern Russian literature Skobelev fills the same unique position as Henry V. in Shakspeare. He towers above the other commanders in that great campaign—Totleben and Gourko perhaps alone excepted. Is this popular view of Skobelev wrong? It is impossible in these columns to pursue this tempting theme.

Those interested in the riddle of the Eastern Question, which Skobelev did so much to solve, should read these Experiences. The style of Graf von Pfeil is a model of simplicity and directness. While we regret that this book was not published until Skobelev was in his grave, we must congratulate the translator, Col. Bowdler, on having discharged his duty faithfully and well. The sketch map of the famous operations at Shipka is such as might be expected from Mr. Stanford.

By M. Bramston. (Seeley.)

Studies and Stories. By Mrs. Molesworth. (Innes.)

The Girl in White, and other Stories. By Andrew Deir. (Elliot Stock.)

The Red Sultan has a sub-title, which is rather too long to be given in the proper place above, but it may be transcribed here, because it will give the reader some idea of the kind of fare provided for him when he turns from this notice to the book itself. That he will so turn we take for granted; at any rate, he will do so if he attaches any weight whatever to the opinion of a critic in the ACADEMY, for the present reviewer considers The Red Sultan an exceptionally good story. It consists, according to the author's own description, of the narrative of "the Remarkable Adventures in Western Barbary of Sir Cosmo McLaurin, Bart., of Monzie, in the County of Perth"; and not only is Sir Cosmo most admirable company, but his adventures fully deserve the epithet applied to them, while the style in which they are presented to us is full of life and spirit. For his narrative ground-plan, Mr. Cobban has gone to the Hebrew Scriptures; and though the David of the new romance bears very little resemblance to his ancient prototype, the Uriah, Bathsheba, and Absalom of the story bears a recognisable resemblance to our biblical acquaintances. The original narratives are elaborated in a very happy fashion. Absalom, or rather the Red Prince, is a singularly fine creation. He is a half-breed; and, like most half-breeds, he has some of the qualities, and more of the defects, of both the races to which he belongs. The deterioration of his character, or rather the triumph of those baser elements which circumstances have conspired to keep in the background, is a masterpiece of skilful delineation, though Mr. Cobban might, perhaps, with advantage have refrained from accentuating the awakening of the sleeping devil by the repulsively gory scene of slaughter which makes one of the chapters in the third volume a nightmare of horrible invention. Still, a story of semi-barbaric life cannot altogether conform to the "prunes and prism" conception of art; and the wholesale beheading, with all its sickening accessories, is a solitary lapse into the gruesome. The Red Sultan is a fine romance, well-planned and well-told. It has form and colour and movement, and it is not lacking in that pleasant piquancy given by the salt of humour.

The influence of Mr. George Meredith's individuality is making itself manifest in the usual fashion. He is no longer a solitary master; he is the head of a rapidly increasing school, and Mrs. Stevenson is one of his disciples. She has, however, in the volumes of Mrs. Elphinstone of Drum largely escaped the obvious perils of discipleship. The modifying adverb has to be used, because Mrs. Stevenson has not wholly resisted the temptation to reproduce Mr. Meredith's mere manner—that idiosyncrasy of expression which cannot be really reproduced, but only imitated with the measure of either flatness or caricature that necessarily belongs to an imitation. In the conversations, more especially, are we conscious of a strain after the Meredithian conciseness of epigram or unexpectedness of metaphor, as when, for example, Mrs. Kil-marnock remarks of her husband:

"That's why I get into the habit of saying to my friends, 'Never mind him.' It is a sort of application of acetic acid to harden them against a possible focus of his disagreeableness on themselves."

But though Mr. Meredith's manner had better be left alone, his methods may be safely followed by anyone who is able to utilise them. No one is a greater master than he of the art of using a happily invented situation as a means to a fine display and differentiation of the characters involved in it; and James Elphinstone's conduct in contracting a marriage which he is all but certain is bigamous creates just a situation as this. We see Elphinstone himself, his two wives, his friend Muir, and his brother-in-law, Tom Rathbone, from an angle which only the one set of circumstances could have made available as a point of view, and it is just the point which gives the really characteristic pose. Mrs. Elphinstone of Drum has its weak pages; but it is an unmistakably clever book, and it reveals qualities that are more valuable than cleverness.

Grisly Grisell is a very pretty and graceful piece of work, though it may be doubted whether Miss Yonge is quite so successful in any of her historical romances as she is in the best of her stories of contemporary life. It would be unfair to speak of the former as heavy, but they do seem a little laboured: the pen does not move quite so trippingly among the stormy records of the Wars of the Roses as among the quieter annals of the rectory or the vicarage. Still this latest of Miss Yonge's stories has a real charm, mainly given by the portrait of the sweet and gracious heroine, who is one of the most winning of the author's creations. The old motive of a husband falling in love with his own wife is pleasantly and freshly utilised; and in its quiet way Grisly Grisell is a very enjoyable book.

Dodo suggests, not for the first time by any means, the question whether it is really possible that a woman, who is absolutely devoid of human affection, and does not even pretend to the possession of it, should receive, not from one person but from nearly everybody, the most ardent and self-sacrificing devotion. This question, however, deserves to be answered with more seriousness than is likely to be at the command of any one fresh from the perusal of Mr. Benson's brilliant novel. Dodo, in her frankly inhuman way, is such a captivating creature that if she is not possible, she ought to be—in fiction, that is; for if she has ever existed in real life it is to be hoped that by this time she is, like the bird whose name she bears, extinct. The fault of the book is that its amazing cleverness is too constantly in evidence; Mr. Benson's idea of an exhibition of literary fireworks being to keep the rockets always in the air, instead of allowing their effect to be heightened by an occasional interval of darkness. However, cleverness even in superfluity is not a thing to be grumbled at; and in twenty years Mr. Benson may be more frugal of his coloured stars and golden rain—not of choice, but of sad necessity. I hope not, but this is the usual thing, so we will enjoy his liberal vivacity while we may. It is certainly not likely that 1893 will give us another book as sparkling as Dodo.

There is a certain substance—substantiality is perhaps the better word—in the novels of Mr. Paul Cushing which reminds us of Charles Reade. Mr. Cushing has Reade's strong feeling for flesh and blood, and his men and women seem to have a much more intense physical life than is possessed by most characters of fiction. The title of his new book has at first sight a certain Meredithian look, but as the "Chin" is a place and not a feature it is less grotesque than it seems to be. The story deals with the deep-laid scheme of a certain Major Chidiock Quarry, V.C., for the unmasking of a young woman who has inherited the property of his late uncle, and by whom, to the best of his belief, the poor old gentleman has been murdered. His grand idea of entering the service of Miss Knivett as a butler with a view to obtaining incriminating evidence is rather far-fetched, to say nothing of other objections; but whatever may be his story, Mr. Cushing always knows not only how to tell it, but how to make it tell. It is to be hoped, however, that he is not going to follow the bad new fashion of producing novels with their ends chopped off. High art—if this be high art—is all very well; but the desire for a dénouement is rooted in human nature, and it cannot be eradicated.

Long ago, in the humorous verse of A Fable for Critics, Lowell remarked that all the European notabilities in literature and art had reappeared or, as the Theosophists would say, had been reincarnated in America. The process of reincarnation seems to be going on still; for in Mr. John Kendrick Bangs, our English Mr. Anstey seems to have found a transatlantic double. In Toppleton's Client we have even the Ansteyan motive of a transference of personalities; but Mr. Bangs (a name of doubtful credibility) serves the familiar dish with such piquant American sauce that it is much more palatable than the ordinary réchauffé. The story is, indeed, a most mirth-provoking specimen of farcical extravaganzas, rich in humour of that peculiar quality of mordancy which seems to be given only by an American atmosphere. If Mr. Bangs can repeat the success of Toppleton's Client, he will sensibly promote "the gaiety of nations."

The seven short stories contained in the new volume by Mrs., or Miss, M. Bramston are characterised by the author's wonted grace and charm. "The Wild Lass of Estmore" and two or three of its companions deal with the life of the past; but "A Modern Girl" is a delightful present-day study, and "The Island of Progress" is an imaginative glance into a century of the future, in which the scientific ideal is realised. "Touched and Gone" is, perhaps, the best of the seven, though all are good. It is the story of the redemption of a ne'er-do-well, and it has a fine tenderness and pathos.

The "studies" in Mrs. Molesworth's book, Studies and Stories, are not tales, but pleasant essays, full of homely wisdom, written for the "girl readers" to whom the book is dedicated. As this column is devoted to fiction, it is only necessary to say of these papers that two of them—"Coming Out" and "English Girlhood"—deal with conduct, while the other three—"Hans Christian Andersen," "Mrs. Ewing's Less Well-known Book," and "Fiction: its Use and Abuse"—are, as their titles indicate, of literary interest. The five stories are very diverse in character, including a fairy tale, "Princess Ice-heart," a tale of the supernatural, "Old Gervais," and three exceedingly pretty stories of contemporary life—"Once Kissed," "The Sealskin Purse," and "The Abbaye de Cerisy." They are somewhat slight, but they exhibit all the familiar beauties of Mr. Molesworth's delightful work.

Mr. Deir's half-dozen tales are decidedly readable, though one or two of them would be more readable still if there were rather more of story and less of talk. The talk itself is bright enough, but it sensibly retards the movement, and leaves a feeling of a lack of artistic proportion. "Stranger than Fiction" is an ingeniously grotesque invention; and the last three stories are not wanting in power.

SOME BOOKS ON ANCIENT HISTORY.

Pagan and Christian Rome. By R. Lanciani. (Macmillans.) The frontispiece—from a photograph of Giulio Romano's painting of the battle between Constantine and Maxentius—very aptly typifies the contents of a book in which the reader's interests are divided between the Empire and the Church, catacombs and columbaria, the tombs of the Caesars and the portraits of the Popes. To readers of every class Prof. Lanciani has something to tell; and his book will heighten the enjoyment of an actual visit to Rome, the memory of a past visit, and the anticipation of one to come. His purpose is to "mention only subjects illustrated by recent or little-known discoveries, or else to select such representative specimens as may help the reader to compare pagan with Christian art and civilisation." But the progress of discovery in the Eternal City is rapid, and Prof. Lanciani is as well versed in old prints and papers germane to his subject as he is in the actual exploration of the soil of Rome. He helps us by a copy of an original drawing to realise the remarkable find (in 1485) of the body of a girl, still undecayed, and can tell us from old records of unfinished medieval diggings where there are still good things to be looked for underground. The good things are not of one kind only; Christian antiquities are yet to be found, as well as pagan ones, and Lanciani's interest in both sides of the great dividing line of religion gives a singular wealth of topics to his volume. In his work on Ancient Rome he asked what had become of all the earth removed by Trajan from the Forum where his Column stands; and he has since found it in the necropolis of the Via Salaria, where "the whole tract between the Salaria and the Pinciana was raised twenty-five feet." In and under this enormous mass of earth are two layers of tombs, one of the early imperial epoch and one of Hadrian's time, and Christian remains also. This queer mixture of things Christian and ante-Christian gives the keynote to Prof. Lanciani's chapters, and he begins by describing the transformation of Rome from a pagan to a Christian city. He shows in some detail how the Church accepted old rites and customs which were not offensive to her principles; how she made her sacred buildings into museums of precious objects, as the older Rome had done with her temples; how the great imperial public buildings were transformed into places of Christian worship, while chapels or shrines took the place of aræ compitales; how mosaics and statuary were borrowed, adapted, and renamed for Christian uses; and how sacred and profane conceptions are mixed in the names of some Roman churches. For this last point he cites the name of St. Maria in Minerva; but surely that name is usually given as St. Maria sopra Minerva, and points to a different train of thought. Our author, by the way, should underpin that church and see what there is beneath it; he might perhaps find something to compare in importance even with the record of the Sibylline games, of which record he here prints Mommsen's reading. He reports the finding of the last resting place of Galba's adopted son Piso and of members of his family, but he seems to know nothing of the story of the dissipation of their ashes which appeared in England. The advantages of the new processes of illustration have never been better shown than in the full-page plates at pp. 198, 264. Altogether a very charming book.

Outlines of Roman History, by H. F. Pelham. (Percival.) This book is a reprint, with many additions and alterations, of the article "Roman History" which appeared in the last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. The method on which the Camden Professor has handled his subject reminds us most of that of H. Schiller's Kaiserzeit. It is a plain, close style, in which room is saved for every subject of real value by the steady omission of personal anecdote and of the merely picturesque and story-telling elements. Livy and Tacitus are ransacked, but for facts only; legends are sternly neglected at one end of the recital, and court-gossip at the other. This plan would make a somewhat dry book for school use (indeed, we ought all of us to read about Cloelia and Mucius Scaevola once in our lives) but it gives an excellent and trustworthy résumé for older readers, to whom its sober and reasonable treatment of disputed points and uncertain ground will be very welcome. Well up to the latest information or theories, Prof. Pelham pays special attention to the constitutional history of the Roman people, and to all the great changes (as Hellenism) which passed over them. He begins with an account of the various kinds of indirect evidence by which something may be ascertained about the earliest Rome. Then come the struggle between the orders, and the conquest of Italy. Two chapters on the conquest of the Mediterranean countries are followed by an estimate of the Roman state and people during these great wars. Getting fuller as it goes on, the History takes us next to the period of revolution and the condition of the empire during that period; after that, to the dictatorship of Julius and the foundation of the principate; and then, becoming briefer again as it comes to the worse days, it leads us, in successive chapters, through the Julian line, the Flavian and Antonine Caesars, and the men of the third century, down to the barbaric invasions. With the extinction of the Western Empire it ends, at as natural a halting-place as the story of the Eternal City can be expected to furnish. We can warmly recommend Prof. Pelham's outline of these many centuries.

History of Federal Government in Greece and Italy. By E. A. Freeman. Edited by J. B. Bury. Second edition. (Macmillans.) "The first and only volume of Mr. Freeman's History of Federal Government appeared in 1863."

Drawn aside from the subject after that date by the greater interest which he felt in the Norman Conquest, Mr. Freeman never resumed it. But the present volume contains, in addition to the old chapters, further matter which the author had intended for his second volume—some pages on the German Confederacy, and a "full account of the defective forms of Federalism which have appeared in Italy, comprising the Leagues of early Italian history and the Lombard Confederation of a later age." Hence the slightly altered title under which the second edition appears. The editor has executed his task with all piety. He has revised the references to authorities, and placed in an appendix all the observations necessary to bring the history of Greek federalism up to the present state of knowledge. But "the only matter of importance in which Mr. Freeman's account of the Achaian and Aetolian federal systems needs modification is the constitution of the Senates. We have now direct evidence that the Aetolian Senate was a body of representatives chosen by the States," and there are some indications of the same being true of the Achaian Senate. The editor has not altered any of the references to the events of 1863 or thereabout, and so the reader can still enjoy those expressions of indignant honesty with regard to current politics which were such a mark of Mr. Freeman's style. Many allusions might have been modified: sometimes the professor was mistaken, though more often time has proved his judgment sound. But it is a good principle to leave such passages untouched; and so now this new edition of a very valuable work goes forth, with many fresh remarks and observations, but with all the manner and tone of the great historian still about it.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. DAVID NUTT will immediately follow up Florio's Montaigne, which began his new series of "Tudor Translations," with reprints in the same style of The Athiopian Historie of Heliodorus, englished by Thomas Underdowne (1587), and of The Golden Asse of Apuleius, translated out of Latin into English by William Adlington (1566). Each of these volumes will have an introduction by Mr. Charles Whibley.

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS will be the publishers of the English translation of M. Zola's Dr. Pascal, by Mr. Ernest A. Vizetelly. The book will be illustrated with an etched portrait of the author.

"STORIES FROM SCRIBNER" is the general title of a series of volumes, six in number, which will contain the best short stories that have appeared in Scribner's Magazine during the past few years. The first three volumes will be published in this country by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co. during August, and will be called respectively Stories of New York, Stories of the Railway, and Stories of the South.

MR. ALEXANDER GARDNER, of Paisley, will publish shortly a History of the Rosneath Peninsula, written by Mr. William Charles Maughan, who has himself lived there for more than twenty years, and has obtained much traditional information from old inhabitants now dead. He has also been permitted access to the title-deeds of the Duke of Argyll, the principal landowner. The principal subjects dealt with are: the descent of the landed estates, the ecclesiastical history of the Old Church, agriculture, the rise of feuing or building leases, folklore, and ornithology. The Marquis of Lorne contributes an original poem to the volume, which will further have illustrations by Mr. Alexander M'Gibbon.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces a History of Chipping Lambourne Church, by Mr. John Footman, founded on local documents, with numerous illustrations of the architecture of the building. Incidentally, it gives an account of a remarkable adventure by a gentleman "who descended from the top of the tower to the ground in a Pynace," in 1607.

A NEW book on sport, by Mr. R. J. Lloyd Price, entitled Dogs Ancient and Modern and Walks in Wales, will be shortly published by Messrs. Eglinton & Co. Besides containing interesting matter on the various breeds of dogs for sporting purposes, it has six or seven chapters devoted to various angling haunts in North Wales.

MR. F. VON WENCKSTERN, assistant librarian to the Japan Society, is engaged upon the compilation of a Japanese Bibliography from 1859 to 1893, in continuation of the Bibliography of Pagés. He has already collected and classified several thousand titles.

MESSRS. OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER announce: Sons of the Croft, by the Rev. P. Hay Hunter; and One False Step, by Mr. Andrew Stewart—both in their series of "Pocket Novels"; and also The Mystery of North Fortune, by Messrs. George Douglas and Henry Herrick.

MESSRS. GINN & Co., of Boston, have nearly ready The Mark in Europe and America: a review of the discussion on early land tenure, by Mr. E. A. Bryan, president of Vincennes University.

THE Paternoster Press will publish immediately a series of lectures on Church and Dissent, which have been delivered by the Rev. Richard Free in North Kensington.

THE first edition of Annie S. Swan's new story, Homespun, has been sold before publication. A second edition will be ready in about a fortnight.

MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE have just published a new edition—the fourth—of Miss Betham Edwards's story, Bridget.

DURING next week Messrs. Sotheby will be engaged in selling a very miscellaneous collection of books, brought together from different quarters. Among them is the library of the late Sir John Pope Hennessy, removed from Youghal, which is not quite of the character we should have expected: perhaps it was purchased, or acquired en bloc. It consists almost entirely of books in Latin, printed at foreign presses during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, or even earlier. Among them are two with the book-plate of Pirckheimer, which was engraved for him by Albert Dürer. There are, however, several books by, or relating to, Sir Walter Raleigh, and some early copies of Spenser and Sidney. We may also specially mention Gearnon's Parrhas an Anna (Louvain, 1645), which is stated to be one of the rarest books in the Irish language. The library which precedes this—that of Mr. H. D. Colvill Scott, of Brookwood—is chiefly notable for its collections of works relating to Burns and Carlyle. Hidden elsewhere in the Catalogue, we observe a copy of Daphnis et Chloe, with the illustrations of the Regent of Orleans.

THE Shelley exhibition in the Guildhall Library, which has been formed and arranged by members of the Shelley Society, will remain open until Saturday next, July 22. Admission is free. This is undoubtedly the most interesting collection of MSS., letters, books, portraits, and other relics of the poet that has ever been brought together. It includes the holograph MSS. of a few of his poems, copies of many of his rarest pamphlets, first editions of all his works, and examples of that copious privately printed literature relating to Shelley that has sprung up in recent years.

MESSRS. GAY & BIRD have sent us a little book, entitled Early Bibles of America, by the Rev. Dr. John Wright, rector of St. Paul, Minnesota. It seems to be intended only for the "general reader," and is sadly lacking in bibliographical accuracy. For example, it gives no reference to Mr. J. C. Pilling's Bibliography of the Algonquian languages, published in 1891 by the Smithsonian Institution, which contains an exhaustive account of the famous Eliot Bible, its several editions, and all the known copies of it. The account of the Saur Bible, printed in German, at Germantown in Pennsylvania, in 1743, has been more carefully compiled. There appears to be no copy of this in the British Museum, nor indeed anywhere in England. The author has verified the tradition that twelve copies of this Bible, which were sent to the German printer who had provided the type, fell into the hands of privateers, but ultimately reached their destination. We have further a description of the first Bible in English printed in America (Philadelphia, 1772), which received the sanction of Congress; and of a translation of the Peshito version of the New Testament, made by the Rev. Dr. James Murdock in 1851. Mention is also made of Benjamin Franklin's proposed revision of the Book of Job—

"And Satan answered, Does your majesty imagine that his good conduct is the effect of personal attachment and affection?"— which we have always supposed to be merely a j'eu d'esprit.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

AMONG the contents of the August number of the English Illustrated Magazine will be: some hitherto unpublished letters of Mr. Ruskin; a complete story by Mr. George Gissing, entitled "Lou and Liz"; some cricketering anecdotes, by the Hon. R. Lyttelton, illustrated from drawings by Mr. G. F. Watts; "Poachers and Poaching," by a Son of the Marshes; and "Belvoir Castle," by the Duchess of Rutland.

MR. JONAS STADLING will contribute to the forthcoming number of the Century a second paper on "The Famine in Eastern Russia," containing interesting references to the relief work carried out by the younger Tolstoi. The article is illustrated from photographs taken by the author. Some letters to children, by the late Bishop of Massachusetts, will also appear.

MR. W. T. STEAD will publish next week, at the office of the Review of Reviews, in Norfolk-street, Strand, the first number of Borderland, which is described as a Quarterly Review and Index devoted to the study of the phenomena vulgarly called "supernatural." Among the contents will be an article by Mr. Stead himself on "Automatic Handwriting," in which he tells the story of how his hand began to be used by an intelligence of which he was not conscious, and how far he has got with his experiments.

MAJOR ARTHUR GRIFFITHS, author of "Memorials of Millbank," has written a new story, entitled "A Prison Princess, a Romance of Millbank Penitentiary," for Cassell's Saturday Journal. The tale, which will commence in No. 512, issued on July 19, is founded on the tradition of a treasure believed to have been buried in one of the cells at Millbank by a female jewel robber, and narrates the adventures of two female prisoners who succeeded in securing it.

AMONG the original articles appearing in the forthcoming issue of the Religious Review of Reviews will be a memorial sketch of the late Prof. Pritchard by the Rev. E. S. Foulkes; "Church Architecture and Acoustics," by the Rev. Compton Reade; and notices of the Church Lads' Brigade and the Missions to Seamen.

THE August number of St. Nicholas will contain an illustrated paper on "The Boyhood of Edison," by Miss McCabe.

MR. L. J. MAXE has joined the editorial staff of the National Review.

TRANSLATION.

"KNÚTSDRÁPA."

[THE following is an attempt to reproduce in English verse the peculiarities of the common skaldic metre "dróttkvætt." The verse consists of eight lines, each of three accents, and normally of six syllables, but sometimes of seven. Each pair of lines is connected by the alliteration of two words in the first line of the pair with the first word in the second line, the alliteration being always in the accented syllables. Besides this, each line has two assonances, one in the first line of each pair being imperfect (skothending), and that in the second one full (adathending)—e.g., (1) west, haste; and (2) steer, hear. The second of the words containing the assonance must be the last accented syllable, the first may be either the first or second accented syllable, or the first unaccented if this is sufficiently strong (verse 1, 4). The last word of each line is usually one of two syllables. The rules for quantity cannot be applied in English.

The subject chosen for this illustration of skaldic technique is Knut's voyage to Denmark to repel the Swedish and Norwegian invasion. Part of the real Knútsdrápa on this theme by Sighvat Thorðarson is preserved, but it is in a different and more difficult metre.]

West the word came hasting,
Weighty news of state-craft,
Deeds of foemen deadly,
Denmark's king must hearken.
"Filled are the firths with Northmen,
Faring wide, unsparing,
Olaf's men and Önund's
All thy lands enthralling."

Stern and strong rose England's Steerer at these words' hearing;
Keen-eyed sprang the kingly
Knut from throne and foot-stool.
Swore to sweep with warring Sword the rich gold-hoarders,
Far in Skáney's firwoods
Feast the wolf to eastward.

Helm and burnished byrny
Beamed in sunlight gleaming,
Where his fighters fearless Filled the barks all gilded:
Sails with fair wind swelling
Soared above the oarbanks;
Streams to sternward foaming
Stretched, where bow went ploughing.

Billows beat, and rolling
Bore the fleet past forelands;
Sand and seaweed blended
Surged where waves came urging.
Then came dread and dreamlike
Drakes from sea-ground wakened,
All their force and fierceness
Failed where Knut went sailing.

Dense the proud and princely
Prows with kingly housings
Moved, and massed went driving
Mist-like far in distance.
Knut the king sailed outward
Keen his host was seen there,
Pierce on foam-hoofed horses
Fared the grim shield-bearers.*

* These four lines represent the stef, which is repeated at intervals throughout the central part of the poem.

OBITUARY.

PROF. HENRY NETTLESHIP.

ONLY a year ago the two Nettleships were conspicuous among the leading men in Oxford: the one as professor of Latin, the other as tutor at Balliol. Last August, the younger brother died on Mont Blanc, by a catastrophe that shocked the general public; and now the elder brother is also gone, after a lingering illness. He caught typhoid fever in April, when on a visit to his son, who was studying music at Berlin. He was brought home to Oxford; and during the whole of the summer term bulletins told of his rallies and relapses. Ultimately fresh complications supervened, and he died on Monday, July 10.

Henry Nettleship was born on May 5, 1839, at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, where his father was in practice as a solicitor. He was the eldest of a distinguished band, which includes also J. T. Nettleship, the animal-painter, and Edward Nettleship, the ophthalmic surgeon at St. Thomas's. His early education was obtained at the cathedral school of Durham, whence he was removed to the Charterhouse. There he had, among his younger contemporaries, Prof. Jebb and Sir Richard Webster. At the early age of seventeen, he won a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. His university career was scarcely less distinguished than that of his brother, ten years later; though, like him, he failed to win a first class in the final classical school. But this disappointment was salved by his prompt election to a fellowship at Lincoln. There he remained as a tutor for about seven years, which practically cover the most successful period in the recent history of that college. After a short time spent as an assistant master at Harrow (where he married the daughter of the Rev. H. T. Steel), he was called back to Oxford to be classical tutor at Corpus and at Christ Church. Finally, in 1878, he succeeded Archdeacon Palmer as Corpus professor of Latin. He thus realised his great ambition, in being thought worthy to occupy the chair of his old master and friend, Prof. Conington.

The first important literary work that Nettleship undertook was to complete the well-known edition of Vergil, which Conington left unfinished on his death in 1869. His next was to prepare for the press Conington's edition of Persius (1872). He also wrote the Life of Conington for the Dictionary of National Biography. In this connexion it is worthy of note that the two first books that appeared with his name alone on the title-page were—Suggestions introductory to a Study of the Aeneid (1875), and Ancient Lives of Vergil (1879).

But, if Conington's influence was dominant during his early career, that of Mark Pattison almost came to overshadow it. The remainder of his life was devoted to carrying out in his own person those principles of original research, of which Pattison was the prophet, and which the ACADEMY was originally founded to maintain. These principles may best be studied in a volume, entitled Essays on the Endowment of Research, by Various Writers (1876), to which Nettleship himself contributed the concluding essay, upon "The Present Relations between Classical Research and Classical Education in England."

This single-minded devotion to research was the chief reason why Nettleship has left so little (comparatively) of published work. So long ago as 1875 he agreed to compile a new Latin-English lexicon for the Clarendon Press. But as time went on, his own ideal of what such a book should attain rose to an impracticable height, while he failed to receive that assistance from younger students which he had anticipated. At last he recognised that he must abandon the attempt, though a measure of the labour, the learning, and the ingenuity expended upon it may be seen in his Contributions to Latin Lexicography (1889). About four hundred pages of that large volume are taken up with the letter A, which alone had he brought to reasonable completeness.

Another bitter blow to him was the death of his favourite pupil, John Henry Onions, of Christ Church, who, at his instigation, had set himself the task of preparing a new edition of the grammarian Nonius. When Onions died in 1889, he had not got much further than a collation of the MSS., and a provisional settlement of part of the text. But Nettleship, with characteristic devotion, took up the work thus left unfinished, and began by making an exhaustive examination of all the printed editions of Nonius by Renaissance and post-Renaissance scholars. It is to be hoped that this work at least, upon which two such men have laboured in vain, may yet be published by some other member of their university.

For the rest, Nettleship published in 1885, a volume of Lectures and Essays on Subjects connected with Latin Literature, which shows well both sides of his scholarship—his aesthetic appreciation of the poetry of Vergil and Horace, and his profound knowledge of such obscure authors as Aulus Gellius and Verrius Flaccus. But perhaps he was seen at his very best in the public lectures which he delivered from time to time as professor of Latin at Oxford, and in the numerous papers which he contributed to the Journal of Philology. He would take up such unattractive topics as the study of Latin grammar by the Romans themselves, or literary criticism in antiquity, and make the subject live by the warmth of his enthusiasm. Others may have surpassed him in acquaintance with MSS., in the science of philology, in ingenious emendation, or in the talent for editing or translating a familiar author; but he has left no superior in this country in familiarity with the language and literature of ancient Rome.

Those who did not know Henry Nettleship have sometimes called him a pedant. This misconception was due partly to mere ignorance, partly to a misreading of his character. So great was his modesty that he did not appear to advantage among strangers, who thought him awkward when he was only shy. In reality, he had a heart overflowing with kindness, which he did not always succeed in expressing. He was, indeed, very sensitive, and liable to misinterpret the blunt conduct of so-called men of the world. But in all the intimate relations of life, he was one of the most affectionate of men, and a staunch friend. His interests in literature extended far beyond the classics. Always susceptible to music, it was late in life that he learnt the violin. That he was fully in sympathy with the modern movement for popularising Greek and Latin, may be learnt from the fact that the very last thing he published was a lecture on classical education delivered at Toynbee Hall.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

WE trust that the short unsigned paper in the July number of the Antiquary on the proposed demolition of a part of Sheriff Hutton Castle may have the result for which it has been intended. These interesting remains are the property of a great Yorkshire landowner, the Hon. Mrs. Meynell Ingram. We hope she will spare every fragment of this great historical monument. Sheriff Hutton was built by Bertram de Bulmer in the reign of Stephen, probably, like Somerton and several other mediæval fortresses, on the site of a prehistoric enclosure. It was afterwards re-edified by one of the Nevilles; nearly everything which has reached our time is his work. The castle remained a part of the great Neville domain until the fall of the king-maker at the battle of Barnet, when it was granted by Edward IV. to Richard, Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. In 1625 it passed to Sir Arthur Ingram. Mr. Roac le Schonix contributes a paper on the Museum at Ilkley, which is worth attention. It forms number 27 of the "Notes on Archaeology as represented in the Local Museums of England," a valuable series of papers which, when complete, we hope to see in book form. Mr. John Sawyer, the well-known Sussex archaeologist, sends an account of the discovery of caves at Lavant. They are highly curious; but their object and date is at present very obscure. The first part of a paper on Gainsborough during the Civil War, 1642-1660, is by Mr. Peacock. Gainsborough is noteworthy because it was there, on the hills east of the railway station, that Oliver Cromwell won his first battle.

THE TODD MEMORIAL LECTURES.

II.

THE author of the next work on our list—Dr. B. MacCarthy—styles himself Examiner in Celtic, Royal University of Ireland, and has long been known to the readers of the ACADEMY as professing a knowledge of Irish language, metric, palaeography, and chronology. His last production is called The Codex Palatino-Vaticanus, No. 830, and comprises the Irish passages in the Vatican MS. which contains the chronicle of Marianus Scotus. These are seven in number—two in prose, five in verse. All save one were written in the twelfth century, and all without exception are worthless, save as specimens of Middle-Irish. The metrical pieces are: (1) the first two quatrains of a dialogue between SS. Patrick and Brigit, the whole of which is in the Bibliothèque Royale, Brussels (not "Paris," as Dr. MacCarthy—p. 20—strangely supposes); (2) three quatrains on the parts of Adam's body; (3) a quatrain on Eve's death; (4) four quatrains on Adam and Eve's children; and (5) four quatrains on the story in Judges xix., xx. With the exception of the single quatrain on Eve's death, which Dr. MacCarthy misprints and misrenders, every one of these passages had been already published by Waltz, Zeuss, Zimmer, or myself. The expected quatrain (fo. 39v marg. 1) runs thus:

Eua mater humani generis obiit.
Dech [m] bliadna [ro] bae eua dés ádam inméda
accó der rorig nímí ||
corosrac serg srliglí.

(Ten years was Eve after Adam in tribulations, weeping tears to heaven's King, till a tedious sickness [lit. sickness of long lying] carried her off.) Here Dr. MacCarthy (p. 25) omits obiit, omits two of the marks of length, and for ro rig nímí gives us ro [f] ri [h] gnímí, which he translates by "with great diligence," obviously supposing that frith-gnímí is the gen. sg. of frithgnam, a masc. u-stem.

P. 250, l. 23, for les read ler; l. 27 is only a variant of the first line of the third stanza; so l. 29 is a variant of the first word of the third line. P. 251, l. 2, for do read don. P. 252, l. 3, read intadbar rodosbae.

|| The corresponding words in Lebar Brecc, p. 90, marg. inf., must be read fri [ri] g nímé. The ro of Palat. 830 is for ra, a common Middle-Irish corruption of ri, fri.

In pp. 93-96 Dr. MacCarthy prints the catalogue of Northern Irish kings which Marianus inserted on fo. 15b. of the Palatine MS. 830, and which had been already published thrice. The following corrections of his transcript are necessary. P. 93, Muredach Tireach, leg. Muredach treich; Euchu, leg. Echu. P. 94, Diarmat, leg. Diarmat; Annmerach, leg. Annmrech. P. 95, Congall, leg. Congal. P. 96, Domnael, leg. Domnell; col. 2, mac Nel, leg. mac Nel; Moilsechnaill, leg. moil sechnaill.

To illustrate his transcripts from the Palatine MS., Dr. MacCarthy gives a number of extracts from the Lebar Brecc, the Books of Leinster and Ballymote, and the Bodleian MS. of Tigernach's Annals. Of these the most important is the prose précis in the Lebar Brecc of the poems in the Saltair na Rann (Oxford, 1883), which describe heaven, the Creation, the Fall, and the penance of Adam and Eve. This précis is in Middle-Irish prose, so corrupt that Dr. MacCarthy has hardly been able to worsen it. In this, however, as might be expected from the palaeographer who read a hole in parchment as corde,§ he has succeeded. Thus:

Dr. MacCarthy's translation is worthy of his text. Thus: P. 38, l. 20, hi treib in richid (in the habitation of the heaven) is misrendered by "in the circuit of the royal abode"; p. 40, ll. 1, 2, comla (doorleaf) by "fastening"; l. 5, doranta do findruine (they have been made of white bronze) by "they are made of copper"; l. 14, acerthair (will be separated) by "are separated"; p. 42, l. 4, mor sossad (many stations) by "many seats"; p. 46, l. 2, scribenda (writings) by "writers"; l. 13, oen uball don abail (one apple from the apple-tree) by "one apple of the apples," with the note "abail is employed collectively [?]

* Dr. MacCarthy translates this by "of the [penitential] rule," as if his "diegáid" were the dat. sg. of diiged, a neut. o-stem. I conjecture that isin cetbliadain den deg-Áid means "in the first year of the good Áed," though who this Áed was I cannot say.

† Dr. MacCarthy conjectures ba hí; but the MS. has clearly bahí.

‡ Hereon we have this delicious note: "The omission of the verbal particle arose from pronouncing himred as a trisyllable; m and r not coalescing in sound."

But the strangest of Dr. MacCarthy's mistakes is in p. 45, l. 4, where he renders ool na .iiii. sanct find fíchet by "the chant of the fair four score." The reference is to Rev. iv. 4, 10: the Irish words mean "the music of the four-and-twenty fair saints," and the Irish author has attributed to the four-and-twenty elders the Sanctus of the Te Deum instead of the words in Rev. iv. 11.

From the Book of Leinster, p. 127a, Dr. MacCarthy cites Gilla Coemáin's metrical abridgment of Irish history (so-called) from the fortieth day before the Deluge down to the coming of S. Patrick. Here the printed text requires several corrections. For instance, [8] lecht, p. 146, gen. [s] lecht, p. 420, which Dr. MacCarthy renders by "destruction," is nothing but lecht "grave," gen. lecht, here put for "death." Its plural lecht occurs in p. 158, where Dr. MacCarthy makes it into a passive verb. For Gabas, Gaelian, p. 148, read Gabais, Galian. P. 150, l. 6, and p. 180, ll. 3, 8, for is read ocus (MS. 7). P. 152, l. 6, for Dec read dech (MS. X.). P. 156, l. 16, for Argatros read Argetros. P. 160, l. 10, for muir "sea," MacCarthy read muir "rampart," and cancel the irrelevant note in p. 161. P. 170, l. 15, fethib ("cause," MacCarthy read fethib, "with scores." P. 186, l. 10, Rigderg (gen. sg. m.) read rigdeirg. P. 192, l. 10, do n churad read dm churaid. P. 194, l. 10, Temraigh read Temair; l. 15, Feidlig (acc. sg. m.) read Feidlech; l. 20, tonaid read tonnaid. P. 202, l. 3, i cath read i cath. P. 206, l. 2, ri oen bliadine (rhyming with diablaid!) read ri oen bliadain. P. 208, l. 4, lasin Fothaig read lasin Fothach. P. 210, l. 11, mur Icht read muir Icht, the English Channel, so called either from the Ictis of Diodorus Siculus or from the (Portus) Ictius of Caesar, B.G. v. 2.†

The translation of this piece is as faulty as the text. It abounds in obvious guesswork, much of which I am unable to set right. But the following corrections may be regarded as certain. P. 145, l. 7, "renown" (glór) read "noise." P. 149, l. 14, "Erin of the plains" (Herinn n-raig, acc. sg.) read "wrathful Ireland"; l. 16, 20, "famous" (dalla) read "pleasant"; l. 19, "murmuring" (anora) read "disorder." P. 150, l. 3, "prudent" (seug) read "elender"; l. 19, "the warrior" (finnaid) read "know ye." P. 155, l. 11, "sorrow of hosts" (derg na ndreth) read "the red one of the conflicts." P. 157, l. 14, "prop" (dos) read "bush." P. 159, l. 17, "stout was his kingship" (ba trín a rig) read "strong was his forearm." P. 161, l. 5, "good the deed" (scól inbíl) read "a prosperous course"; l. 11, "The fate" (aidé) read "tragic death." P. 165, l. 3, "great [?] the deed" (milib tor) read "with thousands of lords." P. 167, l. 8, "destruction" (cráid) read "torment." P. 169, l. 1, "ill omen" (geas) read "tabu"; l. 7, "Finished" (ro thairind) read "he, Ailill, abated." P. 173, l. 13, "he presided" (araid) read "old"; l. 20, "the fate of death" (ing éca) read "the violence of death"—ing = Skr. anhas. P. 175, l. 19, "his fate" (a thairbirt) read "his subjection." P. 178, note 7, and p. 192, l. 7, "doom" (bráth) read "betrayal." P. 179, l. 1, "decent" (gluinn, pl. n. of glonn) read "deeds"; l. 9, "Covenanted his chief champions" (Rochin[g]- set a ceim curad) read "They stept their warrior's step." P. 182, note 6, "a prohibition of a true sovereign" (coll fir fatha) read "a violation of a prince's truth." In the same note, cona heo (with her brooch) is rendered by "with her circlet," though eo is here and elsewhere glossed by dely "pin," and is cognate with Gr. ids "arrow," Skr. ishus. P. 193, l. 13, "with perfection" (co becht) read "assuredly." P. 199, l. 11, "on the morrow" (aithle) read "after." P. 201, l. 3, "from his portion" (as—for ós—in raind) read "over the part"; l. 6, "his good complement" (a daglind) read "his good time." P. 203, l. 8, "son of Rochraid" (mac Róchride) read "son of Rochride" (Great-heart); l. 17, "of the pre-eminent deeds" (nal-luamchless) read "of the swift feats." P. 205, l. 2, "king with contests" (iárla co n-airlechaib) read "an earl with slaughters"; l. 13, "Lugaid son of Cu" (Lugaid mac con) read "Lugaid Hound's son"—the hound being a wolf-dog bitch that had suckled him when a babe.* P. 207, l. 14, "remember [it] ([in] cuinnid) read "do ye ask?"

The extract from the Bodleian Annals of Tigernach, printed and translated in pp. 266-274 of Dr. MacCarthy's book, suggests some amusing corrigenda. Thus "Leapra graulima in Hiberniam que uocatur bolgach," p. 272, is translated by "Most severe leprosy in Ireland, which is called the Pox." The true translation is, of course, "Into Ireland [came] a most severe cutaneous disease which is called small-pox." The annalist refers to variola, not syphilis. In p. 267, where the MS. has corruptly: Nigis facta est occid magna escolt, Dr. MacCarthy emends thus: "Nig[R]is facta est occid[ens].—Magna escolt," and translates this nonsense by "The West became black.—Great dearth." It can hardly be doubted that Tigernach wrote: "Nix magna facta est: accidit ascoll mór," and that the entry merely records a heavy snowfall and a great famine. Compare the Annals of Ulster, ad ann. 669. The latinity of the learned Doctor's emendation finds parallels in his struprum, p. 28, his Bene icunas, cito ituris, p. 35, and his ad naven illum in the same page. In Navarre, Priscian was only "a little scratched."† But in Youghal he is not merely scratched, but carded, as if he were the daughter of a boycotted farmer. Note also the following hexameter in p. 142:

"Philologi certant et adhuc sub iudice lis est," and this in p. 351:

"Dubthach has verus scripsit tempore parvo," where for scripsit the MS. (the Leyden Priscian) has transcript.

A few notes on his other extracts and I shall, for the present, be done with Dr. MacCarthy. To illustrate the form of the Irish poems which he cites from Palat. 830, he quotes in pp. 120-140, and purports to translate, three passages from the metrical tract in the Book of Ballymote. As the whole of this tract has been accurately reproduced by Prof. Thurneysen, in Irische Texte, 3^{te} Serie, Heft 1, it will suffice to give one or two specimens of the way in which Dr. MacCarthy has here done his work. At the beginning of the tract is the following example of the metre called irregular deibide:

Uar in adaig i Moin mhóir, fearaid deartan, ni deireoil;
dordan roistibh in gaeth glan, geisidh os chailli clithar ‡

(Cold the night on Moin Mór: a storm § rages—no

* See the Book of Ballymote, 254^a 15; the Book of Lecan, p. 446^a: H. 3, 18, p. 573^b; the Annals of the Four Masters, A. D. 186; the Revue Celtique xiii. 434 (note); and Silva Gadelica II. 189, 347, 538. Lugaid's father was Mac-nia, also called Lugaid Loegde.

† Love's Labour Lost, v. 1.

‡ MS. clithair, with a punctum delens under the i.

§ Deartan is here glossed by sneachta "snow," or "of snow," in the Book of Lecan vocabulary by anfad "storm," and in the Four Masters, A. D. 1582, p. 1779, O'Donovan renders it by "tempestuous weather." The gen. pl. and dat. sg. are written derdan in the Book of Lismore, 117^b 2, 118^a, where Mr. S. H. O'Grady (Silva Gadelica II. 388, 389) renders rightly by "heavy squalls" and "tempest."

small matter: 'tis a peal the pure wind laughed: it roars over the wood's shelter.)

Here deartan alliterates with deireoil (leg. deireoil) and clithar rhymes with glan. Dr. MacCarthy (p. 120), not understanding deartan or clithar, prints d'j eartan and Clithair. The former words (which could only mean "of a little grave") he translates by "rain," the latter by "of Clithar," and he mistakes the gen. sg. chailli for the dative of caill. Further on, in the same page is a quatrain, of which the first two lines are ni thobair [leg. thabair] eocho ar duana.

(I have heard that he gives no steeds for poems.) Dr. MacCarthy prints the second line as in i-obair: eocho ar duana, and translates: "I have heard of The deed—horses [to be given] for poems."

Then comes the following example of another metre called deibide smotach, "scrappy deibide":

Rogabh [E]ocho* buidhi bos—nos: †
robc dia es ar a mac—smot: ‡

(Eochu the Yellow got kine [and] fame. After him there was for his son [only] a scrap.)

Dr. MacCarthy prints this as

Rogabh o
Cho buidhi bos: nosrobe
Dia es[i] ar a mac
smot, and renders this disjointed gibberish by "He caught the ear With [his] yellow palms: [but] there was After that upon the youth A lobe."

The metre deibide imrind fórdalaoh is exemplified by a stanza of six rhyming heptasyllabic lines. Of these the first two are

A muinter Murchada moir [leg. móir]
risna geib fid na fiadmoin [leg. -móin]

(O family of great Murchadh, to which belongs neither wood nor wild bog.)

For the dissyllable muinter Dr. MacCarthy (p. 126) prints mic (thus ruining the metre), and then translates thus: "O son of Murchadh the great, To whom [? thee] may neither wood nor hare belong." Here he has mistaken m (the compendium for muinter) for m (the compendium for mac or mic) and fiadmoin (a wild bog) for fiadmuin (hare). The quatrain exemplifying "general deibide," p. 130, is elsewhere ascribed to Cúchulainn, and means: "I know not what man Etan will sleep with; but brilliant Etan knows that she will not sleep alone." Here Dr. MacCarthy, misled by the Ballymote scribe (who wrote faifea for faifea) misses the point, such as it is, and gives us: "I know what man Etan will smile upon [lit. with]. But knows Etan the brilliant that she will not [always] smile alone." In pp. 134, 136, is the line advocht bass fo be[i]ad buabail (a bright hand under a drinking-horn). Here he changes bass into liass—thus spoiling the alliteration, and making the Irish nonsense—and then translates by "Brilliant eyes [lit. brilliancy of pupils] beneath a very haughty head." It would be both useless and cruel to ask Dr. MacCarthy to mention his authority for rendering liass by "pupils" and buabail by "very haughty." P. 131, l. 12, for Rossan read Rossach. In p. 136, l. 24, notwithstanding his two emendations, lacks a syllable. Read mo dely ci thes triam dernaind (though my brooch should go through my palm), as in Laud 610, fo. 90^b.

Pp. 278-317 of Dr. MacCarthy's book contain historical matter in prose and verse, from the Book of Ballymote. The first paragraph deals with the six ages of the world, and ends with the colophon fin7 [i.e., Finit, better finit] dona haisibh. § He prints this: "fin [? lege sin] 7 do na haisibh." P. 280, l. 5, go deod fatha asarda (to the end of the Assyrian

* Eochu, H. 2, 12.

† Bós—nós, ibid. From bós (cognate with Lat. boverum, stem boves) comes the adj. buasach, Cormac s.v. marc.

‡ This word [leg. smot, to rhyme with mac?] still lives in the Highlands as smad, "a particle, a jot, the smallest portion of anything." Dr. MacCarthy confuses it with smit "lobe."

§ Compare Finit dona Deibidib, p. 126, and Finit dona dubfoelaib, the colophon of the vocabulary in the Book of Lecan.

kingdom) is rendered by "to the last prince of the Assyrians." P. 284, l. 35, in tres rich dec (the thirteenth king) by "the third king [and] tenth." So in p. 292, l. 7, isin sechtmadh bliadain fíchet (in the twenty-seventh year) by "in the seventh [and] twentieth year." We have seen that the learned "Examiner in Celtic" does not know the difference between the Middle Irish cardinals for 24 and 80. He seems equally at sea as regards the ordinals. P. 294, l. 4, Crithinbél cainte (Crithinbél the lampooner) is printed Crithin bécainte, and translated by "Crithin of the satirical mouth."* Another instance of ignorance of persons well known to Irish story occurs in p. 308, where the MS. states that at the battle of Cenn-abrat Nemed fell by Cairpre and Doreara the druid by Eogan. For Doreara drai Dr. MacCarthy prints do rvar adrai[le], and translates this gibberish by "according to others."† Lower down, on the same page, a Turlach Airt (in Art's swamp, where King Art, son of Conn of the Hundred Battles, was beheaded) is rendered by "on the Hill of Art," turlach being confounded with tulach. Still worse, if possible, are his mistakes in p. 286-7, where he renders ar (ploughing) by "sowing," cuma (cutting-out) by "embroidery," and prints Gaidel glas mac Inuil for G.g. mac Níuil (son of Nél). So he gives us Enog, mac Iareth, as e cet lúnda dobi riam. This he translates by "Henoch the son of Jared, he is the first fowler [? that ever was]." For the non-existent word lúnda the MS. has lúnda, i.e., "literate, lettered person," Enoch, son of Jared, having been, according to a well-known tradition, the inventor of writing, arithmetic, and astronomy. In the next page Dr. MacCarthy renders Galludagdaí .i. Gallagvege by "the Galladagdae, that is the Gallagregre." The Irish words mean "the Galatians (O. Ir. Galatardai), i.e., the Gallo-græci," an ancient Celtic nation, of which, apparently, the "Examiner in Celtic" has never heard.

The rest of Dr. MacCarthy's book is occupied by quasi-historical matter, in prose and verse, from the Book of Ballymote, pp. 48^b-51^a. I can only mention a few of the many corrections which these texts and their translations require. P. 398, ll. 8, 9, oidhi, oididh is Englished by "fate." Read oided or aided, which means "tragic death," and comes from the I. Eur. root pois, "to fall," just as the cognate Latin pestis comes from ped. P. 400, l. 6, adset secla (it, a wave, tells news) is misrendered by "Tidings tell." Cendfaelad (p. 402, l. 9) is printed Cendfaelach. In p. 407, l. 13, madan (= O. Ir. matan "battle") is "corrected" into maidm, and translated by "rout." P. 408, l. 18, congul (conflict) is bisected into co ngul, and translated by "with feat": l. 23, eriangalach should be sriangalach. P. 402, l. 8, voluabaidh should be voluathaidh, better -aigh, "he reduced to ashes." P. 422, l. 13, oigh is rendered by "noble." Here, as in p. 430, l. 14, it means "of Ailech," now Greenan-Ely in Inishowen; l. 22, tri bliadhna do neillí nertmoir (three years to the mighty champion) is rendered by "Three years were reigned by Niall of great power," as if the man's name Niall were feminine. In the next line, fo lannab should be fo lannab "under swordblades"; and the following line, liach a guin do Glas-gallaib, means "Sad his slaughter by Green Foreigners," not, as Dr. MacCarthy supposes, "The evil of his [mortal] wounding," &c. P. 424, l. 4, ar n-eg i Thuathail Techtmair (after the death of Tuathail Techtmair's descendant), is misrendered by "On the death of the [second] Tuathal the Acceptable," Dr. MacCarthy making i (gen. sg. of ua) to stand for in, the gen. sg. m. of the article, and supposing that t is aspirated after n.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MONSIEUR BÉDIER ON POPULAR TALES.

London: July 10, 1893.

M. Joseph Bédier has just published a most interesting volume on Les Fabliaux (Paris: Rouillon). I have no right to criticise his work where it deals with the literary qualities of the Fabliaux, but much of his book is concerned with the general question of the diffusion of popular stories. M. Bédier's conclusions are exactly those which approve themselves to me; and he is particularly opposed to the theory of M. Cosquin, of Bentley, and others, who find the central source of tales in India.

But M. Bédier appears to have misunderstood my own position. He supposes me to mean that "each conte or each type of contes may have been invented, and reinvented an infinite number of times in different ages and countries" (p. 36). Again:

"No theory is probable which cannot admit the fact, proved in a thousand cases, that contes may be transmitted by way of borrowing. We are merely astonished that Grimm and Mr. Lang so energetically refuse to admit this truth" (p. 39).

To take the second assertion first: I have (if M. Bédier will pardon me) always admitted this truth—that contes may be transmitted by borrowing. I say, in the work quoted by M. Bédier:

"It is certain that no limit can be put to a story's power of flight per ora virum. It may wander wherever merchants wander, wherever captives are dragged, wherever slaves are sold, wherever the custom of exogamy commands the choice of alien wives. . . . Wherever human communication is, or has been possible, there the story may go; and the space of time during which the courses of the sea and the paths of the land have been open to story is dateless and unknown."

Yet I "energetically deny" that stories may be borrowed! On the other hand I energetically assert it. This must have escaped M. Bédier's attention. This brings me to the former point: that I believe any story may be invented and re-invented any number of times. Distinguo! As I have said, in my preface to Miss Cox's Cinderella, "where the sequence of adventures in Apuleius is strictly preserved, there I believe firmly in transmission, in borrowing." But where the sequence does not exist at all, as in the Red Indian and Zulu tales analogous to "Cupid and Psyche": where only the central idea occurs (a taboo on wedded intercourse, with supernatural penalty on its infringement), there I pronounce no opinion as to whether the tale has been independently invented, or borrowed and altered. Clearly, any tale in which a wife may not see, or name, or speak to a husband, and in which her (or his) disobedience is supernaturally punished, is of the type of "Cupid and Psyche." But this idea is often found where the jealous sisters are absent: where many of the adventures in Apuleius are absent. Now, why should not the central incidents have been invented wherever the taboo was part of living customs? It is a widely diffused taboo: it might, wherever it existed, be enforced and illustrated by a tale. It might, also, have been borrowed: I am unable to dogmatise in each case. Then we come to types of stories. There is a Kaffir tale of the "Cinderella" type (Theal, Kaffir Folk Lore, pp. 169-171.) This story, with a boy hero, not a heroine, is a mixture of "Cinderella" and of "The Black Bull o' Norway." I regard it as in the last resort an echo of these tales; but if any one maintained that it might have been independently invented, why, in the face of modern coincidences in fiction, I should scarcely regard him as stating an impossibility. Mr. Mark Twain, in a recent essay on "Mental Telegraphy," gives several examples of coincidence. In one case Mr. Howells, and a lady unnamed, simultaneously evolved a similar novel, and Mr. Howells deemed it proper to explain the fact to the other author. Mr. Mark Twain, half in earnest, accounts for this incident by "mental telegraphy." Where only the type of story is similar in two cases, say in China and Peru, I am unable to dogmatise as to the possible limits of casual coincidences. The more I study this subject, the more I feel inclined to believe, as a general rule, in transmission, perhaps prehistoric in some instances. As M. Bédier quotes me, in my Introduction to Perrault, "it is difficult to fix a limit to chance, to coincidence." Was it likely, for example, that Mr. Haggard, in Nada the Lily, should independently invent the scene where the heroine, after a fight, is found walled up in a cave, while the wounded hero, outside, cannot rescue her. This very incident occurs in Scott's Betrothed. Clearly, M. Bédier might say, Mr. Haggard doubtless unconsciously borrowed from Sir Walter. But, in the room where I write this note, Mr. Haggard found his incident in the late Mr. Leslie's privately printed book on the Zulus; where the tale is told as a matter of recent fact—I think in Panda's reign. The recollection of Scott's Betrothed occurred to neither of us. Thus, unless Mr. Leslie borrowed from Scott, which there seems no reason to believe, Sir Walter plagiarised from a real occurrence which had not yet taken place. With such examples, I cannot but say that it is difficult to limit hazard and coincidence. But I think that hazard may be almost or quite regarded as a quantité négligeable where the sequence of incidents, in a story plot, is strictly or even markedly preserved. In such cases transmission is infinitely more probable than coincidence. This opinion grows on me. Some years ago, as M. Bédier and M. Cosquin cite me, I said, in an Introduction to Grimm: "Much may be due to the identity everywhere of early fancy, something to transmission." I would now transpose the "much" and the "something."

M. Bédier (p. 44) says that I "deny the truth of the Orientalist theory, so far as tales of marvel are concerned. But to contradict is not to refute." Perhaps one cannot refute the hypothesis, but one can refute the arguments for it. I have done so, in my introduction to Alington's translation of Cupid and Psyche, and in Myth, Ritual, and Religion (ii. 299-320). My arguments are almost or quite identical with some of those advanced by M. Bédier.

(1) We have many popular tales in Egypt and Greece older than historic India, the supposed source of tales.

(2) Literary versions, like the literary versions brought from the East in the Middle Ages, scarcely reach, and seldom modify, the traditional popular versions.

(3) Ideas peculiarly Indian are absent from popular Western tales.

(4) The ideas in the Indian tales are not, in the vast majority of cases, peculiar to India, but are universal.

Where, then, is the proof, or even the presumption, of an exclusively Indian origin?

For (1) see M. Bédier, pp. 78-84; many ancient Greek examples might be added, as he sees, to his list.

For (4)—the universality of ideas said to be peculiarly Indian—see M. Bédier, pp. 131, 132, where he cites my argument. "Popular tales," he writes, "are of Indian origin"; as a proof, says this School, from Bentley to M. Cosquin, "note the specially Indian traits in the tales." But Mr. Lang protests "the tales contain nothing especially Indian." "Very good," replies M. Cosquin. "But, pray, prove that they are in contradiction with ideas ruling in India." It is certainly odd logic!

For (2)—the comparatively slight influence of literary versions from the East on popular tales—see M. Bédier, pp. 97-100. M. Bédier here adduces arguments from sources unfamiliar to me, but the conclusion is the same (compare Myth, Ritual, and Religion, ii., pp. 313, 314). I was dealing with contes, M. Bédier treats of fabliaux; he finds only ten, or at most thirteen, representatives of Oriental stories in mediaeval Europe. "Voilà donc cet 'océan des rivières d'histoires' qui aurait inondé l'Europe au moyen âge!" (p. 112.) On this point it seems that M. Gaidoz and myself have made too "benevolent concessions." I said (Myth, Ritual, and Religion, ii., p. 313):

"It is certain that Western literature was actually invaded by the contes which had won a way into Indian literature. These facts are beyond doubt, but these facts must not be made the basis of too wide an inference. . . . Even the versions that were brought in the Middle Ages by oral tradition must have encountered versions long settled in Europe."

M. Bédier and I reach identical conclusions, by similar steps, though his learning is infinitely greater than mine, above all where fabliaux are concerned. But I still think that I did more than merely "contradict" the ideas of M. Cosquin. I gave my reasons: they are, in part, the reasons of M. Bédier; he adds others from fields of literature with which I am unfamiliar. We are both of opinion that the Indian theory arose because men, finding in Indian literature the oldest literary form of contes (and even here they were wrong), decided that India was the original home of contes. We are both of the opinion stated by M. Bédier in his humorous and vigorous eighth chapter:

"Si l'on se propose la tâche d'en déterminer l'origine et la propagation, le problème est insoluble et vain."

But so are most problems!

ANDREW LANG.

AN EARLY-RUSSIAN PARALLEL TO THE HILDEBRANDSLIED.

Taylorian Institute, Oxford: July 1, 1893.

The fragment of the Old-High-German Hildebrandslied, with its tragic conflict between father and son, being well known, it seems to me worth while to draw attention to a parallel folk-song in Old-Russian.

The rare and interesting little volume of 160 pages, which has preserved a collection of Early-Russian heroic songs in a German compilation, bears the title: "Fürst Wladimir und dessen Tafelrunde, Alt-Russische Heldenlieder" (sm. 12mo., Leipzig, 1819). The compiler, who modestly conceals his name, was, according to Jacob Grimm (Kleine Schriften, vol. v., p. 138), Hofrath von Busse. As he points out in the Preface, and as Mr. Morfill, in a public lecture on Russian Bylinas or ballads, recently confirmed, the original words of these epic songs, which the translator had partly heard in his cradle, partly remembered from his boyhood, seem never to have been written down, but were only preserved by oral tradition. Several editions of Old-Russian heroic songs have appeared in Russia within the last twenty years, such as the "Kniga o Kievskikh Bogatyriakh," or "The Book about the Heroes of Kiev," edited by V. P. Avenarius (St. Petersburg, 1876); but they reveal rather an artificial and modernised aspect, lacking that natural simplicity and freshness of character which distinguishes the older songs contained in Busse's collection.

Now, turning to the particular song which relates a duel between Vladimir the father and his son Mstislav, we find that the original motive of their conflict, which the fragmentary Hildebrandslied does not touch upon, is their common love for the virgin Svetlana. I quote the final passage, where the issue of the duel between Vladimir and Mstislav is thus told:

"Mstislav auf das Haupt des furchtbaren
Gegners einen mächtigen Schwertstreich führt.
Aus einander fliegt die Haube,
Und er schaut, o Graus und Wunder!
Nicht ein freches Räuberantlitz—
Ach, die vielverehrten Züge
Seines Vaters, Fürst Wladimirs
'Sohn, vergieb mir erste Wallung
Aufgeregten Vaterzornes,' Spricht Wladimir, ihn unarmend,
'Hast du doch zu dieser Stunde
Mich so zwiefach überwunden,
Mit dem Schwert und in der Liebe.
Lieber Sohn, mit Stolz und Freude,
Komm' zurück mit mir nach Kiew,
Lebe glücklich mit Svetlana!'
Lauter Jubel scholl durch Kiew, Hohe Feste stellt der Fürst an,
Und des Helden Mstislav Hochzeit
Ward viel Tage durch gefeiert."

LESSING'S PROSE WRITINGS.

Irish Literary Society, Bloomsbury: July 10, 1893.

Some time ago, when noticing in the ACADEMY an excellent new edition of "Lessing's famed Laocoon," I deplored the lack of a representative volume of selections from Lessing's prose writings for English students. For Lessing, whose work was so fragmentary and so various, lends himself well to treatment of this kind, and the style of the greatest of German prose writers could in no other way be so well illustrated. It seems, however, that I was mistaken in supposing that no such work existed. From Messrs. Putnam's Sons I have received a volume entitled Lessing's Prose, edited by Prof. H. S. White, of Cornell University, for a series of "German classics for American students." It contains nothing from the Laocoon, which, I think, is an unfortunate omission; but otherwise the selection is a most judicious one. The dialogues entitled Ernst and Falk will be new to most English readers, who will see in them Lessing's prose style at its very best. A good selection from Lessing's letters is an excellent feature of the book. The notes contributed by Prof. White are everything they should be; and the book is altogether so good and so scholarly that, having unwittingly denied its existence, I feel it my duty to draw particular attention to it. It ought to be in use in every class-room where the German language and literature are studied.

SCIENCE.

British Forest Trees: and their Sylvicultural Characteristics and Treatment. By John Nisbet. (Macmillans.)

AMONG the numerous works lately written on Forestry and British Timber Trees, this is honourably distinguished: first, by the long and varied experience of the author; next, by his adaptation to English sylviculture of the latest theories of German writers, such as Burckhardt, Ney, and Gayer. Sylviculture, it must be understood at the outset, means the culture of timber for profit, as opposed to arboriculture, or the growing of beautiful specimen trees in park and garden. In short, Mr. Nisbet's is an economical manual, rather than a treatise on trees as objects for landscape gardening.

Ever since Evelyn's days English squires have been fond of growing trees in their parks, but this is a very different matter from forestry proper. Uvedale Price and Gilpin treat of the former, Laslett and Michie of the latter; while the Indian Forest Service and the Department of Forestry at Cooper's Hill show that England is awakening to the care of her forests. Mr. Nisbet lays great emphasis on the distinction between pure and mixed forests, a distinction much more studied in Germany than here. Special care is taken in that country not to plant in one wood by themselves the same kinds of trees, unless all the conditions needful for their health and prosperity are present.

For English foresters often plant trees haphazardly, paying little attention to their habits of growth, to the character of soil best suited for them, and the like, but taking extreme pains to fence them in from cattle and rabbits. From such external precautions against loss, Mr. Nisbet would call away his readers to the more vital considerations of speedy growth and proportionate increase, as secured by scientific study of soils, aspects, and the like. His Introduction of some fifty pages is the best part of the book, glancing, as it does, over the chief scientific results of forestry in Germany of late years. The rest of the book comprises an account of the larger timber trees of Great Britain, always contemplating them, however, from a commercial rather than from an aesthetic point of view.

The Exhibition of Gardening and Forestry at present open at Earl's Court proves the interest that Englishmen take in planting. Pity that so excellent an end is too frequently marred by ignorant, injudicious treatment of trees! On many estates the woodland is utterly destitute of any real knowledge of his craft. Traditional rules and a ready appeal to the axe are his characteristics. Meanwhile some trees perish or dwindle because grown in poor or unsuitable soil; others never do themselves full justice from a wrong aspect having been originally chosen for them. Some woods are too thick, and the trees cannot spread; others lack of brushwood lets in wind and sunshine, and dissipates the moisture which would otherwise have served as nutriment for fine trees. All these and numerous kindred faults are reprehended by Mr. Nisbet; while his excellent tables connected with healthy tree-growth form a feature of much usefulness. Attention to these matters will not only benefit private growers, but is of special service to the imperial forests and their management. Matter-of-fact estimates in all cases must be made with regard to cost and profit. The percentage of interest on capital laid out in trees will pay indeed, but only if it be calculated at a somewhat lower scale than that derived from agriculture. Consequently, it becomes the duty of all growers of timber for profit to possess a large scientific knowledge of the conditions under which alone timber can be well and cheaply grown. In short, economic forestry in England is yet scarcely understood, for which reason all estate owners ought gladly to welcome Mr. Nisbet's counsels. He has acquired much experience in India where-with to supplement his knowledge of English forestry, and in the title-page of his book is described as "D. Ec.," a mystic degree, of which both Whitaker and Hazell are entirely ignorant.

A table of the period during which each timber tree was introduced into England is followed by chapters on growth in relation to soil, habit, the influences of climate, reproduction, thinning, and forest management in general. We should demur to the period of healthy vigorous age being assigned to the elm as from three to four hundred years; a century is more like the truth. The root system of the elm is well described as "consisting of several strongly-developed branching side roots, with strong determination downwards." In consequence of their little horizontal expansion, this tree is peculiarly liable to be overthrown in a tempest. Mr. Nisbet does not name the dangerous character of the elm in early spring, when the sap rises, and without any warning the large boughs frequently snap and carry destruction to all beneath them. Elms are found nowhere in northern Europe in pure forests. Tree after tree is passed under review at great length by Mr. Nisbet, and its treatment as an object of commerce duly pointed out. The chapters on coniferous trees and their management deserve particular attention.

The book is a necessity to sylviculturists, while all who are interested in arboriculture will learn from Mr. Nisbet's pages much that may well be pondered.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE TEN PATRIARCHS OF BEROSUS."

II.

Barton-on-Humber.

In the ACADEMY for May 31, 1884, I showed that the lengths of the reigns of the ten antediluvian kings of Berosus, taking a sar as 3⁶, and the 120 sars as the 360⁰ of the circle, corresponded very remarkably, and more closely than mere accident would allow, with the distances between the following ecliptic stars—Hamal, Alcyone, Aldebaran, Pollux, Regulus, Spica, Antares, Algedi, Deneb Algedi, and Skat. It does not follow that the kings and stars are respectively identical; but that the kings, whatever they may have primarily represented, were reduplicated in the stars, just as the signs of the Zodiac, as I have endeavoured to show, are reduplications of simpler phenomena, being neither arbitrary inventions, nor forms merely suggested by natural stellar arrangement. Astrologers for centuries, and without knowing why, have termed the twelve signs alternately "diurnal" and "nocturnal"; and this is quite correct, inasmuch as they were in origin simply certain diurnal and nocturnal phases familiar to the mythological imagination, which necessarily expressed itself by simile, parallel, and analogy. Such an analysis shows the zodiacal cincture as follows:

I.—Diurnal Signs.

1. The Ram-sun, afterwards Aries.
2. Sun and Moon " Gemini.
3. The Lion-sun " Leo.
4. The Waning-sun " Ara.*
5. The Archer-sun " Sagittarius.
6. The Rain-giving-sun " Aquarius.

II.—Nocturnal Signs.

1. The Moon-bull, afterwards Taurus.
2. Darkness " Cancer.
3. The Moon " Virgo.
4. Darkness " Scorpio.
5. The Sea-sun " Capricornus.
6. The Nocturnal-sun " Pisces.†

This example will assist in enabling us to understand the connexion between the ten kings and the ten stars.

* Vide R. Brown, Jun., The Heavenly Display, p. 65; Remarks on the Euphratean Astronomical Names of the Signs of the Zodiac, see vii. (in Proceedings, Soc. Bib. Archaeol., March, 1891).

† Afterwards Pisces. "The double month Adar and Ve-Adar would be the origin of the double Pisces" (Sayce, in Trans. Soc. Bib. Archaeol. iii. 166).

1. Ἀλωρος, the first king, is thus in some way equated with Hamal. When, therefore, we have the Assyrian Ailuv, Ailu, Hebrew Ayil "ram," and further find Ailuv given as the equivalent of the Akkadian Si-mul ("Horn-star," Jl. A. I. II. vi. 9), is it not clear that Alōros, the first king, is the Ram, originally solar and subsequently stellar, first of constellations and stars, and so in the Babylonian astronomy of the Arsakidan period astronomically called Ku (= Iku "the Leader"), and in later times Dur? These king-names contain a mixture of Semitic and Sumero-Akkadian words; and had Alōros been an admittedly non-Semitic name, I should have been inclined to compare it with such a word as the Kamassin (Samoied group) Ular ("sheep"). But if it chance to be unconnected with Ailuv, then I should regard the name as representing the Akkadian Alālu ("the Great-Spirit"), "the Eagle," "symbol of the noon-tide sun."

2. Ἀλδρεος, the second king, is equated with Alcyone, and his name can scarcely be anything except the Akkadian Alap-ur ("Bull-of-the-foundation"). The Akkadian alat, alap = Assyrian alapu, "bull (warrior spirit)," sēdu ("divine bull"); and the second month was "the Foundation" (of the calendar) 4698—2540 B.C., during which period the sun entered Taurus at the vernal equinox. The original Bull, as I have shown elsewhere, was lunar, just as Taurus is a "nocturnal" constellation; and, if any further proof were wanting, we find in the late Babylonian astronomy of the Arsakidan period that this very star Alcyone was known as Temennu ("the Foundation"). (Vide Epping and Strassmaier, Astronomisches aus Babylon, p. 120.)

3. Ἀμύλαρος, the third king, is equated with Aldebaran, and his name = Amil-ur ("Man-of-the-Foundation"). It will be observed that we are still in Taurus, the late astronomical name of which is Te (an abbreviation of the Akkadian timmena = Assyrian temennu), the constellation of the second or "Foundation" month. The Assyrian amilu, avilu is very probably, as Lenormant suggested, the Akkadian mulu ("man") "avec N prosthétique."

4. Ἀμμένωρ, the fourth king, is equated with Pollux. The meaning "artifex," suggested by Prof. Hommel, is very suitable to a god-king connected with the third month, that of "the Making of Bricks," and of the Twins. The patron divinity of the month is the Moon-god, who is styled "the supporting-architect," and the archaic kosmogonic myth or legend attached to the month is that of the Two Hostile Brethren (Sun and Moon), and the Building of the First City. But I had reason to identify Star No. II. in the Tablet of the Thirty Stars (vide Proceedings Soc. Bib. Archaeol., February, 1890), called Yoke-of-the-Enclosure, with Pollux; and "the enclosure of Anu" is probably the ecliptic, which stretches across heaven like a yoke. Ammonon may therefore perhaps = Umun-an ("Girdle-of-heaven"). Thus, the Akkadian Dagan = Greek Δαγών. The moon circling through the ecliptic may be styled a "heaven-girdle"; and if Ammonon meant "the Fire," as Lenormant supposed, we find that the Moon-god was called at Nipur "the god of glowing fire" (vide Sayce, Religion of the Ancient Babylonians, p. 154).

5. Ἀμυγδαρος, the fifth king, is equated with Regulus, and his name = Amil-gal-ur ("King-of-the-celestial-sphere"). Amil-gal ("Man-great") = Un-gal ("Man-great") = Assyrian Sarru ("King"). The Akkadian Ur (not the word which appears in Alap-ur and Amil-ur) = Assyrian Khamanu "bond (celestial sphere)." In the late Babylonian astronomy we find Regulus called Sarru ("the King"), as says the Scholiast in Aratus Phainomena, v. 148: δ Λέων ἔχει ἐπὶ τῆς καρπίας ἀστέρα Βασιλέων (Regulus) λεγόμενον, ὃν οἱ Χαλδαῖοι νομίζουσιν ἔρχεσθαι τῶν θυρανίων.

6. Ἀδωρος, the sixth king, is equated with Spica. Star No. XVI. in the Tablet of the Thirty Stars is Kakkab Dannu (= Akkadian Dun "Hero"), ilu Da-mu "the Star of the Hero, i.e., the god Sky-furrow," which I was inclined to identify with Zavijava ("Angle," γ Virginis). It is certainly some star in Virgo. "The furrow of heaven" = the ecliptic. The ten kings are apparently alternately solar and lunar, and the original Hero of the Sky-furrow will be the Moon. Δαός, the other form of this king-name, would, as noticed, = a Babylonian Damas, and is probably connected with Damu.

7. Ἐδεδάρωχος, the seventh king, is equated with Antares, and his name = Udda-an-xu ("Day-heaven-bird"), while Ἐδεδάρωχος = Udda-es-xu ("Day-brightness-bird"). We have already (sup. No. 1) met with the solar eagle Alālu in this connexion, and in the Tablet of the Thirty Stars I have identified Star No. XXIII., which is called Lugal-tudda ("the Lusty-king") with Antares. Lugal-tudda is "the divine storm-bird," the Sun veiled (Akkadian Uras "the Veiled"), or fiercely flashing through tempest clouds, the Greek Dionysos Melanaigis (vide R. Brown, Jun., "Remarks on the Tablet of the Thirty Stars," in Proceedings Soc. Bib. Archaeol., January–February, 1890).

8. Ἀυέμψωρ, the eighth king, is equated with Algedi, and his name = Amar-sin ("the Ox-of-the-Moon") = "Moon-ox." Cf. Amar-ud ("The-heifer-of-day," vide Sayce, Religion of the Ancient Babylonians, p. 106). The word amar may very likely include the female of the Goat (vide No. II.).

9. Ὠδέρης, the ninth king, is equated with Deneb Algedi, and thus both a lunar and a solar king fall within the Sign of the Goat, an animal which in Euphratean regions is specially connected alike with sun and moon. I apprehend that the original meaning of U'bara-tutu was "the Servant-of-death," i.e., the setting-sun.

10. Ξισούθρος, the tenth king, is equated with Skat ("the Leg," δ Aquarii), also called Sakib ("the Pouter"), a proper star for the Deluge-hero, whose name is also given as Sisithros and Sisythēs, which latter is the corrected reading of Ξούθρος (Peri tēs Syriēs theou, xii.; vide Lenormant, Les Origines, i. 434). George Smith, with whom Jensen agrees, gave strong reasons for regarding Xisouthros as the transliteration of Xasisadra, and compares Ha-sa-ad-ri-it-ti (= Xathritēs). He thought Xasisadra might mean "the Reverential," and Jensen renders it "sehrgeachtet." Delitzsch, however, rejects this identification; and Prof. Sayce has suggested Zi-suru ("Spirit—" or "Life-of-heaven"), a name suitable enough for the moon.

The ten kings thus appear to be impersonations of natural phenomena, afterwards adapted to an astronomical cycle.

ROBERT BROWN, JUN.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE Clarendon Press have just published the second part of the Concordance to the LXX. by the late Dr. Hatch and the Rev. H. A. Redpath. This brings the work as far as the word ἐκείνος.

In the programme of Johns Hopkins University for the coming academical year, we notice no less than sixteen courses of lectures to be delivered in the Oriental Seminary. Prof. Haupt will himself give six courses, upon such subjects as "The Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament," "The Critical Interpretation of the Book of Job," and prose composition in Hebrew, Assyrian, and Arabic; Dr. Adler will deal with Babylonian life and history, Jewish antiquities, post-biblical Hebrew, and Ethiopic; and Dr. Johnson will give elementary instruction in Hebrew, Arabic, Syriac, and Assyrian.

THE June number of the Indian Antiquary, which has already reached us, consists almost entirely of articles by native scholars. Mr. V. Kanakasabhai Pillai describes some old Tamil MSS. in the library of the Rajas of Tanjore, of which the Sanskrit MSS. alone were catalogued by the late Dr. Burnell. One of these is a Tamil poem, of the usual erotic character, with an introduction professing to record a genealogy of the Chola dynasty. The royal hero of the poem seems to be a Chola king, who reigned in the beginning of the twelfth century A.D.; and the account of his appearance in public agrees remarkably with that given two centuries later by Marco Polo. Unfortunately, there are no materials for dating the poem itself. Mr. Taw Sein-ko, now lecturer in Burmese at Cambridge, continues his study of a Burmese inscription, dated 1476 A.D.; and also controverts the views maintained in a former number by Mr. B. Houghton, with regard to the priority of Pali over Sanskrit derivatives in the Burmese language. His conclusions are so important and so novel, that we quote them in his own words:—

"The form of Buddhism first introduced into Burma Proper was that of the Mahāyāna or Northern School.

"The Buddhist Scriptures when first introduced were written in Sanskrit, which is the language of the Northern School.

"The Hinayāna or Southern School, the language of whose Scriptures is Pāli, subsequently absorbed and assimilated by its stronger vitality the Northern School, which, through the cessation of intercourse with Northern India, had fallen into corruption and decay."

Finally, there is an admirable review of Prof. A. A. Macdonell's Sanskrit-English Dictionary, by Mr. G. Grierson.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN LITERARY SOCIETY.—(Tuesday, July 4.)

E. A. CAZALET, Esq., president, in the chair. Two resolutions were passed, thanking the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh for consenting to become patrons of the society, and voting an address of welcome on the occasion of the Cezarevich's visit to this country. It was announced that General Sir Robert Biddulph had been elected an honorary member, and that the society had sustained a great loss by the death of the president of the Russian Imperial Academy of Sciences, M. de Grot. A Russian letter from Count Milutine, applauding the objects of the society, was also read. That venerable statesman expressed the opinion that, if the society succeeded in modifying the ill-feeling existing in England towards Russia, that alone would be a service to the peace of Europe, and to the cause of universal civilisation. —After a preamble by the president about free trade and protection, and a suggestion that tariff wars would ere long be considered as objectionable as other methods of injuring our neighbours, Mr. Marval read a paper on the vast mineral productions of Russia as expounded in Prof. Mendeleeff's book on the Tariff Question, and concluded with a warm tribute to the hospitality of the Russians, which he found greater than what he had experienced in any other part of the world. Three Russian gentlemen, M. Borzenko, a barrister at the Court of Appeal at Moscow, M. Kremlov, a poet and actor, and M. Siromiatnikoff, a journalist and writer on Scandinavian lore, delivered eloquent and interesting addresses in the Russian language.—The proceedings closed with a speech in which Dr. Pollen suggested that English commerce had a wide field open to its enterprise, especially in the development of petroleum and other Russian productions, and the disposal of English goods in Russia. He also dwelt on the kindness and open-handed hospitality which he had met with while travelling and residing in Russia.

Sefton: a Descriptive and Historical Account.
By W. D. Caröe and E. J. A. Gordon.
(Longmans)

SEFTON church is some six miles from Liverpool, and is well-known to inhabitants of that city as the best example of Gothic architecture to be seen in the immediate neighbourhood. It is not a very old church. The tower and portions of the structure date from the fourteenth century, but the main body of the building is of early sixteenth century work. It has been constantly tinkered at, but has thus far escaped any "thorough restoration." It retains much fine woodwork of various dates, including an admirable and deservedly famous screen and many carved bench-ends; there are also two fine monumental effigies of knights carved in stone, pertaining respectively to the end of thirteenth and the beginning of the fourteenth centuries. There are some brasses of later date, but historic interest. In the neighbourhood are various old buildings, such as a water-mill, barns of different dates, picturesque farm-houses, and what not.

The authors of the pleasantly printed volume under consideration have investigated all these matters, brought together the various documents and other works and mentionings that refer to them, and so constructed the kind of book that all lovers of local antiquities will be glad to possess. They have also illustrated it freely with admirable plans and numerous excellent drawings of objects mentioned. It appears that they found their labours upon the collection of documents and other materials formed, with the assistance of Mr. Caröe, by the late rector of Sefton, the Rev. E. Horley. To this they have added, as opportunity occurred, till the present completeness was attained.

The history of Sefton is bound up with that of the Molyneux family, and to a less extent with that of the Blundells of Ince. The Molyneux chapel and tombs give character to the church, which was built, patroned, and restored by Molyneuxes, whose name also frequently occurs in the list of rectors. The pedigrees of these two families, therefore, rightly open the book. Chapters follow describing the church and its neighbourhood, the builders and the rectors, among whom were some remarkable persons, notably the Rothwells, father and son, whose successive incumbencies extended over a complete century. A fourth chapter deals with the chantries, which were suppressed almost as soon as they were founded. The parish registers and accounts are discussed, and, finally, the records of the Mock Corporation.

The Mock Corporation of Sefton was, in fact, a dining-club, apparently founded at some unknown date in the last century. It carried on its festive affairs in the style of a municipal body. It went to church in state at Sefton, Sunday by Sunday. It owned regalia, which still exist. The minutes of its dinners reflect the local and national politics of the time. They have formed the subject of papers, addressed to local antiquarian bodies, but have never before been printed entire. It is not possible to read them through; but there are many entries of considerable interest, and it is well that the whole should be put out of risk of destruction.

I have thus briefly indicated the contents of this work, so interesting to Liverpool antiquaries. It remains only to add that the book is carefully written and admirably printed and bound. The appearance of monographs of this sort in all parts of the country is much to be desired. It is seldom that any has been put into so attractive as well as scholarly a form.

W. M. CONWAY.

THE HOLFORD PRINT SALE.

THE great day of the Holford Print Sale at Christie's fell too late for chronicling its details in our present issue. It was on Thursday that the Rembrandts, which were the fine fleur of the collection, passed under the hammer. These we shall hope to write about next week; to-day it will be enough to record the dispersion of those prints by Albert Dürer which until Tuesday last—when they were sold—had formed a portion of that historic assemblage which belonged to Mr. Holford—"collection," properly speaking, we can scarcely call it, for Mr. Holford, we believe, was not a true collector in the sense of one buying things separately and with a studious care for the quality of each, but rather a large wholesale purchaser. Nearly all of his assemblage came to him, it is said, en bloc.

The prices obtained by the Dürers on Tuesday were, on the whole, good. The first Dürer offered was "The Adam and Eve," a good impression which Mr. Dunthorne acquired for £100—naturally a much smaller sum than was paid last year for the quite exceptional impression in Mr. Richard Fisher's sale; but that indeed was a marvel of quality, the like of which it can hardly be possible to see again. But if, in the matter of the "Adam and Eve," the late Mr. Fisher's impression must have the pas over that which had been housed at Mr. Holford's, Mr. Holford's "St. Hubert" was perhaps the finest impression ever seen. At the least, it was one of the finest; and it well deserved the price at which Mr. Meder, of Vienna, ransomed it on Tuesday. This was £150. Resuming now the natural order of the sale, let us record the disposal of the sixteen small prints known as "The Passion of Christ" for £50 (Colnaghi); the small round print of the Crucifixion, £18; "The Prodigal Son," £7 10s. (Colnaghi); a delicate impression of the charming little subject of "The Virgin seated by a Wall," with its quaint background of German city, £7 (Deprez); "The Virgin holding a Pear," £5 (Gutekunst)—the Fisher example of this print fetched scarcely £2, while the Seymour Haden impression, which had once been Mariette's, realised £13 13s.; the rare print of "The Holy Family," £110 (Gutekunst); the extraordinarily finished "St. Jerome in his Cell," £130 (Meder); the famous "Melancholia," a fine impression of this undoubtedly fascinating but not particularly rare print, £62 (Meder); the "Great Fortune," £18 10s.; the splendid subject of "The Knight and Death," £145 (Meder); the beautiful subject of "The Coat of Arms with the Cock," but only a tolerable impression of it, £13—a somewhat better impression had fetched £21 in the Fisher Sale; and, lastly, an extraordinarily fine impression of the "Coat of Arms with a Skull," £75 (Meder).

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

DESPITE the lateness of the season, the Fine Art Society will open next week, in New Bond-street, two exhibitions of exceptional interest: a series of landscapes and flowers in Japan, in water-colour, by Mr. Alfred Parsons; and the original drawings which Mr. Hugh Thomson made to illustrate Mr. Austin Dobson's "Ballad of Beau Brocade."

ON Thursday, July 27, Messrs. Bennett & Son, of Dublin, will commence the sale of the very valuable collection of prints, engravings, and miscellaneous objects of art, which had been formed by the late Dr. Jaspar K. Joly. Though there is included an almost complete series of the works of Dickens, and first editions of Swift, Sterne, Fielding, Goldsmith, &c., the most important feature of the sale is the extraordinary collection of the works of Bewick. Besides large paper copies of the British Quadrupeds, Birds, and Fables, there is also a folio volume containing more than 3000 proofs of the rarest woodcuts. Among them, we may specially mention two impressions of the Chillingham Bull on vellum, in the first state, with the border and before the name was added; and impressions on vellum and satin of the Lion, Tiger, Elephant, Zebra, and Kyaloe Ox.

AN exhibition of water-colour drawings, executed by the artists of the Archaeological Survey of Egypt, will be held at the residence of the Marquis of Bute, 83, Eccleston-square, S.W., from July 15 to July 22. The collection comprises sketches by Mr. Percy Buckman of various sites of historical interest in the provinces of Minieh and Assiut in Upper Egypt, a large number of facsimile drawings of wall-paintings in tombs of the Ancient and Middle Kingdoms in the same province by Mr. Buckman, Mr. Blackden, and Mr. Howard Carter, as well as many architectural drawings from the tombs by Mr. John Newberry. Cards for admission may be had on application at the offices of the Egypt Exploration Fund, 37, Great Russell-street, opposite the British Museum.

AT the meeting of the Japan Society, to be held on Wednesday next, at 20, Hanover-square, Mr. George Crawley, formerly of the Imperial Engineering College, will read a paper on "Wood and its Application to Japanese Artistic and Industrial Design." The collection of Japanese wood-working tools in the South Kensington Museum has been lent for exhibition. Mizutani Takichi, a daiku (master carpenter and joiner) from Tokio, will give practical demonstrations of Japanese carpentry and joinery; while a London joiner will furnish illustrations of English methods of work, for purposes of comparison.

THE annual meeting of subscribers to the British school at Athens will be held on Wednesday next, at 5 p.m., in the meeting room of the Society of Antiquaries, Burlington House, with the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. The reports of the director and of the managing committee will be read, and officers will be elected for the ensuing session. All members of the Hellenic Society are invited to attend.

HER MAJESTY has been pleased to convey her thanks to Messrs. Cassell & Co. for copies of the portraits of the Duke and Duchess of York, which were produced for school decoration. These portraits (which originally appeared in the Quiver and Cassell's Magazine) were reproduced on plate paper, and issued gratuitously by Messrs. Cassell and Co. to the elementary schools throughout the kingdom.

MUSIC.

OPERA AT COVENT GARDEN.

"I RANTZAU" was given last Friday week under the direction of the composer. As the plot and music have already been described in the ACADEMY, it will be only necessary to correct or confirm the impressions made on us by the opera on the occasion of its production at Florence last November. Mascagni must have found out by now that it is easier to make than to maintain a reputation. The sudden success of "Cavalleria Rusticana" perhaps made him forget this, for he does not seem to have used proper discretion in accepting libretti. In "Cavalleria Rusticana," a story appealing powerfully to the emotions, he found good material: as Moses by Aaron and Hur, so were the hands of the composer stayed up by his librettist. "L'Amico Fritz" was a dull book, and much clever music was wasted on it. The story of "I Rantza" has many good points: it is based on hatred and love, and are not these the main springs of opera? But neither exposition, development, nor dénouement is satisfactory, and the musician only finds one or two strong situations. That Mascagni has made the most of these is one of the signs of promise which we detect in the work; we refer to the interview between Luisa and her father at the end of the second act, and the meeting of the brothers at the close of the third act. The composer ought never to have accepted the book: not only is it faulty, but it demands, in our opinion, music of quite a different character to that provided by Mascagni—less storm and stress, and plenty of local colour. The composer, however, is young, has genius, and can afford to make one, or even more, mistakes; still each step in the wrong direction has to be retraced, and not without toil and trouble. "I Rantza" will never take the world by storm, but its merits must not be ignored. If only Mascagni can find another suitable libretto, we feel sure that he will surpass the best effort which he has hitherto made. There is no more painful chapter in the history of opera than that which tells of the genius wasted on dull material; much fine music has thus sunk into hopeless oblivion. The performance of the opera on Friday was, on the whole, good. The part of Luisa scarcely suits Mme. Melba, but she did the best she could with it. Signor de Lucia as Giorgio displayed great intensity. The brothers Gianni and Giacomo were well represented by MM. Ancona and Castelmarty. Mr. David Bispham sang well, but in his acting was not quite gentle enough for the tender-hearted schoolmaster.

There was a magnificent performance of "Les Huguenots" on the following evening. Meyerbeer's opera is full of genius, and, when well interpreted, the weak moments pass more or less unnoticed. The duet between Raoul (M. Jean de Reske) and Valentine (Mme. Albani) has rarely been more splendidly sung. Mlle. Giulia Ravogli was in every way an admirable Urbano. M. Lassalle as the Conte de San Bris was dramatic and dignified. M. Edouard de Reske was at his best as Marcello. Signor Bevnigani conducted in an able manner.

"Die Meistersinger" was performed on Wednesday evening. Mme. Albani's Eva is not one of her best Wagner impersonations; but her fine singing, her earnestness and stage experience, make amends for what else may be lacking. M. Jean de Reske sang splendidly, and looked picturesque as Walther. Mr. David Bispham deserves high praise for his Beckmesser; he was properly serious, and therefore made his part effective. Mr. Hedmond as David sang well, but showed a tendency to overact his rôle. M. Lassalle was a dignified Sachs; Herr Wiegand, a heavy father; and M. Dufriche, a not very satisfactory Fritz Kothner. Signor Mancinelli conducted in his usual manner.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE short series of Richter Concerts came to a successful close on Monday, July 10. The programme was devoted exclusively to Wagner and Beethoven. Mme. Sherwin gave a correct but rather a cold reading of "Elisabeth's Greeting." Mr. Andrew Black declaimed in excellent style "Pogner's Address," from act i. of "Die Meistersinger." An excerpt from the "Rheingold" was not very satisfactory, so far as the vocalists were concerned. The instrumental movements of the "Choral Symphony" were magnificently played. Dr. Hans Richter conducts Beethoven's great work with power and veneration. The concert commenced with the "Tannhäuser" Overture, and full justice was rendered to it both by band and conductor. As an interpreter of Wagner and Beethoven, Dr. Richter still stands facile princeps.

LITERATURE.

Underneath the Bough. A Book of Verses.
By Michael Field. (Bell.)

MICHAEL FIELD—that gifted, that diligent, poet—has in the past produced much that is passionate, much that is beautiful—the passion showing with intensest flame in her dramas and in Long Ago; the beauty seen perhaps at its most typical flower in the lyrics of Sight and Song. But the present volume, the last that its writer has produced, is pervaded by qualities which, while they by no means appear here for the first time, yet certainly are here more recurrent than hitherto: do certainly find here the most sustained as well as the most clear and perfect expression that they have yet reached.

The mystery of human life, the mystery of its visible ending, have indeed haunted this poet throughout her whole poetical career. Not wonderful that! so elemental is the subject, so inevitable are the thoughts—the “thoughts too deep for tears”—that it suggests that no poet can escape from its shadow, or from the brooding sadness, that is not all sadness, which the shadow strikes into human hearts. But what substantially distinguishes the present volume from those that have preceded it is the changed, the ennobled, temper which the poet has now brought to the contemplation of death. It is a temper of mind which—in the calmness of it at least, in the altitude in which it abides, in the rarity of the air which is vital to it—is essentially Wordsworthian.

Of this especial mode of regarding the shows of mortal life, and its vapourlike vanishing, we have already had indications in such poems as the “Shepherd Boy” of Sight and Song; and readers of that poem will require no further words of mine to indicate my meaning. But the mood which in Sight and Song was sparsely episodic, here pervades the book from end to end. The opening “Invocation” of the volume shows us

“The white swan, that fair diviner,
Who in death a bliss describing Sings her sweetest notes a-dying!”

In the first poem of the First Book of these songs we see mortal love intensely triumphing over mortality—

“Heaven itself is but the casket
For Love’s treasure ere he ask it,
Ere with burning heart he fellow,
Piercing through corruption’s hollow.”

And if its final poem ends the book with a burst of lyric appeal to Bacchus for his inspiration, we may be sure that it is the rightly divine Bacchus who is here invoked; and that the wine prayed for is nought but that draught of strong poetic vintage that shall clarify and not dim the eyes, that shall make them keen to divine the shows of the world, and to pierce into that ether of the imaginative existence which girds it, and begins where the rim of our mortal world ends.

The real significance, the deepest emphasis of the book, as well as the high-water mark of its artistry, must be sought for in poems like “Death men say” (p. 8), or “Others may drag at memory’s fetter” (p. 32), or “Bring me life of fickle breath” (on the following page), or “Death for all thy grasping stealth” (p. 35), or “Solitary Death” (p. 38), or “Yonder slope of sunny ground” (p. 42), or that lovely memorial poem, “No longer will she bend” (p. 51). But instead of bare catch-lines, let me give a pregnant quotation: brief, but an entire poem:

“Others may drag at memory’s fetter,
May turn for comfort to the vow
Of mortal breath; I hold it better
To learn if verily and how Love knits me with the loved one now.

“Others for solace, sleep-forsaken,
May muse upon the days of old;
To me it is delight to waken,
To find my Dead, to feel them fold
My heart, and for its dross give gold.”

Or take this equally brief piece, thinking as you read it—as perforce you must think—of Browning’s “Still Ailing Wind”:

“Come, mete me out my loneliness, O wind,
For I would know
How far the living who must stay behind
Are from the dead who go.

“Eternal Passer-by, I feel there is In thee a stir,
A strength to pierce the yawning distances
From her grave-stone to her.”

The absence of passion from such poems as the above, the substitution for passion of something intenser still, is characteristic of all the pieces in the book dealing with the memory of the dead, and with the deathless love of the living.

How, exactly, the poet conceives the case of those who have passed out of mortal bounds, it is difficult clearly to gather. Probably her faith on this matter is no steadfastly ascending temple-flame; probably it flickers fitfully, this way and that, like the thoughts of so many of us in this wind-blown age. At any rate, we find here no faintest echo of that “Certain am I,” which sounded through the song the “solemn Tuscan fashioned,” hardly a hint of the mediaeval conception of a future—which for some of us must still be a constant conception, and one not merely of bygone ages and of bygone personal moods—in which men and women are substantially men and women still, who “look so and so, and press actual hands.” Our poet has not yet attained to think that the entering into bounds, the becoming severely conditioned, the undergoing that birth of a spirit “come in the flesh” with all the straightness and pain which such “coming” means, is, indeed, nothing other than progress, is gain which can never be dropped, or lost, in a wisely and justly ordered universe.

Yet the pantheistic conception of things, short as it may fall of actual, sufficing, every-day comfort, is one certainly capable of exquisite poetic issues; and the conception has never been more exquisitely handled—handled with more of the rare, thin, fine poetry of which it is capable—than in “Winds To-day,” with its vision of the dead holding in their hands—and outpouring them—all the subtle, spiritual essences that green the face of our visible world year by year:

“Winds to-day are large and free,
Winds to-day are westerly;
From the land they seem to blow
Whence the sap begins to flow
And the dimpled light to spread,
From the country of the dead.

“Ah, it is a wild, sweet land
Where the coming May is planned,
Where such influences throb
As our frosts can never rob.
Of their triumph, when they bound
Through the tree and from the ground.

“Great within me is my soul,
Great to journey to its goal,
To the country of the dead;
For the cornel-tips are red,
And a passion rich in strife
Drives me towards the home of life.

“Oh, to keep the spring with them
Who have flushed the cornel-stem,
Who imagine at its source
All the year’s delicious course,
Then express by wind and light
Something of their rapture’s height!”

Most exquisite again, in a similar mood, is the address to Death, ending:

“To a lone freshwater, where the sea
Stirs the silver flux of the reeds and willows,
Come thou, and beckon me
To lie in the lull of the sand-sequestered billows:

“Then take the life I have called my own
And to the liquid universe deliver;
Loosening my spirit’s zone,
Wrap round me as thy limbs the wind, the light,
The river.”

Or, yet again, the lighter touch of “Little Lettuce has lost her name,

Slipt away from our praise and our blame;
Let not love pursue her,
But conceive her free
Where the bright drops be
On the hills, and no longer rue her!”

So far as I have yet dealt with the book, I have dealt rather with its matter than its manner; but its diction also is well worthy of comment. Language, whether it be French, Latin, and the like, or simply that pictured and richly tinted language which is the speciality of the poet and the man of letters, is a thing to be learnt, to be acquired by study: a thing that hardly comes instinctively to anyone. Michael Field is not only, as I have said, a gifted and a diligent poet, she is also a learned one: a curious student of all the fine and expressive ways of verse, and of the artists, old and new, who have devised or employed the most varied poetical tools. Manifestly she has studied many authors, in languages not a few, and studied them to her own poetic profit; has, by means of that study, been enabled to express, more adequately and directly than would otherwise have been possible, thoughts and feelings that are still personal and essentially her own. Even without the hint conveyed in one of the verses of p. 81, the discerning reader might easily have guessed that who were his song-writing contemporaries, had been a dominant influence of late in moulding Michael Field's poetic method. The lyrical work of Browning's later volumes has undoubtedly formed—consciously or unconsciously—the chief model for such free sparkling pieces as "Say, if a gallant rose my bower doth scale" (p. 23); and the opening lines of "A shady silence fills" (p. 104), recalls, quite curiously, a certain fine descriptive passage in "Fifine at the Fair."

I have dwelt much on the seriousness—of subject and treatment—that characterises the present book. But let it not be thought that, even here, its writer's muse constantly haunts the grave and busies itself with mere moonlight-coloured musings upon the dim, far-off future. Let me disprove any such possible suspicion by a single quotation, a song of love jubilantly satisfied:

"Through hazels and apples
My love I led,
Where the sunshine dapples
The strawberry bed:
Did we pluck and eat
That morn, my sweet?
"And back by the alley
Our path I chose,
That we might dally
By one rare rose:
Did we smell at the heart
And then depart?
"A lover, who grapples
With love, doth live
Where roses and apples
Have naught to give:
Did I take my way
Unfed that day?"

I think it is not the mere charm of novelty, the sense that this is the latest poetic gift of a generous poetic giver, which inclines me to believe that the present is the book of hers that will be ofteneest in my hands, the one whose contents will be ofteneest in my memory.

J. M. GRAY.

Socialism and the American Spirit. By Nicholas Paine Gilman. (Macmillans.)

MR. GRANT ALLEN, himself a Socialist, has predicted that the United States will be the last country to accept Socialism; and another Socialist, Mr. Sidney Webb, as quoted in this volume, complains bitterly of the barrier that American self-complacency opposes to the reception of his ideas. Mr. Gilman, who has no sympathy with Socialism, shows in a very able and temperate manner why this should be so: why the American spirit is radically opposed to handing over the whole machinery of industrial production to the State. The typical American is self-reliant, enterprising, and ambitious; he wants to be let alone, and to let others alone; he enjoys the excitement of free competition, and thinks it better to be a responsible human being than a cog in a wheel. Granted that the present economic system is accompanied by many hardships and grievances, he has faith in the power of progressive civilisation to remove them. But neither has the American spirit any sympathy with Spencerian individualism. The early settlers in Ohio did indeed hold that "it was a violation of individual rights for the State to take one man's money to pay the school bill of his neighbour's child"

(p. 140), but experience taught them the ineffectiveness of the voluntary system; and now Mr. Gilman tells us that "every Commonwealth in the Union has felt itself free to establish and maintain public schools, and it has never dreamed of apologising to the taxpayer" (p. 96). The same holds good of public libraries and parks, and of legislation limiting the hours of labour. Such an employment of the public powers is eminently in harmony with American habits of local self-government. But any attempt to nationalise industry would at once come into violent conflict with the system of federal government. It would necessitate complete centralisation of authority and the abolition of free institutions. Thus, the mere beginning of a very doubtful experiment would involve the destruction of what Americans regard as the indispensable basis of their present prosperity. Nor is this all. The abuses of democracy are even more likely than its advantages to set Americans against a scheme that would immensely multiply the opportunities of jobbery and corruption. Imagine a spoils system where the spoils were commensurate with the whole wealth of the country!

As Mr. Gilman observes, "the governing powers in America need purification to-day rather than an extension of their field" (p. viii.). There must, he tells us, be great reforms in the Civil Service "before the American city can safely assume such powers as Birmingham, Manchester, and Glasgow exercise with such good effect apparently" (p. 311). To this the Socialists will perhaps reply that the present malversation of public money is due to that very institution of private property which they propose to abolish. But human nature would remain the same after Socialism had been proclaimed; and we may be sure that the immediate effect of such a revolution would be to transfer property from its present holders to the idlest and most rapacious hands in the community rather than to the community itself. But nothing seems farther from the thoughts of Socialists than a sober calculation of consequences or the construction of a scheme in harmony with the known facts of political economy and of human nature. Their state of mind was aptly expressed (not without a touch of American humour) by a speaker at a recent People's Party convention, who concluded a vigorous harangue thus: "I don't know what it is we want, but we want it right away, and we want it bad!" (p. 202).

Such as it is, Mr. Gilman ascribes American Socialism to two causes: the ideas brought over from Europe by ignorant artisans, chiefly Germans; and a clever romance, which has attracted considerable attention among ourselves also, Mr. Bellamy's Looking Backwards. In America the success of this work has been immense: in two years it sold over 350,000 copies (p. 194); its effect on clever literary people is described as wholesale hypnotisation; in September, 1888, a club was formed at Boston to propagate its principles, and the example thus set was quickly followed in other parts of the country, especially in California, "perhaps the most excitable state in the Union," and as much a hot-bed of Theosophy as of Socialism (p. 197)—not a mere accidental coincidence, for we learn that "many members of the Boston Club are enthusiastic adherents of theosophy, esoteric Buddhism, and kindred humbugs" (p. 219). There is another movement calling itself Christian Socialism, but differing widely from the English organisation of the same name set on foot by F. D. Maurice and his disciples, and, indeed, practically indistinguishable from the Bellamy school, since the first duty of its supporters is "to get people to read Looking Backwards." An English reader will be struck by the total absence of Mr. Henry George's name from these discussions; his scheme of land-nationalisation is not even mentioned in this volume as a ferment of public opinion, or as a theory that needs to be refuted.

It would be a great mistake to suppose that Mr. Gilman is satisfied with the present state of things, or that he despairs of its improvement. His general principle is "the desirability . . . of extending privileges and opportunities which the well-to-do classes enjoy as fast as possible to those who now have to work harder and longer" (p. 266). As one means to this end he advocates the introduction of a nine-hour day, to be followed, if successful, by a Saturday half holiday. Among more radical reforms co-operative production is as yet rather a fascinating ideal than a practical possibility. For the present Mr. Gilman builds his hopes on the more modest method of profit-sharing, a system already adopted, he tells us, by 300 firms (p. 281). The question is one on which he is peculiarly qualified to speak, having already made it the subject of a special treatise, to which the chapter on profit-sharing in this volume must be regarded as supplementary. Recent experience has gone to confirm his faith in this form of industrial partnership, and his quarrel with the Socialists is perhaps not unconnected with their attempts to discredit what may prove a dangerous competitor to their own more ambitious projects. Here the economic conditions on both sides of the Atlantic resemble one another nearly enough to make Mr. Gilman's arguments of direct practical interest to our own social reformers who, it is to be hoped, will study his new volume with the attention it deserves.

ALFRED W. BENN.

"RULERS OF INDIA."—Aurangzeb. By Stanley Lane-Poole. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

MR. LANE-POOLE has dealt with a memorable epoch of Indian history in a manner worthy of his subject. The character of Aurangzeb has been as puzzling to posterity as that of Oliver Cromwell, to whom he is here compared. But our author offers a picture which will be found admissible, even by those to whom it may not prove completely convincing.

For the benefit of those whose recollection of the facts is rusted, the following recapitulation may be allowed. The Prince whose name, in deference to European usage, stands in the forefront of this volume was the fourth surviving son of the Emperor Shahjahan by his Persian wife, Arjumand Banu, to whose memory he erected that modern "Mausoleum," the Taj Mahal of Agra. Although the sons of the same mother, the Princes varied greatly in character and habits, Sultan Dara, the eldest, being a freethinker and eclectic, while Shuja was a voluptuary, and Murad a boorish soldier. Playing one against the other, Aurangzeb contrived to get rid of all; he confined his father in the fortified palace at Agra, and in A.D. 1658 assumed the empire at Delhi, under the title of Alamgir, by which alone he is known to Orientals. For the first score or so of years his reign was peaceful, and—except for a serious illness and some trouble (of his own making) with the Hindus—Aurangzeb might have passed for a wise and prosperous ruler. About 1680, however, the Emperor's zeal for Islam led him into a serious error, tantamount to that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by his French contemporary. He resolved on reimposing the special tax on Hindus, which is computed to have doubled the incidence of the taxation upon a multitude which formed perhaps the bulk of the population. This measure was unsuccessful as an instrument of conversion; it did not even effect a very great permanent addition to the revenue; and it forms a very considerable obstacle to the notion of a likeness to the English Protector, whose statecraft would never have permitted such a lapse. Three years later the Emperor, whose faults were probably increasing as years hardened his character, collected all the forces of Hindustan for a final attack upon the Muhammadan kingdoms of the South. In 1686 Bijapur fell, after a protracted siege; the Emperor then proceeded against Golkonda, and subverted the monarchy when he had taken the capital. The Muslim States of the Deccan now came to an end, and the trouble of the conqueror at the same time began. The Mahrattas, who had been formerly content to be the Swiss of Bijapur, now set up for themselves, adopting wider aims and fully organising a system of universal plunder. This system proved completely successful for the next half-century, until finally developed into a sort of paramount influence over the whole of India. It was begun when Sivaji, the mercenary of Bijapur, assumed royal titles and functions in 1674. But Sivaji died; and the Emperor apparently thought that his followers could be safely neglected while the Muhammadan kingdoms were being dealt with. Nothing could have been a greater mistake: these kingdoms had been a breakwater; when they were destroyed, the Mughals were unprovided with the means of withstanding the flow of the Mahratta tide. It is an old story; and one that belongs to general Indian history rather than to the biography of Aurangzeb. But it was necessary to think of it here, a second blunder of the kind being quite fatal to the Emperor's reputation for statesmanship. An admiring yet judicious native contemporary was fain to admit that the Emperor's veneration for the law of Islam was a source of weakness in his administration; "every plan that he formed," says Kháfikhán, "came to little good, and every enterprise that he undertook was long in execution and failed in the end." He died, almost in despair, A.D. 1707.

Such is the sad and instructive lesson of Aurangzeb's career, as sympathetically told in the book before us. The Emperor had many advantages over the ordinary ruler of Oriental countries. He was not corrupted by indulgence or the love of flattery; he looked into everything with keen undecieved vision; he had an ideal of his duty and strove earnestly, through a long tenure of power, to fulfil it. This was much—but it was not enough for ultimate success; and, indeed, became the cause of ultimate ruin, even as misdirected power causes swifter catastrophes than mere stagnation. Aurangzeb's ideal was that the faithful should enjoy the benefits of a theocracy, in peace and light taxation. Unhappily, the prosperity of the faithful meant the alienation of those who thought otherwise, so that Nihilism became the politics of four-fifths of the population of India; peace was swamped by a deluge of war and devastation; finally, the taxation became so heavy that the able writer of the work before us gives the weight of his authority to the astonishing estimate that, for a short time, Aurangzeb had—at least on paper—a revenue equivalent to ninety millions sterling.

This is not the place for a detailed examination of the methods by which our author arrives at an estimate so opposed to probability. It cannot be believed that, in a time of considerable disturbance, when the nominal territories of the empire were smaller than now and the population could not have been a quarter of what it is to-day, while the quantity of gold and silver in circulation must have been still less—that in such conditions the Mughal government could have raised an income which, even at an equal valuation, exceeds that raised by the present British rulers. The reports of contemporary French and Italian travellers—supposing their information to have been correct—must be taken subject to two allowances: we must find out what was the exchange of the day, and we must make sure whether they are describing the gross revenue from all sources or that from land alone. Now, as to the first, they give an exchange-rate of two rupees to a crown of three livres, but they do not say what the "crown," or écu, was worth in French money. Up to 1676 the Parisian livre was worth one quarter more than that of Tours; so that if Bernier and Tavernier were speaking of the Paris écu—which seems to have been equal to 4s. 6d., English—then the rupee in those happy days was worth 2s. 3d. But Mr. Poole himself admits that the livre tournois was the current "livre of account as known to Bernier": hence the rupee would be only three-fourths of this, or a little over 1s. 8d.; and all these estimates must be reduced accordingly. On the other hand, our author shows reasons for supposing that they do not include all the sources of income, and assumes that these may have amounted to as much again as the revenue from land. Now, the Hindu poll-tax, which was introduced about 1680, had the effect of doubling the khirdj, or land-revenue, paid by the numerous non-Muslims; but that was liable to the condition that it could be collected, which, in many parts of the empire, it never could. We do, however, seem to see signs of this increment; for, while MS. records cited by the late Edward Thomas (Revenue resources, &c., pp. 33-5) give the net return of Aurangzeb's early years as £24,056,114, Mr. Poole estimates the revenue of a later period at £40,100,000, and, ultimately (according to a somewhat suspicious source, the Jesuit Catrou), at £43,550,000. This Mr. Poole would practically double by throwing in other items: it must be left to the judgment of his readers whether they admit or reject his reasoning. We must be content to refer them to pp. 124-6, observing that he himself is evidently aware of the little value of the evidence of Father Catrou (see Turks in India, p. 116 sq.).

Verbum Dei. The Yale Lectures on Preaching, 1893. By R. F. Horton. (Fisher Unwin.)

THE aim of these lectures is "to show that preaching must be the deliverance of a word of God, received immediately from God." The lecturer believes that to neglect of this fact is due "the general contempt into which preaching has fallen on this side of the Atlantic." He indicates the strength and sincerity of his own conviction on his first page, in the admission that "unless these lectures are such a word received in such a way they miss their mark." Only shallow critics, or such as suffer themselves to be provoked by Mr. Horton's tone towards priests and "sacerdotal churches," will feel disposed to treat lightly this preliminary claim. It is essential to the whole aim and argument of the lectures that it should be made, and the consciousness of having made it remains with Mr. Horton throughout his exposition. It gives his style intensity and passion; and yet a sense of serious responsibility pervades the volume, restraining its vehemence and checking its audacity. The book is written at a white heat, and yet carefully and anxiously. We concede that in a high and genuine sense Mr. Horton "speaks with authority." This first and most obvious merit it was essential that the lectures should have, but there are others which deserve mention. The papers are continually and evenly suggestive. Difficulties or objections which the critic notes as he reads are continually met or solved as he reads further, often in a passing phrase or an interjected sentence. We cannot be sure that we have all Mr. Horton's mind till we have read his last page. He does not strive after consistency, but he endeavours in each paragraph to seize firmly upon the truth immediately under his eye; and the result, taking one passage with another, is singularly consistent and full. One or two difficulties, however, remain with us after carefully reading the book, and these we will state before pointing out the chapters we most admire.

"The priest, I am courteous enough to suppose, has a sphere of his own." The parenthesis is not worthy of Mr. Horton; but we will agree, for argument's sake, to leave out of account the priest in our consideration of the preacher. Mr. Horton quotes with enthusiasm Chaucer's description of the "poor parson of a town" in his eighth lecture. But surely the "poor parson" of Chaucer bears very little resemblance to the mighty preacher so strenuously impressed upon us in Mr. Horton's pages. Chaucer, in fact, suggests to us a type of pastor which Mr. Horton's book almost ignores—the type described in the phrase, "a good parish priest." The distinctive characteristic of such a man is his instinct for looking after the sheep: his almost maternal solicitude for the soul's health of his fellows, his intense and keen delight in helping the helpless and befriending the friendless. This man's sphere is the parish rather than the pulpit. He may have no power of speech, and go through life without in the strict sense "converting" anybody; but in this matter of conversion the longest way round is often the shortest way home, and the parish priest we have in our mind's eye "makes for salvation" unobtrusively, quietly, lovingly, and yet persistently and continually, in the soul of every one he knows. Mr. Horton's book ignores this aspect of the pastor, which we venture to think as important as the prophetic. In St. Paul's case, his delight in serving and saving men and women, his continual craving to wash the stained and tired feet of his brethren, is as conspicuous and wonderful as his sword of inspired speech. Mr. Horton, perhaps unconsciously, conceives of men as "saved" only or mainly by the mighty wind of inspired speech; but unless we limit the meaning of salvation, even dumb friendliness is as potent and surely as inspired.

A second difficulty occurs to us in reading the first lecture, and is never quite solved by Mr. Horton. The one thing essential to the preacher is that he should "receive a communication direct from God." But do none of us except preachers receive communications direct from God? Mr. Horton is very positive that by Christ all men are made priests, but continually tends to forget that by Christ all men are also made prophets. His preacher tends to be "old priest writ large." He conceives of him usually as preaching to pagans—to men below the preacher in spiritual rank. The preacher, he insists, must be specially called and chosen for his work. Of course he must; but are not men of humbler but yet necessary professions called too? The lectures sometimes lose sight of the fact that "all service ranks the same with God," just as they incline to minimise the reality of the layman's communion with God, and forget that not preachers only but all men are ordered to be perfect. And thirdly, Mr. Horton must admit degrees of power in his preachers. He manfully claims for himself that his addresses are a word received from God, but he does not think himself an Isaiah or St. Paul. The language of the lectures leaves the impression that only Isaiahs and St. Pauls may honestly preach, and continually suggest the thought that any attempt to train preachers must be impious and foolish.

But our criticisms after all do not amount to much more than this: that we wish Mr. Horton would write some more lectures on the same subject. Our debt to him is great. His main contention, that the Christian preacher must believe in his own inspiration, is admirably maintained. It is based firmly on the vigorous denial of "the faithless supposition that the days of the word of the Lord are in the past." It is supported by the straightforward challenge: "I say there is no foundation in the Bible itself for the common practice of speaking of it as the Word of God." The first four of the nine lectures in which these positions are maintained are perhaps more full of point and matter, and better knit together than the last four; but better than any of these is Lecture 5 on "the Word of God outside the Bible." This lecture should be carefully noted by readers of Mr. Horton's books on Inspiration and Revelation. It is the fullest and most faithful recognition of the presence of the living God in our work-a-day world that we have met with in recent evangelical theology. It enables us to forgive Mr. Horton his girds at what he calls "the mediaevalisms of Anglo-Catholicism," his treasonable words against his Mother Oxford, his apparent indifference to the greatness of Greek literature. Of course, it does not entirely satisfy us: we ask for more. It would, for instance, throw light on the whole subject if we could be told why the prophets who hold no office in any of the churches—such writers as Wordsworth, Carlyle, Tennyson, Browning—are greater in and for their generation than the greatest of the professed or professional prophets—than Maurice, Robertson, or Campbell. We should like also to suggest that, inasmuch as "the poetry of a nation is the deepest pulse of its life," we ought to be able to recognise that the work of a poet, who did not know he was inspired at all, and who is often held a quite profane person, is more inspired than the works of poets conscious and proud of their high calling. Surely "King Lear" and "Macbeth" are more vitally inspired than Paradise Lost or Wordsworth's great Ode, and closer spiritually to the Psalms. Mr. Horton, in fact, does not discuss the very vital question, whether inspiration is necessarily self-conscious.

We have inclined to prefer the earlier lectures in the book above the later, and therefore our criticisms affect more especially the first half of the book. We have no space for adequate criticism of the last four lectures, but cannot refrain from calling attention to the fine passage in Lecture 6 on Meditation. In the second section of Lecture 6 we have Mr. Horton at his best, and Mr. Horton at his best is very good indeed.

DR. SCARTAZZINI'S COMMENTARY ON THE "DIVINA COMMEDIA."

THIS editio minor of Dr. Scartazzini's well-known commentary on the "Divina Commedia" will be welcomed by all students of Dante. The larger work, in spite of its many imperfections, which the author himself has shown no disposition to ignore, has had a deservedly wide circulation not only on the Continent (that is to say, in Italy and Germany, for in France the study of Dante is still strangely neglected), but also in this country and in America.

In the present volume Dr. Scartazzini has set himself to correct the most glaring faults which disfigured its predecessors, and we are glad to recognise that he has in a large measure succeeded. We are no longer, for instance, annoyed by irrelevant and intemperate remarks about previous commentators interjected in the midst of critical matter; and whereas the former commentary was monstrously out of proportion in the several cantiche (that on the "Paradiso," for example, occupying with the text close on 900 pages, as against only half that number devoted to the "Inferno"), in the present work the balance has been restored, and each division of the poem receives its due share of attention.

A great deal of space was wasted in the former volumes by the inclusion of sundry lengthy argumentative excursions, which not only were in extremely bad taste, but were as often as not positively futile into the bargain. We are glad to note the disappearance of these. At the same time it is not a little amusing to observe that, while Dr. Scartazzini now very sensibly deprecates discussion of a certain so-called crux, characterising it as "più vana che la stessa vanità," he yet complacently refers the reader to a long rambling note of his own on this very subject, which occupies no less than six and a-half closely-printed pages (interspersed with Hebrew quotations!) in the earlier commentary. In this connexion we must protest against being constantly referred to the "Commento Lipsiese," as the author is pleased to call his former work. Such references, which occur on almost every other page in the second half of the volume, are altogether out of place in a work which professes to be self-contained. Nor is it easy to see what useful purpose is served in a book of this kind by giving long strings of references to classical authorities, with some of which Dante probably was never acquainted; for instance, in a single brief note on Geryon ("Inf." xvii. 1) the reader is referred to Hesiod, Dionysius, Aeschylus, Euripides, Lucretius, Virgil, Horace, Ovid, and Seneca, as well as to the Revelation! and, again, in a note on Alexander ("Inf." xiii., 107) there are references to Lucan, Valerius Maximus, Cornelius Nepos, Cicero, Justin, two to Plutarch, and three to Diodorus Siculus. Affeddaddio! to use the author's own expression. A quotation from Virgil in the one case, and a couple from Lucan and Orosius in the other, would have been much more to the purpose. In a book intended for the use of schools, as this is, and for the ordinary reader, the passages themselves, if necessary, should be given, not mere references. The object of a note is presumably to illustrate the meaning of the author, not to serve as a vehicle for displaying the erudition of the editor. Dr. Scartazzini is too fond of this sort of display. The consequence is that his book is overloaded with references to authorities, which would constitute a whole library in themselves, while many of them are practically inaccessible to the ordinary student. The space thus occupied might have been much more advantageously employed in giving apposite quotations from authors Dante is known to have made use of.

Nevertheless, on the whole we can cordially recommend the commentary. It is undoubtedly a great advance on anything of the kind that has yet been attempted within the same compass. The information is, as a rule, clearly and concisely conveyed, and it is for the most part well "up to date." We are surprised, however, to observe that Dr. Scartazzini is apparently unaware of the fact that the allusion to Guenever in the "Paradiso" (xvi. 14-15) has long ago been explained by the publication (in the ACADEMY in the first instance) of an extract from the MS. version of the Old French Lancelot, the incident referred to being omitted in the printed version of the romance. We may point out that the note on Bertran de Born ("Inf." xxviii.) requires revision—the "Young King" was not "primogenito" of Henry II., nor was it the latter, but his son, Richard Cœur-de-Lion, who besieged Bertran in the castle of Hautefort in 1183.

The text, so far as we can judge, is merely a reproduction of that adopted in the former edition. The editor still adheres to his reading Titan ("Purg." ix. 1)—in spite of the fact that there is practically no MS. authority for it—and to his fantastic interpretation, though he modestly, and with somewhat unnecessary hyperbole, observes that it is "le mille miglia lontana dal pretenderla ad infallibilità." On the other hand, he still refuses to admit the almost certainly correct reading giovane ("Inf." xxviii. 135), arguing with delightful inconsistency that, though it is unquestionably right from the historical point of view, it must be rejected owing to its lack of sufficient MS. support.

It is a pity Dr. Scartazzini has not taken the trouble to revise the index, which he has borrowed, misprints and all, from that printed at the end of Fraticelli's edition. The result is that, in more than one instance, the index and the notes directly contradict each other.

We must not omit to say a word or two in praise of the "get-up" of the volume. Though a marvel of cheapness, there is nothing of the "cheap and nasty" stamp about it. It is admirably printed with clear-cut type on good paper, and, unlike too many foreign publications, it is well sewn. It is, in fact, in every way a creditable performance; and we wish both author and publisher the success they deserve.

We may mention in conclusion that Dr. Scartazzini has dedicated the book to the Hon. William Warren Vernon, in grateful recognition of the services he has rendered to Dantesque literature by his publication of the Latin commentary of Benvenuto da Imola.

That Mrs. Smith! By John Strange Winter. (White.)

A Strange Studio. By Paul Rowden. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

THERE is force and vigour in every line of Mr. Joseph Hatton's Under the Great Seal. This author is always at his best when dwelling upon scenes of tyranny and oppression; and here we have a narrative which derives its interest from the scandalously cruel regulations issued by the British Government in the middle of the last century for settlers in Newfoundland, with the view of preserving the place as a mere national fishing ground, and of discouraging attempts at colonisation. It is not very easy to construct a story dealing with two generations of men and two totally distinct sets of characters, and it would be difficult, for the reason indicated, to give, in short compass, any outline of the plot; but Mr. Hatton has, on the whole, done his work exceedingly well. There are no profundities of passion and no straining after humour; but for vivid, realistic description there are few present writers who can be credited with superiority to Mr. Hatton. Every character comes out finely and clearly shaped; and underlying the whole story there is a current of earnest feeling which would of itself be sufficient to commend it to the notice of readers. The two heroes, father and son, are maddened by brutal injuries, and give full rein to their vengeful feelings, yet both are strictly devotional at heart, and end their careers in an atmosphere of restful piety. Some of the descriptive portions of the book are of quite first-class merit. There are very few novelists who could, for instance, relate all the details of Elmira Webb's seduction in perfectly plain-spoken language, and yet so carefully guarded in its terms that it might be read aloud and create a profound impression in any company.

In many respects Mr. Parker appears to be a "coming man" in fiction, not of quite first-rate order, but of good end-of-the-nineteenth-century class. He is not one of those giants of erudition and linguistic pliability who bubble over with allusion and metaphor, and enrich the language by half a dozen new phrases in every chapter; but within his limits he writes a sensible and enjoyable novel. In Mrs. Falchion, the lady who gives her name to the story is a sort of superb animal, soulless and selfish to the finger tips, but, like an animal, unconscious of her personal charms. Her conversion to a softer nature forms the main subject of the narrative. Boyd Madras, ex-convict, and husband of the lady calling herself Mrs. Falchion; Mr. Clovelly, a novelist; Galt Roscoe, a young officer; Mr. Devlin, an American millionaire, and his daughter Ruth, are all well-sketched characters. There is a little too much of the conventional melodrama about the story, as regards incident. Half a dozen separate people who make acquaintance on board a steamship bound from Australia to England do not, as a rule, all happen to meet and renew acquaintance in the backwoods of Canada. But the novel is a very good one for all that.

Nobody could with any fairness take exception to Mr. Henry Cresswell's tale entitled Disinherited. Almost from the first page we see how things are to end: everything is optimistic and comforting to the nerves; there are no harrowing details; and the narrative is of an easy, flowing kind, not likely to exalt its author to any high pinnacle of reputation, or to add materially to such popularity as he may already have acquired, but constituting a good, sensible story. The interest centres round two families named respectively Challoner and Hargrave; and as the former have ejected the latter by fair or—as the ejected ones would have us believe—foul means from the possession of certain ancestral estates, it is but right that their descendants in the next generation should bring matters straight again by a convenient process of intermarriage. Everything goes smoothly and comfortably from start to finish. Everybody is well off, from a pecuniary point of view; and once, where a little difficulty threatens with regard to money, it is solved by a deus ex machina in the shape of a windfall of £2,000 a year. Even Mr. and Mrs. Dubois, the mild villains of the piece, retire at length, baffled indeed but with well-filled purses. Blanche Hargrave and Geoffrey Challoner are a pair of lovers with whom no fault can be found. Thoughtful persons may opine that Max Hargrave, with his jealous temper and eccentric obstinacy, may give Julie Challoner rather a troublesome time of it in the connubial state; but, fortunately, neither author nor reviewer has anything to do with the after-lives of the characters in a story.

It is scarcely a matter for wonder that Dr. George Macdonald should be a favourite with a large class of readers. He has broad, unsectarian views, wide sympathies with human nature, and a certain fearlessness in treatment, disregarding of all ordinary conventionalities: as in his latest story, Snow and Heather, where we find Kristy Barclay, a "braw lassie," born and bred amid the heather, wooed and won in marriage by Francis Gordon, the exceedingly aristocratic owner of Weelset Castle, and laird of the estate on which Kristy was reared. Dr. Macdonald does not, perhaps, possess the versatility, the wealth of quotation and historical parallel, or the facility of word-painting possessed by Charles Kingsley; but he fully equals that writer in intensity of feeling and in a sturdy championship of the noble and good which would furnish claim for a hallmark of approval to far inferior work. This being the case, it is rather a pity that, as usual, the work teems with dialogues spoken in broad Scotch, and written as such. It is the more exasperating because we are given to understand that the two chief characters, Kristy and Francis, could all the while have been conversing in pure English, correct enough to satisfy the most fastidious Pall-mall lounge, and were only talking as they did because the girl wished to save herself trouble and the man was anxious to maintain his boast of being able to converse in the national dialect. The author, probably, thinks that his story would suffer if written in fair English; there is little doubt that in its present form it will lessen the pleasure of a multitude of readers.

With entertaining naïveté Mr. Grant Allen publishes, under the heading of Ivan Greet's Masterpiece, &c., a volume of short stories, most of which have appeared in one or other of the periodicals of the day, and feelingly alludes in his preface to the hard fate that befell two of the number which now appear for the first time:

"They were sent round," he says, "to every magazine in which they possessed the ghost of a chance; but, as usually happens when one writes anything in which one feels more than ordinary personal interest, they were unanimously declined by the whole press of London."

Readers who peruse these two stories will probably not find it difficult to imagine a reason why, though dear to the heart of the author, they failed to find favour with editors. The first one, "The Sixth Commandment," contains a good deal of forcible language upon the rule in French law which allows a husband to kill both his wife and her paramour when surprising them in flagrante delicto. The main feature of the other story, "The Missing Link," is an examination, in dialogue form, of Darwin's theory of the descent of man. Contentious discussion of social problems and the elucidation of scientific theories are neither of them subjects of paramount interest to the multitude. To a select few they are, of course, delightful.

Some interest attaches to Dr. Janet of Harley-street as coming from the pen of a daughter of Dr. Kenealy, of Tichborne Trial fame. It may be admitted that the lady inherits from her father the gift of possessing to the full the courage of her opinions; but there is little need of an apologetic fly-leaf issued by the publishers, suggesting that the work embodies "the author's somewhat unorthodox views upon the woman's question." Miss Kenealy's views are considerably less "advanced" than those of a great many lady writers we could mention; and, beyond pleading for a recognition of woman's equality with man, which is certainly orthodox enough from a lady's point of view, there is not a trace of the "shrieking sisterhood" to be found in her book. What fault there is in the story is due to an artistic blunder more than anything else. Phyllis Eve, a young girl of nineteen, consents to marry the elderly Marquis de Richeville, and, repenting of the deed, deserts him about an hour after the ceremony, and comes to London, where she lives under the protection of Miss Janet Doyle, a lady doctor, and falls in love with Paul Liveing, a hospital surgeon. Evidently the writer desires us to sympathise with the young woman who takes this bold and unusual step, and to feel properly indignant when the deserted husband makes the very natural request that his wife shall return to him; but, as the Marquis is only described in general terms as being a sensual and wicked person, and as his only actual offence has been to kiss the girl passionately on her cheek and lips upon the morning of her wedding-day, one fails to see where the enormity of his conduct comes in, or what reasonable excuse his wife has for her abandonment of him after permitting the wedding ceremony to be performed. As to some points of law involved, Miss Kenealy might have studied the Jackson case with advantage.

To judge from internal evidence, Wilfrid Waide, though only recently published, must have been written at least ten or a dozen years ago. At that time the "aesthetic" mania was a living reality, but to-day it is as completely dead and buried as coal-scuttle bonnets or periwigs; and there is no point now in writing a book full of contemptuous allusions to pale green dados, and terra cotta curtains, and votaries of culture with cadaverous face and long hair. In other respects the novel is up-to-date enough, and it is fairly well written too. The subject is one which always readily lends itself to the construction of an interesting tale, being a narrative of the machinations of a firm of rascally lawyers in an attempt to get for themselves possession of most of the income of a client's estate. Some detective business is also introduced, which, as usual, proves of exciting interest.

The Twilight of Love is further described on the title-page as "being four studies of the artistic temperament." Least anyone should be misled by this description, it should be said at once that the studies have reference solely to looseness of morals and conjugal infidelity on the part of men and women connected with the stage. The first and third stories are about women who desert their husbands for other men, though in one case, it is true, the erring spouse returns penitent to her husband—or rather to the man who was once her husband, for in the meantime he has divorced her. In the second story a vocalist rises to fame by the help of his mistress, an accomplished actress and playwright, and then deserts her in order to marry an heiress. In the last story a man lives upon his wife's earnings and kills her by brutal ill-treatment. Possibly some of these stories are founded upon fact, and Mr. Brookfield writes with an easy air of acquaintance with the scenes depicted; but the subjects he has chosen are of a rather unsavoury nature.

Cap and Gown Comedy is a book that will most interest the scholastic profession. It gives the experiences of a schoolmaster, first as assistant in a private establishment, next in a second grade public school, and afterwards as archididasculus of a country grammar school. The style is learned and sententious, and abounds in quotations, for which the writer apologises; "it is," he says, "a most cuckoo-like way I have, to lay the eggs of my experience in other men's words." Some of this borrowed literature is introduced with great felicity; and the author might be a veritable Marie Bashkirtseff, for the candour with which he lays bare all his weaknesses and defects, and suggests with amusing obviousness the reason why his innate good nature and generous resolves made his struggle with boys difficult. One curious feature of the book is that it is published anonymously, whereas a portion of the introductory matter and the whole of the chapter entitled "Cave" appeared in the May, June, and July numbers of the Journal of Education for 1885, where they were accredited to Ascott R. Hope. It seems strange that a veteran writer of such widespread repute should either desire to conceal his name or, having done so, should have forgotten that means for his ready identification were lying about.

Two novelettes close our list. That Mrs. Smith, by John Strange Winter, is as delightful reading as most of that lady's productions, and needs no further commendation.

The other, A Strange Studio, is rather a weird sort of story, and deals with lost wills, old country houses, secret passages, sliding panels, and so forth. It is moderately interesting, but is scarcely likely to enhance to any material extent the popularity of the series of which it forms part.

JOHN BARROW ALLEN.

BOOKS ABOUT WINCHESTER.

The Ancient Ways: Winchester Fifty Years Ago. By the Rev. W. Tuckwell (Macmillans). School Life at Winchester College; or, the Reminiscences of a Junior under the Old Regime, 1835-40. By Robert Blackford Mansfield. Third Edition. (David Nutt.) What may be called the official volume on the quinquenary (?) of Winchester College is not to appear before the autumn, when it will include an account of the festivities which are to take place during next week. Meanwhile, two old Wykehamists of a generation that is passing away have opportunely published the reminiscences of their schooldays. There is very much in common between the two books. The period they cover is separated by the interval of only a few years. Both authors were in College, and say as little as may be about Commoners, whose life was then very distinct from that of the boys on the foundation. Both tell the same story of archaic customs, of inadequate food, of perpetual fagging, and of brutal punishments. But it must be admitted that both also look back upon their juvenile misery without any resentment against individuals. Youth is the period of hope, in more senses than one. Otherwise, it is difficult to conceive how human nature could have survived the physical and moral torture of a "junior in college" fifty or even thirty years ago. The peculiarity of fagging at Winchester, as compared with other places, was that it lasted the whole day through, except when in Chapel or School, and that it might continue until the very day before the "inferior" was made a prefect. The reason for this was, again, two-fold. Partly it was because, out of seventy boys, no less than twenty-five had absolute power over the remainder; and partly because the masters were as far removed from our daily life as the denizens of another sphere. There was, indeed, an annual ceremony called "scrutiny," at which complaints were supposed to be heard; but only once during six years do we remember any appeal being made to the authorities against the grossest tyranny. And yet the masters, almost without exception, had themselves once been "juniors in college." It was one of the exceptions who wrote the lines:

"O, si praeiteritam liceat revocare juventam,

But enough of that aspect of Winchester, which is specially prominent in both the books before us. For there was another side of school-life, less directly suggested. Boys are all born Conservatives, even if some of them grow up to become Radical parsons. And it is scarcely possible for anyone who has enjoyed Wykeham's bounty, imbibed the traditions of full five hundred years, and formed those school friendships which are the most lasting of all, not to merge his sad memories in happier ones. Old Wykehamists possess a world of experiences of their own, which none else can share. The anecdotes and the illustrations in these two books have summoned up in our minds associations which we recognise to have profoundly influenced our own character, for better or worse. The school-boy is father of the man. The hard life at Winchester, like Kingsley's east wind, has produced a set of hard men, who will never be ashamed to speak with the enemy in the gate. If there were common sorrows, there were also common joys—both alike indelible; common amusements and common ambitions. Our whole life was passed in public, which generated a sympathy and good fellowship that always distinguishes Wykehamists from the rest of mankind. Among the thousand and more who will meet together next Tuesday in Chamber Court and Meads, not one but will feel, as he looks round at the familiar faces, that he is the citizen of no mean city. And the elder of them will confidently hope—though many transfiguring changes have been made, and manners have certainly grown milder—that the pristine vigour has not disappeared, and that the sons may justly boast to be better than their fathers: "Spartam nactus es, hanc exorna."

A LITTLE more than two years ago, Mr. C. W. Holgate published a Register of Winchester Commoners, 1836-90: that is to say, from the beginning of Dr. Moberly's headmastership. He has since been engaged in carrying the work further back, in the face of grave difficulties; for it seems that no continuous record of earlier date is in existence. There is, of course, a list of members of the foundation, going back for just five hundred years, which has been printed by Mr. T. F. Kirby, the present bursar. But the Commoners used to be regarded merely as the private boarders of the headmaster; and the official record of entries, if it was ever made, has not been preserved. It happens, however, that Mr. Holgate has been able to obtain a continuous series of what are called Long Rolls from 1730 downwards, besides those for many earlier years. These Long Rolls, which were compiled once a year, contain a list of the entire school, College and Commoners together. From them, therefore, it is possible to extract a tentative Register of Commoners before 1836. But, unfortunately, only surnames are given, with no information about Christian names, parentage, date or place of birth. With such scanty materials, Mr. Holgate has found his self-imposed task to be even more laborious than he had anticipated. How, for example, is one to identify a certain Smith, of whom all that is known is that his name appears one year, and then disappears for ever? In order to obtain assistance from the traditional knowledge of Old Wykehamists, Mr. Holgate has now put into type an alphabetical index of the surnames of Commoners, thus extracted from Long Rolls, for the first thirty-five years of the present century, 1800-35. The total number of names is 1471, of whom less than one half are already identified. On glancing through them, two or three reflections have suggested themselves. Though Winchester has never been an aristocratic school—except perhaps during the eighteenth century—it appears to have had, at the time under notice, a most unusual proportion of baronets. Of the peers mentioned, almost all won their own coronets. Out of four successive Lord Chancellors since 1852, no less than three were Winchester Commoners—Cranworth, Hatherley, and Selborne. In addition to these two last, there are to be found three more of Mr. Gladstone's ministers—Sherbrooke, Cardwell, and Emly; besides the titles of Eversley, Taunton, Penzance, and Basing. We much doubt whether any other school could show, within such a brief period, so many distinguished servants of the State; and it is noteworthy that none of them were on the foundation. One other matter of a very different nature has caught our eye. It has, of course, always been usual for Commoners to pass on into College; but the reverse process is exceedingly rare. The only case within recent memory is that of the late Sir Herbert Stewart, who was thus enabled to play in the eleven for a third year—though, after all, Eton won by one wicket. But in the period under notice, we observe that two Founder's Kin were allowed to enter Commoners together in 1831, when superannuated from College, and were nevertheless elected to New College in the following year. One of these also played for three years in the eleven; and the combined age of the two boys (?) when they left school was no less than forty-eight. Mr. Holgate's Index, which is a well-printed pamphlet of forty-three pages, may be obtained for one shilling from Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.

CLASSICAL SCHOOL BOOKS.

Gaii Suetonii Tranquilli de vita Caesarum libri duo. Edited, with Introduction and Commentary, by H. T. Peck. (New York.) It is, as Prof. Peck says, hard to understand why the Lives of Suetonius have been left so long unedited by English-speaking scholars. Their value is really very great, and their interest is not inferior to their value. They were written not by a Plutarch, a man whose manner is charming, but whose knowledge of Roman affairs is incomplete, but by a trained servant of the state, whose pen had not been spoiled by official work. Suetonius knows a good story when he sees it, and he can tell it well. His ordinary style too is pleasant enough. If we are tempted to despise him because he does not write with the dry accuracy of many modern historians or biographers, let us compare him with his continuators in the Historia Augusta, and half an hour's reading will make us thankful for our Suetonius. Why then is he neglected? Surely not because of the unabashed nature of some of his matter? Passages which offend are easily excised altogether, or (as Prof. Peck has treated them, like certain editors known to Byron) they may be omitted from the text and all put at the end of the book. Prof. Peck has now done his best to give Suetonius a fair start. He has only edited two Lives, those of the dictator Caesar and of Octavianus; but he has done enough to make those two more accessible and easy than they have been heretofore. His introduction warns the reader what to expect, for good or for evil. Suetonius, he says, "is a gatherer of facts; he is not a literary artist; and in the gathering of his facts he has followed the other fashion of his time—the tendency to realism." A short account follows of the Latinity of the author; then comes the text (chiefly Roth's) and the commentary. The notes are slight and few; but so far as they go, they are helpful and interesting. A family-tree of the first Caesars would be a very useful addition. The attraction in gender of de tracta (Jul. c. 56, a passage quoted from Cicero) deserves a note. On Jul. c. 2, the words Mamercum Aemilium are described, we know not why, as an inversion of a proper name. The idiom gratiam facere with the genitive is translated correctly in Oct. 38, incorrectly on Oct. 17; it must mean "to excuse from" in both places. The Velabrum was not a street on the Aventine (p. 137); and in Oct. 98 non alio surely goes with absumpturos, not with datam. But these are small points and easily corrected. Prof. Peck has apparently not intended to make more than a school book, but he has made a useful and fairly successful one.

Latin Verse Composition, for the use of Middle and Upper Forms of Schools. By the Rev. F. D. Morice. (Rivington, Percival & Co.) Mr Morice tells us (Pref. p. iii.) that this book has practically "made itself"; that is, it is the now published machinery of many years' teaching of Latin verses, and is intended to save other teachers time and labour. It consists of twenty-four pages of "Introductory Hints," and then a hundred passages, for hexameters and pentameters, to which notes and hints are appended, plentifully to the earlier ones, rather more sparingly as we proceed. So far as we can judge, the selector has rather desired to give pieces which need expansion if they are to go into an equal number of Latin lines; and the "Introductory Hints" explain with a good deal of skill how this can be done: e.g., on p. 15 we are shown how "not single words only, but whole phrases can be spun out by expansion," and again (p. 16), "let us expand the phrase. . . i.e., practically say it over again with a difference," &c. It is, we think, open to doubt whether a boy's time, or a master's, is really well spent in conscious tricks of this sort. So long as Latin verse was enforced on everybody, it was inevitable that this sort of mechanism should be used. To our mind, clever boys with a turn for poetry should read a good deal of Latin poetry before they write any, and, when they begin writing, should have fairly full English. It is a misfortune that the weakest tricks of Latin poetry, such as its instinct for vain repetitions, should be the easiest to teach, and so come to be thought its most characteristic features. Still, if we must do the wrong thing, Mr. Morice shows with great skill and taste how to do it least offensively: and the notes and hints appended to the passages are helpful in just the right way.

Ediscenda. Passages for Repetition, arranged for the Classical Forms in Public Schools. By Joseph Wood, D.D. (Rivington, Percival &

Co.). The head master of Tonbridge is one of the rare and valuable persons who still believe in learning by heart, but with discretion. "With no continuity and no reasonable method of selection" (Pref. p. v.), the time spent by boys over their repetition is wasted. Dr. Wood has mapped out his selections into eight compartments: the first three are for Lower, or Fourth, Forms, and consist of extracts from Ovid's best elegiac poems, and Horace's easier Odes. Parts IV., V., VI. are for Fifth Forms, and comprise Horace's finest Odes, passages as complete as possible from Cicero, Tacitus, Terence, Livy, Euripides, Propertius, and—bountifully—Vergil. Lastly, in Parts VII., VIII., intended for a Lower and an Upper Sixth, we have ten fine passages from the Ajax, two from the Philoctetes, more than twenty from Livy IV. and V., and fifteen from Thucydides, three from Herodotus, one long one from the Gorgias of Plato, and one from Demosthenes. It is a very good compilation. We incline to doubt the wisdom of using Herodotus for repetition, and should have liked to see more Demosthenes, and perhaps a diminution of Thucydides in favour of Plato. The Ajax is excellent for repetition; and the Ovidian passages are, as good as Ovid makes: we are particularly glad to see that on pages 17-19. On page 11, line 97, there is a strange misprint, "nateve." It is a good thing to have a school book, particularly one for learning by heart, so clearly printed and in comparatively large type.

NOTES AND NEWS.

A MEMOIR of the late Duke of Clarence and Avondale has been written, with the sanction of the Prince of Wales, by Mr. James Edmund Vincent. It will be published shortly by Mr. John Murray, with portraits and illustrations by Mr. William Simpson and others.

MR. JOHN MURRAY will also be the publisher of the Earl of Dunmore's narrative of his expedition through Kashmir, Western Tibet, Chinese Tartary, and Russian Central Asia. The book will be entitled The Pamirs. It will be in two volumes, with numerous maps and illustrations.

MESSRS. LONGMANS announce a new edition, in three volumes, of the Poems of Owen Meredith (the late Earl of Lytton). The first volume, to be published in September, will be The Wanderer, reprinted from the original edition of 1858, thus disregarding the considerable omissions and alterations made subsequently by the author. This will be followed by Lucile in November, and by a volume of selections in January.

THE same publishers will issue, immediately, A Short History of Ireland, from the earliest times to 1608, by Dr. P. W. Joyce, author of "Irish Names of Places," &c., illustrated with a map. This is to be followed hereafter by another volume, carrying the narrative down to the present day.

MR. CHARLES WELCH, librarian at the Guildhall, has in the press a volume entitled Modern History of the City of London: a pictorial and descriptive record of municipal and social progress during the last one hundred and fifty years. The aim of the author is to give a chronological history, classified under different headings, of the City and its Liberties, from the accession of George III. to the present time, illustrated by views of London as it now exists side by side with the London of Dr. Johnson's day. Among the subjects specially treated will be—the material transformation of the city, by the erection of new buildings, the opening of new roads, bridges, &c.; the principal proceedings of the corporation; and political and social changes. The illustrations, many of which are full-page, have been produced under the personal supervision of Mr. Philip Norman. The publishers will be Messrs. Blades, East & Blades, of Abchurch-lane, who invite subscriptions for a limited number of large-paper copies.

MR. BELFORD BAX is at work upon a history of the social side of the Reformation in Germany. The work will be in three volumes: the first dealing with the general conditions of the period and with the earlier symptoms of social upheaval, the second with the great Peasant Rising of 1525, and the third with the rise and progress of the Anabaptists down to their final defeat at Münster in 1534. Each volume will have an independent interest, and the first will be published early in October. The work is, so far as we are aware, the first comprehensive sketch of this side of the Reformation history in English.

MESSRS. RICHARD BENTLEY & SON have in the press a new book, by Mr. E. Harrison Barker, author of Wanderings by Southern Waters, mainly devoted to Périgord, a part of old Aquitaine intimately associated with the English and French wars of the Middle Ages.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN announces for publication next week, as the new volume of his "International Library," The Jew, by J. Ignatius Kraszewski, who is perhaps best known in this country on account of his defiance of Prince Bismarck in 1881, his subsequent prosecution and imprisonment on a charge of high treason. He died in Geneva, broken in health and spirits, shortly after his release.

MR. HEINEMANN will also issue immediately new editions of first books by two authors who have since been much talked about. These are Mr. Zangwill's The Premier and the Painter, and Sarah Grand's Idealu.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co. will have ready in a few days the first volume of the cheap reissue of Mr. Blackmore's novels, uniform with the popular editions of Mr. Black's and Mr. Hardy's novels. A start will be made with Lorna Doone, containing a photograph portrait of the author, specially prepared for this edition. Mr. Clark Russell's sea stories and some of Dr. George MacDonald's novels will shortly be issued in similar style.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN has arranged to publish the English edition of the Memoirs of A. Bronson Alcott, edited by Messrs. F. B. Sanborn and W. T. Harris.

THE Rev. W. J. Stavert, rector of Burnsall-in-Craven—who has already printed, in a very limited edition, the registers of his own parish—now proposes to edit, if he find a sufficient number of subscribers, the registers of the neighbouring parish of Skipton, which go back to 1592. The book will be printed at the Clarendon Press, and published by Mr. B. H. Blackwell, of Oxford.

MESSRS. REMINGTON & Co. will issue, on Monday next, a new novel by Mr. Frederick Wicks, called The Broadmoor Patient and the Poor Clerk, with illustrations by Mr. A. Morrow; and also a collection of Seven Stories, by Helene Gringold, author of "Denyse Steyneville" and other novels.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces for early publication Ermenegarde: a Story of Romney Marsh in the Thirteenth Century, by Alice Parkes, with illustrations by the author.

MESSRS. DUNLOP & DRENNAN, of Kilmarnock, have in the press a volume by Mr. John Macintosh, entitled Ayrshire Nights' Entertainments: a popular work on the history and antiquities of the county of Ayr.

THE publication, by Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co., of Mrs. Bloomfield-Moore's work, entitled Kelly and his Discoveries: Aerial Navigation, has been postponed until October.

MR. JULIAN RALPH, of the New York Sun, will contribute to the August number of Scribner's Magazine an account of the everyday life of a newspaper correspondent, being the fourth article in the series on "Men's Occupations." The same issue, which is the summer fiction number, will also contain complete short stories by Mr. T. B. Aldrich, Mr. H. C. Bunner, Mr. Howard Pyle, Mr. W. H. Shelton, Miss Sarah O. Jewett, and Miss Grace E. Channing.

IN consequence of the great interest shown in the Shelley Exhibition at the Guildhall Library, it has been decided to keep it open until Saturday next, July 29. Admission is free, from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

MR. W. T. STEAD has issued, from the office of the Review of Reviews, the third annual Index to the Periodical Literature of the World, for the year 1892. The index proper fills more than one hundred pages, and covers about 150 periodicals. The headings seem to be chosen with intelligence, and there are abundant cross-references. For ourselves, we confess that we would gladly let periodical literature die within the year that gave it birth, trusting to learned societies to preserve anything that may happen to be of permanent value. And it is certainly worthy of note that the magazines pay so little attention to their own indexes, which are usually nothing more than tables of contents.

MR. ALEXANDER GRAHAM, of the Stranraer Academy, has published (Glasgow: Sime) a little pamphlet entitled Horae Otiosi Otiosae, which consists of nursery rhymes rendered into Latin. They are more remarkable for correctness than for wit. Here is an average specimen:

"Cornutus Johanniculus
In angulo sedebat,
Crustula Natalia edens;
Pollicem inserebat,
Prunum dein extrahabat,
Quam bonus sum puellus, dicens!"

WE must not permit the death of Emeritus-Professor E. L. Lushington to pass altogether without record. It was his distinction to have been senior classic at Cambridge in 1832, above the heads of Shilleto and Thompson; and to have been elected to the chair of Greek at Glasgow in 1838, when Robert Lowe was a competitor. He was also brother-in-law to Lord Tennyson, some of whose lyrics he turned into admirable Greek and Latin verse. He died at Maidstone, on July 13, in his eighty-third year.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE contents of the Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia for June deal chiefly with American and Basque subjects. In an article on the writings of Columbus, Antonio Maria Fabié has a lively polemic against Mr. Harriase, whom he charges, among other defects, with inability to read Spanish of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Don Juan Riano, following W. Meyer, reports on Sarmiento's "Historia del Reino de los Incas," a MS. in the library of Göttingen. Fernandez Duro speaks favourably of F. Serrato's "Cristobal Colon," as a popular work. Father Fita prints for the first time the patent granted by Juana and Charles V. in 1518 for the Mayorazgo of Loyola, and the title deed of the same (1536). These papers are of interest for Basque toponymy and language; for the light they throw on the customs of the age, on the sentiments of the Spanish nobility, and on the conditions of entail. The same writer has an able review of Prof J. Rhys' "Inscriptions and Language of the Northern Picts," and pays a just tribute to the Clarendon Press for undertaking the publication of Lord Maclellan's Basque MSS.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

"MANY WATERS CANNOT QUENCH LOVE."
(Solomon's Song, viii. 7.)

COULD I only be certain that there in Heaven,
When before the Judge we stand face to face,
That He would pardon what I have forgiven,
And set you there in the highest place:
The place that surely was meant for you,
Ere ever my faith in all good you slew.

Yet after all it may well be a fable (Since you could deceive me can any truth be?);
But if there be God, or a power that is able
To cleanse us from sin, I shall turn unto thee:
Before the throne I shall take your hand,
Should there be any truth in that Better Land.

"Lord," I shall say, "in the Kingdom of Heaven Alone Thou art Judge; and can this thing be
That He who saith to us 'till seventy times seven,'
Should prove more vengeful than dust like me?
I gave him faith, and that faith he slew;
I gave him love, and that love it is true.

"He is standing by me in this terrible hour,
And the Book lies open for all to see,
If Thou art Almighty, if Thou hast the power,
From out of the Book let his sin blotted be:
Did him join the souls that are clothed in white,
Did him pass from the darkness into the light.

"By the might of that love which must last for ever,

In the name of that love I am pleading now.
Lord! blot out his sin from Thy sight, and never Let it be remembered again; Lord, how
Is it possible Thou shouldst deny this grace, Sitting enthroned in the judgment place?"

And yet, after all, there may be no Heaven,
How can I believe, since your truth could fail?
But always remember that I have forgiven,
To kill my love there can nought avail.
Could we but go back to the days ere you
Had slain my faith in all things that were true.

THE TODD MEMORIAL LECTURES.

III.

From such inaccurate transcriptions and unlucky guesswork it is a relief to turn to the next book on our list, Father Hogan's edition of The Battle of Rosnaree. This story belongs to the Cúchulainn cycle, and tells how King Conchobar and his Ulster chiefs, in a great battle fought against King Cairpre and his Leinstermen at Rosnaree on the southern bank of the Boyne, avenged the invasion of Ulster and the loss of the bull of Cuailnge. In this battle the Ulstermen were helped by certain Norse allies, just as, according to Malory, the Romans when fighting Arthur were assisted by the Saracens. The tale is given in two recensions, one from the Book of Leinster, a vellum of the twelfth century, the other from one of the Stowe MSS., now in the library of the Royal Irish Academy, written on paper in 1727. "The Saga," says Father Hogan, "such as we have it in the earliest and latest version, is non-Christian and pre-Christian in texture and tone. But, from a linguistic standpoint, the Book of Leinster text is Middle-Irish, as is shown by the total absence of the neuter article, except in the word an-i. There are also post-Danish interpolations of Norse names, such as Olaf [Ámlaib], Sigurd [Siugraid], Sciggire, lochland, &c., which must have been inserted after the Irish had become acquainted, if not with the persons, at least with the names of some sea-rovers of the North." Like all these Irish tales, the Battle of Rosnaree abounds in romantic incidents, such as the shuddering of the Three Waves of Ireland at the approach of disastrous battle (p. 22); the roaring of King Conchobar's shield at the first repulse of his army (p. 42); and the effect of the sound of Connall Cernach's sword (p. 46). Noticeable, too, is the fine simile in p. 42, an army whose young troops were killed while the veterans stood firm, being likened to a forest whose saplings and shoots were cut off while the sturdy oaks remained. Old Irish manners and customs are illustrated by the account of the eulogists (aes admolta) brought with the invading army (p. 4) "that the destructions might be the more conspicuous and the devastations might be the greater"; by the treatment of the banqueters "when ale became mightier than men" (p. 20); the inventory of the herald's raiment (p. 68); the use of the breadth of a face as a measure for gold pp. 24, 26; the duel between Cúchulainn and Cairpre Níaffer (p. 52), when the former cuts off Cairpre's head and brandishes it before the armies. Most interesting of all is the description of the Ulaid before battle (p. 32), bathing and combing their hair smooth. Whom will not this remind of the Spartans before Thermopylae (Herod. vii. 208, 209): τὰς κόμας κτενίζομένους, and Dēmarētōs' explanation to Xerxes: ἐπεὶ μέλλας κινδυνεύειν τῇ ψυχῇ, τότε τὰς κεφαλὰς σμύονται?

I have already hinted approval of the way in which Father Hogan has done his difficult work. In three respects he differs from all the native scholars who have published ancient Irish texts: he is accurate, using roman type and italics, without which accuracy in such publications is unattainable; he is honest, frankly confessing doubt or ignorance; and, lastly, he is modest—sitting at the feet of Zeuss, Ebel, Windisch, Ascoli, Nigra, Thurneysen, Zimmer, and d'Arbois de Jubainville, without whose labours Celtic philology would have remained what Vivien calls "the jumbled rubbish of a dream." I have not been able to collate his edition of the Stowe version of the Battle of Rosnaree; but his text of the Book of Leinster recension is almost faultless. It needs, however, three or four corrections. Thus in p. 18, l. 1, for cammair read cach main, and translate: "thou wilt prefer that to every treasure." In the same page, l. 11, roccastar is written phonetically for ro-scethestar "he vomited." In p. 20, l. 8, bude-chaiti should, I think, be budech-aiti "thankful (and) glad," the nom. pl. of a compound of budech and aiti. In p. 38, l. 20, insert tiberther in after dūn, and then translate: "What is your advice to us? Shall this battle be delivered by us?" A few marks of length have also been omitted, and the clauses in which the expletive ale occurs are wrongly punctuated.

Besides his texts and translations, Father Hogan gives us copious indices verborum, a collection of the nouns which have been ascertained to be neuter in Old-Irish, and a supplement to Güterbock and Thurneysen's useful, but incomplete, index to the Irish part of the Grammatica Celtica. For these additions every Celtic student will be grateful. In his list of neuter s-stems we may insert dere "berry," farr "pillar," and meig "milk"; and with ond "a stone" we may connect the Latin pondera, which in Horace, Epist. i. 6. 51 means, according to Acron and Mommsen, "lapides qui porrigitur per vias," the stepping-stones across a road, such as one still sees in Pompeii.

WHITLEY STOKES.

Corrigendum.—In the ACADEMY for July 15, 1893, No. 1106, p. 53, col. 2, ll. 48, 49, for "brilliant Etan knows that she," read "I know that brilliant Etan"; and p. 53, col. 3, l. 48, for pois read pad.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TRUE SEPTUAGINT VERSION OF CHRONICLES-EZRA-NEHEMIAH.

The Athenaeum Club.

I should like to supplement my arguments, in favour of the First Book of Esdras representing the Septuagint version of the canonical Book of Ezra, by some facts drawn from another field—namely, the difficult one of the Syriac versions.

The oldest Syriac version, the Peshita, is universally admitted to have been a direct translation—and a very good one—from the Hebrew. It is a pity that there should be such difficulty in recovering its original text, unsophisticated by later emendations from other sources. The contents of the original Peshita, we may, however, confidently say, were the same as those embodied in the so-called Palestinian Canon. This we can gather from the extracts preserved by Aphraates, which include portions of all the Books of that canon except the Song of Songs. If our contention be right—that the Palestinian Canon was settled at Jamnia, and that the Hebrew text preserved by the Masorets was that edited by Akiba and his scholars—it proves conclusively that the Peshita version is not earlier than the second century A.D., for it follows that text in its variants and in its mistakes. It has sometimes been said that the original Peshita did not contain the Books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, and Buhl supports this contention; but I do not see how it can be maintained, in view of the fact that Aphraates quotes freely from all three Books. Dr. Gwynne writes to me that the earliest and best MS. of the Peshita contains both the canonical Ezra and Nehemiah.

Let us now turn to another Syriac version—namely, that published at the beginning of the seventh century by Paul of Tella, which was made avowedly from the Hexaplar edition of the Septuagint. Dr. Gwynne has called my attention to the fact that portions of this version are preserved in the British Museum MS. 12,168, which is a catena of extracts from different books of the Old Testament, distinctly stated to be drawn from Paul of Tella's version.

It is a very remarkable and important fact, which I also owe to the courtesy of Dr. Gwynne, that among these extracts is one stated to be taken from the edition of the Seventy, and professing to represent the Hexaplar edition of the Septuagint version of the Book of Ezra. This extract proves to represent not the canonical Book of Ezra, but the Apocryphal First Esdras, and it contains a portion of the paragraph about Darius and the Three Young Men, &c. This seems to me to be a very strong, if not conclusive, proof—and it is quite an independent one—that the First of Esdras represents the Septuagint version of the canonical Ezra. Dr. Gwynne writes to me that he is convinced from these facts that in Origen's Hexapla our Ezra was replaced by Esdras I.

I should now like to turn to another question, about which my conclusion is not so definite, but which I think deserves some inquiry—namely, as to the true Septuagint text of Chronicles. A portion of it is preserved, as I have contended, in the First of Esdras. It may be that the whole of it is preserved elsewhere. It is at all events very remarkable that in one Syriac version the text of Chronicles should vary so much from the received text that Fraenkel, who has subjected it to a minute examination, affirms it to have been made, not from the received text at all, but from a Jewish Targum of the third century which originated with the Jews of Edessa. The existence of a Targum of this early date on a Book like Chronicles seems to me to be highly improbable, and there is no independent evidence of it. It would seem to me much more reasonable that this supposed Targum was really the Septuagint version, which, as in other cases, probably differed notably from the received Hebrew text. In view of this possibility, it would be very interesting to compare the contents and language of this Syriac translation of Chronicles (1) with the extracts from Aphraates; (2) with the portion of Chronicles preserved in the Syriac version of the First Book of Esdras, the former of which probably represents the Peshita and the latter the Septuagint text. This comparison I am not capable of making, but it seems to me it would be distinctly of great advantage.

In conclusion, I would draw attention to another point which is curious. It is well known that, among the most conservative of the Syrian Christians, namely, the Nestorians, the Books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah are excluded from the Canon. This is also the case with one section of the Jacobites.

So far as I can see, this is distinctly traceable to the fact that Theodore of Mopsuetia—who was the real founder of the theological position of the Nestorians, and is always referred to by them in terms of hyperbolic praise—excluded these books among others from the Canon. This is expressly stated by Leontius of Byzantium.

Why he did so is a puzzle. Theodore apparently had before him a Syriac version of the Septuagint, and his citations are from the Septuagint. Is it possible that, having noticed a great variation between the Peshita version of these Books and the Septuagint, and not being able to reconcile it with any theory, he excluded them as uncanonical? I cannot suggest any better reason.

I have now exhausted the materials which seem at present available for recovering the true Septuagint text of the Books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah. This is not preserved in the early Greek codices, as has been so often taken for granted, except in so far as they preserve for us the First Book of Esdras. Otherwise the texts they contain are probably those due either to Theodotion or Symmachus, and reflect the Hebrew and not the early Greek tradition. Apart from this, the direct object of my letters, my conclusions, if sustained, seem to me to throw light on a much more important matter, and one which has given occasion for much heartburning, namely, whether the Hebrew text as we have it ought to retain the dominant position which it has so long held, at all events in Protestant theological writings, or to give place to the Septuagint as a much sounder, more accurate, and more reliable guide both to the order and the contents of the sacred narrative. This issue, however, I must postpone to another letter.

MS. C. C. C. CAMBRIDGE, NO. 183.

C. C. C. OXON: July 12, 1893.

In a charter, No. 1125 in Kemble (C. D. v. 247), No. 685 in Birch (Cart. Sax. ii. 374), also in Simeon of Durham (Rolls Ed.) i. 211, which records various gifts of Æthelstan to St. Cuthbert (i.e., to the Church of Durham), there occurs this entry: "unam sancti Cuthberti uitam metricè et prosaice scriptam." There can be little doubt, I think, that this is the MS. No. 183 in Nasmyth's Catalogue of the MSS. of C. C. C. Cambridge, a beautiful tenth century MS. containing Bede's prose and metrical Lives of St. Cuthbert, some liturgical matter connected with the same Saint, and lists of Popes and English bishops.

The identity is made practically certain by the beautiful frontispiece of the MS., which represents a king making an offering to a priest at the shrine of St. Cuthbert. This frontispiece has been overlooked by many of those who have examined the MS. The connexion of the MS. with Durham is further illustrated by the occurrence (on the fly-leaf at the end) of a short Saxon Charter of Walcher, the Bishop of Durham whose murder "at a moot," is recorded in the Saxon Chronicle at the year 1080. The fact that Wulfhelm is the last Archbishop of Canterbury entered in the original hand agrees very well with the ascription of the MS. to the reign of Æthelstan. Æthelstan may have made the offering on his expedition to Scotland in 934, or in gratitude for his success in it (cp. the story of his offerings to Beverley on the same occasion, Historians of the Church of York, i. 263-4, 294-8). The charter in question is marked by Kemble as spurious; but this need mean no more than that the charter is obviously not preserved in its original form (there are, for instance, no names of witnesses). But that it records a genuine gift of Æthelstan's, the existence of this MS. makes more than probable. The MS. was examined on the occasion of the meeting of the Royal Archaeological Institute, held at Cambridge last autumn, and several interesting questions of archaeology are connected with it. Those who are competent to discuss these questions may be glad of the light thrown upon the history of the MS. by this identification.

CHARLES PLUMMER.

"THE KEY TO THE FAMILY DEED CHEST."

London: July 15, 1893.

"Of making of books there is no end"; but there are ways and ways of making them. Mr. E. E. Thoyta, who has just published a little work under the above title, and who by his own admission is signalling a very recent study of the Public Records by printing a book on a subject which takes most men many years to begin to understand, has singular ideas of the laws of meum et tuum.

In Records and Record Searching (1888) I printed at pp. 142-3-4 an analysis of the various forms of feet of fines, which had been compiled with considerable trouble after a long study of this class of documents, and which the late Mr. Walford Selby thought worth his reprinting with my consent. At pp. 54 and 55 of Mr. Thoyta's book this is transferred verbatim, even to the footnotes, without any acknowledgment, as though it were original matter.

In exchange for this transfer I must say I have derived much genuine amusement from a perusal of some of the statements in this Comic Guide to the Records—e.g., Mr. Thoyta calls a fine "a deed," and says it "warrants the land to the purchaser for life"; and, on p. 57, gives a description "in a nutshell" of "Sale by Recovery," which is really too delightful, and must be quoted:

"One man desired to sell certain land which another man was anxious to purchase, whereupon the would-be purchaser issued a writ, in which he pretended to claim the land; at this stage of the affair a third party, not really concerned in any way in it, was brought forward to warrant the title of the real owner, who then came forward bringing a witness proving ownership to his property; thus an indisputable title to the land was established. A deed (sic) of recovery was then issued rehearsing the whole transaction, agreeing that a certain sum of money, equivalent to the value of the land, should be paid by the purchaser; and here the bargain was concluded, and the curtain fell on the legal farce" (!)

A cursory glance through the book reveals several new things—e.g., that wills (probates no doubt being intended) are written on square pieces of parchment (p. 53); that no mortgage deeds are old (p. 62); that "key-holdings" were made by the consent of the lord; that manorial courts were held but once during the year (p. 75); that St. Veronica of Milan was an English saint (p. 81); and that a churchwarden once elected goes on from year to year until sickness, old age, or death stops him (p. 111), and so on, and so on. All this is very interesting and novel, but hardly worth the five shillings charged for 143 small octavo pages.

WALTER RYE.

THE FAIRY FOLK.

Edinburgh: July 8, 1893.

As the latest volume of the Bibliothèque de Carabas, just issued, contains a "Comment," by Mr. Andrew Lang, on "The Secret Commonwealth of Elves, Fauns, and Fairies," in the course of which he refers specially to certain views advocated by me, I may perhaps be allowed to make a few remarks in the ACADEMY, in answer to the objections urged by him.

The creed to which Mr. Lang, on the whole, takes exception, has been very concisely formulated by Mr. Charles H. Chambers, who, writing to the Anthropological Review for February 1864, on the subject of the Danish "kitchen middens," observes:—

"I believe the race which inhabited the northern shores of Europe to have been akin to the Laps, Fins, and Esquimaux, and the Picts or Pechts of Scotland, and to have given rise to many of the dwarf, troll, and fairy stories extant among the Sagas and elsewhere." Mr. Chambers adds, "The subject is one which, however, is still much in the realms of opinion."

The subject still remains in these "realms," although the views just expressed are, it seems to me, more and more likely to find favour among those who bring an unbiassed mind to bear upon the question.

Mr. Lang remarks:—

"There is much in Mr. MacRitchie's theory [the theory of Chambers, Nilsson, and others, considerably developed] which does not commend itself to me. The modern legends of Pechts as builders of Glasgow Cathedral, for example, do not appear to prove such a late survival [the date is the twelfth century] of a race known as Picts. . . . The truth is that the recent Scotch have entirely forgotten the ages of mediæval art. Accustomed to the ill-built barns of a robbed and stunted Kirk, they looked on the Cathedral as no work of ordinary human beings."

That a belief bearing reference to the Picts should have sprung into existence after the Reformation seems to me unlikely, on the face of it. But, as a matter of fact, the popular ideas regarding the Picts, although not in relation to Glasgow Cathedral, were placed on record, in the year 1443, by a pre-Reformation Catholic—a bishop, no less. Writing in that year, the Bishop of Orkney states (De Orkadibus Insulis, Bannatyne Miscellany, 1855, p. 33) that the Picts

"were not much bigger than pigmies in stature, and worked wonderfully in the construction of their cities, evening and morning; but, during mid-day, being quite destitute of strength, they hid themselves through fear in little houses underground."

In the first half of the fifteenth century, therefore, the popular notion of the Picts had long been current; for the Bishop is not speaking of contemporaries, but of the race as it existed when the Norsemen entered Orkney. He does not say that the Picts were ultimately employed as masons in the service of their conquerors; but, unquestionably, the builders of the "Picts' houses" of Orkney offered the raw material for an excellent mason-caste, working under the supervision of more civilised masters. As for the supposition that the builders of those mediæval cathedrals must have been regarded in later times as no "ordinary human beings," that certainly does not receive support from the tradition that the "Pechts" who are said to have built the Round Tower of Brechin "were only allowed a trifle for this work, and were cheated out of part of this trifle"; nor even in the statement that oatmeal "was a penny the peck when they [the Picts] built the Hie Kirk of Glasgow." Both of these references, moreover, bear inherent evidence that they date from the building of the respective structures.

"I cannot believe," says Mr. Lang, "that the historical Picts were a set of half-naked, dwarfish savages, hairy men living underground." Yet Gildas, writing in the sixth century, speaks of the "tetri Scotorum Pictorumque greges, moribus ex parte dissidentes, sed una eademque sanguinis fundendi aviditate concordēs, furemque magis vultus pilis, quam corporum pudenda, pudendis proxima, vestibus tegentes."

And when the poet Claudian (whom I quote from Skene; Celt. Scat., I. 106) says that the soldiers of the legion which defended civilised Britain from the savage hordes of Saxons and Scots, saw "on the body of the dying Pict the figures punctured with iron," he leaves one to infer that "the historical Picts were a set of [at least] half-naked savages." Of the dwarfish stature I have no historical reference: that is, on the side of the Romans. But, as for the underground dwellings, many of them still remain; and the evidence appears to me in favour of their having been built by and occupied by the Picts. No doubt such structures were also built and occupied by other divisions of what I believe to be the same stock; but I confess I do not see why one should exclude the Picts.

In this connection Mr. Lang points to the Greek belief that "Mycenae and Tiryns of the mighty walls were creations of the Cyclopes," as a reason for assuming that the builders of Glasgow Cathedral were, like the Cyclopes, a mythical race. For, if I am not in error, Mr. Lang understands the Cyclopes to be purely mythical. But this is not the universal opinion. I find, for example, in a paper by Mr. G. L. Gomme, "On The Evidence of Mr. McLennan's Theory of the Primitive Human Horde" (Journal of the Anthropological Institute, November 1887, pp. 128, 129), more than one statement representing the Cyclopes as a race of very primitive type, as the Picts appear to me to have been. In quite a different sense from Mr. Lang, I recognise the Picts as "on a level" with the Cyclopes; and those writers who confine themselves to a consideration of the architecture of the former people, almost invariably point to that of the Cyclopes as belonging to the same order. In questions of this kind, one has to keep in view the possibility of a former connexion between races which latterly were far apart. If the Picts were not in or near Scotland in (say) the year 500 B.C., or in 1500 or 2000 B.C., they were in some other part of the globe, under some other name. In fact, during a period of 3000 years one general stock may appear under a score of names, in various localities.

Another objection of Mr. Lang's relates to my mention of the visit of Fin (the "Fin" of Gaelic tradition) to a country whose inhabitants were so much taller than himself that in their eyes he was a mere dwarf. In stating this, I certainly insinuate that the story helps to substantiate my belief that he and his people were of dwarfish stature. But as certainly I do not regard it as "proof."

It is an ungracious thing to drag into a discussion of this kind Mr. Lang's exquisite poem in memory of the Fairy Minister. But the apostrophe to the "people of peace" is based upon a mistranslation of the original Gaelic term, which, says Skene, "has been absurdly rendered the peace folk, instead of the folk of the hills, referring to their reputed residence in earthen mounds." "Peevish, discontented, and apt to do mischief on slight provocation," "feared on account of their capricious, vindictive, and irritable disposition,"—these are the attributes which, according to Scott, tradition assigns to "the people of peace." Mr. Lang does not, I think, fully realise that, when he refers to "the yowl of the Banshie," and when Scott speaks of "the fatal Ben-Shie's boding scream," both poets are leaving untranslated the very word denoting "the ladies of the fairy clan." There is no good reason for leaving the word untranslated, when the ban-shee is regarded in her character of a caointeach, and then translating it when she is viewed in other aspects. A leannan-shee, or fairy sweetheart, is equally a ban-shee. In one Gaelic tale a ban-shee is a washerwoman; in another a ban-shee bites off the ear of her ravisher, who thus earns the nick-name "docked-of-an-ear," for the rest of his life. In another (although it and the preceding instance are more truly historical than traditional), a ban-shee instructs her husband as to the special burying-ground in which he, she, and their descendants are to be buried. For there are numerous references to "fairies" dying and being buried like other people. They entertain friends in their earthen mound-dwellings, but they are also pictured as emerging therefrom and pointing out this and that grave-mound wherein their friends are buried. One of those mound-dwellings is thus referred to: Two men in the island of St. Kilda, at some unascertained date, "on passing a hillock heard churning going on within. And about thirty years ago [i.e., about 1837], when digging into the hillock to make the foundations of a new house, they discovered what seemed to be the fairies' residence, built of stones inside, and holes in the wall, or croops (sleeping places), as they call them, as in" another similar dwelling in the same island. This is no isolated instance. In the face of such a fact, it seems to me that a theorist regarding the hillock from the mythological point of view must find himself quite désorienté. The fairies being myths, or ancestors of the hillock ought to have been solid earth, or rock, or at most a sepulchral mound. Yet it really was a dwelling.

At the same time I do not mean to say that tradition is necessarily infallible in this or any respect. The well-known tendency to apply an inherited story, originating in another district or country, to the locality in which the immigrants have settled, is a feature not to be overlooked; and, indeed, I know of one or two reputed "fairy knowes" which, on examination, proved to be solid earth. But if the belief had not its basis in actual fact, such an instance as that just cited is inconceivable. To what extent tradition is reliable, in this respect, could only be ascertained by the laborious and (for any single individual) costly process of excavating every mound alleged to be "hollow."

But, in thus pointing out the leading reasons for accepting the euhemeristic theory in preference to any other, I do not pretend that the mere acceptance of it will explain away every statement existing in traditional lore with reference to this subject. Only, it is my opinion that one who takes this view finds himself sailing in less stormy waters than he who starts with the assumption that dwarfs and fairies are mere creatures of the imagination.

DAVID MACRITCHIE.

MR. HALIBURTON'S DWARFS.

Athenæum Club: July 16, 1893.

I happen only to have just seen the ACADEMY of July 8, with the letter by Mr. Haliburton on the "Holy Land of Punt," in which he refers to his paper in the Asiatic Quarterly on "Racial Dwarfs in the Atlas and the Pyrenees."

But the result of my correspondence, when lately in the South of France, with all the British Consuls and French savants likely to be specially acquainted with the ethnology of the Pyrenees, so completely negated Mr. Haliburton's assertions, that I did not think it worth while to undertake the journey which I had proposed in order to see for myself these dwarfs of Mr. Haliburton's. And surely, before the reiteration of his assertions on this subject, Mr. Haliburton ought himself, if not to have explored the Pyrenees, at least to have entered into communication with the French savants to whom I have alluded, and particularly with M. Cartailhac, director of L'Anthropologie, who resides at Toulouse, within half a day's journey of the Pyrenean valleys in which Mr. Haliburton locates his dwarfs.

No less interesting than the discovery of dwarfs in the Pyrenees would be the discovery of dwarfs in the Atlas. But one cannot but fear that any attempt seriously to verify Mr. Haliburton's assertions about the Atlas, which he has never, I believe, even approached, and particularly about the Holy Land of the Egyptians "at the head of the Dra Valley, with its most convenient access to the sea at Massa, opposite the Canary Islands," may have such a result as had my attempt to verify his assertions about the Pyrenees. "Racial Dwarfs?" "No!" But "certains goitreux de petite taille, sans doute."

SCIENCE.

RECENT WORKS OF PHYSICAL SCIENCE.

A Treatise on Physical Optics. By A. B. Basset. (Cambridge: Deighton Bell & Co.) We have delayed reviewing this work because, although we felt on first examining it grave doubts as to its efficiency as a text-book, we determined only to express our judgment upon it after actually using it with an advanced student studying optics. Our conclusion after the experiment is, we regret to say, very unfavourable to Mr. Basset's volume. We suspect that the author has never been a teacher, or that at any rate he has never had to put the essential parts of physical optics in a clear and concise manner to pupils. When a man has lectured for years on a particular branch of science, besides experimenting and researching; then, perhaps, he can sit down and write a text-book with profit to the learner and himself. He knows the difficulties which will almost invariably arise: he knows the points which need breadth of treatment, and where minute accuracy of description and detail are essential. The teacher who proposes to use Mr. Basset's volume, will find his task no easy one: he will be called upon for explanations at every turn, he will be compelled to correct endless misprints, and in many cases he will have to supply details of description which the author has entirely omitted. From personal experience, we can vouch for having spent hours endeavouring to follow the text, and for finally being compelled to rewrite the proofs for ourselves. In many cases the student will find a subject far more clearly put in the original memoirs than in Mr. Basset's pages. Take the case of the theory of coloured rings produced when polarised light is obliquely transmitted through a plate of quartz. Mr. Basset gives Airy's theory, who at any rate gives grounds for his assumptions. Verdet, in his Leçons d'Optique, boils down Airy's theory; and when it ultimately reaches the student, boiled down from Verdet by Mr. Basset, there is no alternative but to send the student back to the pages of Airy to interpret Basset-Verdet. Mr. Basset has not even taken the trouble to modify Verdet's notation, so as to fit in with what he has himself adopted in earlier parts of his own work (cf. §§. 157 and 133). Or, again, take the case of diffraction through an aperture in the form of an isosceles triangle (pp. 52-3); here the focus towards which light is converging, is different in the cases of the isosceles and equilateral triangles referred to. This point appears to be a defect in Airy's treatment of the problem in his Treatise. At any rate, both Airy and Basset assume that their theories, which are not worked out to the bitter end, will give Sir J. Herschel's six-rayed star. Had they worked out their analysis for an equilateral triangle—a tough piece of work enough, even when simplified by the use of trilinear coordinates—they would have found that theory gives a far more complex system of diffraction bands than Sir John Herschel's six-rayed star. Again, if we are to adopt an elastic theory of light at all, then certainly Boussinesq's theory is the clearest and simplest method of approaching the subject; yet Mr. Basset does not discuss it, while the version of Green's theory of double refraction he gives is the one which leads to Neumann's and not to Fresnel's definition of the plane of polarisation, the whole subject of the influence of initial stresses, Green's "extraneous pressures," being omitted. Nor is it pointed out that Green's conditions for double refraction are only special cases of the general conditions obtained by Cauchy and Saint-Venant. Mr. Basset may reply that he has had to make selections; if so, we can only say we doubt the wisdom of his selections and of the omission of full references to such researches as those of Voigt and Kirchhoff on rays, of Clebsch on reflection at a spherical surface, of Boussinesq and Saint-Venant on double refraction, and of Lord Kelvin on "extraneous pressures." In conclusion, we admit fully that the book contains a good deal not in other text-books, but it has been in our opinion too hastily put together and insufficiently revised—mistakes of a fatally confusing character occurring even in the reproduction of Cambridge Tripos problems. We suggest to Mr. Basset a year's work as lecturer on physical optics, and then a revised edition of his volume based upon the experience of the real needs of students thus gained.

Theorie der optischen Instrumente. Nach Abbe von Dr. Siegfried Czapski. (Breslau: Tre-wendt.) This is an offprint from Winkelmann's Handbuch der Physik; and, unlike Mr. Basset's work, it deals with what in England is termed geometrical optics, as distinguished from the unfortunately named physical optics. Most of the contents of the volume will be familiar enough to students of Heath and of Pendlebury, but Dr. Czapski's practical knowledge of optical instruments, especially in the matter of photographic and microscopic lenses, will render his treatise welcome to many in this country. As usual in German works, the references to the literature of the subject are very numerous and complete.

Of the Handbuch der Physik we have also received, Lieferung 11-12 of the Dritte Abtheilung. They treat of electrical conductivity, thermo-electricity and electrolysis. We will deal with them in a forthcoming review of recent electrical works, provided the publishers will reform their ways and bear in mind that any copy is not good enough for a reviewer.

A Treatise on Analytical Statics. With examples. By Edward John Routh. Volume II. (Cambridge: University Press.) This volume of Dr. Routh's consists of three distinct tracts: the first on Attractions, the second on Bending of Rods, and the third on Astatics. The Cambridge school of mathematicians has been reared on the solution of problems, and in the face of the good work done by that school it is impossible to deny that the training has a high intellectual value. We may regret that so many keen minds, year out year in, have been devoted to that intellectual conundrum factory which is involved in the preparation of problem papers, instead of being utilised for physical and technical investigations; we may believe that by proper intercollegiate economy a tenth of the time, printing, and energy would have served all useful purposes. But this being granted, are we certain that Cambridge can after all provide an assuredly better system of training than that of problem setting and problem solving? So long as that system remained supreme, Dr. Routh must be the king of coaches, and his text-books the delight of the Cambridge student. Has the despotism of problems ceased at Cambridge yet? We doubt it. What matters it that Dr. Routh will not prove a problem in astatics by using moments of inertia, because "moments of inertia are usually studied in close connexion with rigid dynamics," and "it is premature to use this analogy as a means of proof in a treatise on statics"? Other teachers may prefer to take dynamics before statics and first and second moments—would that someone would slaughter that name, "moment of inertia"—even before either; but such a perversion of the Cambridge order would plough a student for his "first May," and a rider in statics is a rider in statics, and who shall dare to solve it by what is "usually studied in close connexion with rigid dynamics"? These are, indeed, small matters compared with the fact that Cambridge problem solving and setting has produced great results, notwithstanding its defects and narrownesses; and no better guide can be found than Dr. Routh to the theory of problem solving. From this standpoint, if not from the physical standpoint, we specially commend his tract on Attractions; that on Astatics also is full of interesting points. As to that on the Bending of Rods, it seems to us very insufficient. Thus, in dealing with rods in three dimensions, Dr. Routh follows Thomson and Tait; but their treatment is defective, for it assumes that the cross-sections remain plane after strain, but to obtain the actual values of the principal flexure-torsion rigidities, we have on the contrary to suppose them distorted, at any rate if the cross section be not circular. However, Cambridge students have now several text-books of elasticity by which to supplement their knowledge on this point, and Dr. Routh's tract will be sufficient for many a "May" problem.

The Elements of Graphic Statics: A Text-Book for Students of Engineering. By L. M. Hoskins. (Macmillan.) We fear Messrs. Macmillan & Co. will not increase their reputation as scientific publishers if they import many American works of this type. The book contains, so far as we can see, nothing new; the methods used for the elementary problems dealt with have nothing characteristic about them, and the many interesting problems of modern graphics are entirely disregarded. This is the more to be regretted, as Prof. Hoskins' countrymen have taken their part in the advancement of graphical methods of treatment.

Of the numberless small text-books on statics and dynamics, we have again two on our table. Statics and Dynamics, by C. Geldard (Longmans), is neither better nor worse than the average book of this character. It contains the usual commonplace statements as to the laws of motion, and may be just as serviceable as any other such production to the commonplace teacher.

Mr. A. L. Selby's Elementary Mechanics of Solids and Fluids (Oxford: Clarendon Press) is rather above the average. Without containing anything novel, it introduces a number of points not to be found in the usual type of small text-books. It is true that it has the stale old chapter on "Simple Machines"; but physics are kept pretty constantly in view, and the discussion of Kepler's laws, elasticity, and capillarity are on the whole clear and neat. It should prove a useful book in the fifth forms of public schools.

Hydrostatics and Elementary Hydrokinetics. By George M. Minchin. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.) Prof. Minchin modestly states in his preface that his work is not intended to supplant Besant's Hydrostatics. Whatever may be Prof. Minchin's intention, we have not much doubt as to which work will survive in the struggle for existence. Prof. Minchin knows how to write a good text-book, and we only hope he will not overload this one in future editions. To candidates for Burlington House degrees who aim at knowing something of their subject beyond the contents of the schedule, this book ought to be very welcome. It contains all that they require, without slavishly limiting itself to any scheme of examination. We commend to Mr. Basset the following words of the preface:—

"I am convinced that more than one-half of the efficiency of the teaching of any subject consists in the anticipation and removal of difficulties which are certain to occur to the mind of the student, and which, if left unnoticed (like uncaptured fortresses in the rear of an advancing army), will greatly hinder progress and perhaps necessitate the beginning of the work all over again."

Treatise on Thermodynamics. By Peter Alexander. (Longmans.) Mr. Alexander claims to exhibit for the first time "the general extension of the Second Law in terms of any scale of temperatures," and Carnot's Function "in a new form much more general than any hitherto given," while he has further, he tells us, cleared away "the fog that has up till now hung over the subject of reversibility and irreversibility," and "some haziness from the subject of mobility and dissipation of energy." He presents "the science as an organic unity, instead of so many detached propositions developed from mathematical rather than physical considerations." We have allowed Mr. Alexander to speak for himself, even retaining the italics he is so fond of. We must leave others to judge of our author's real contributions to the theory of thermodynamics.

Laws and Properties of Matter. By R. T. Glazebrook. (Kegan Paul & Co.) This is a volume of the "Modern Science Series," and a very uninspiring volume too. We do not want Mr. Glazebrook to be revolutionary—he could not be that—but a touch of inspiration, a wee grain of enthusiasm, is at least needed to make a "popular work of science" reach the populace. But it is not only the want of inspiration and the complete absence of novel standpoint which characterise this little book; there is a looseness about its definitions which is far from satisfactory. Velocity is defined for a point, acceleration for a body; while we are afterwards told that the kinematics of the first chapter relate to a particle. The reader looks in vain for a description or definition of the three terms. Again, we are told that, "owing to the strain, forces tending to resist further strain are called into play throughout the body." It is usually supposed that further forces are required to resist further strain; we more or less see what Mr. Glazebrook means, but the sentence wants recasting entirely. Then look at the account of the first law of motion. "A lump of dead matter at rest will not move of itself; an external agency of some sort is required to start it. A body in motion, freed from all external forces, will not come to rest of itself." What is "at rest," what is "in motion"? The whole question of the relativity of all motion is quietly omitted; and without a full discussion of that question we venture to think that the First Law is a mere jingle of words, which conveys no meaning to the popular or any other mind. Or, lastly, turn to the bending of the beam problem on pp. 85-6. This looks as if it were a bit of reasoning, yet it teems with assumptions from beginning to end. Now assumptions must be made in a popular work of science, but one of the cardinal virtues of a science primer is that the reader should have every assumption clearly pointed out to him as an assumption. If this be not done, he will ultimately conclude that science and dogma are twin sisters. Mr. Glazebrook has yet to learn that a science primer is more likely to rise in judgment against us than any treatise on the higher mathematics.

Coming to the end of our long list, we have two text-books of physics. A Manual of Physics: being an Introduction to the Study of Physical Science, by William Peddie (Baillière: Tindall & Cox) at first annoyed us by the wide range of material that the author seemed to be compressing into very small space, and the resulting inference that the book must be superficial. But a closer acquaintance with its contents has led us to entirely recast our first impressions. Given the limited size of the volume, we doubt whether a better selection of facts and of theories to illustrate them could well have been made. Much is, of course, omitted that we think students ought to see, and we could wish for a few more footnote references to guide them to further reading. But as a student's first physical manual, to accompany an elementary course of general physics, we think, the book will prove very valuable, and Dr. Peddie has been to a large extent successful where we should have predicted success to be quite impossible.

Our second work on Physics is entitled Physics: Advanced Course, by George F. Barker, Professor of Physics in the University of Pennsylvania. (Macmillan.) This is a very commonplace book, and if it represents the standard of the advanced courses of physics in America—which we very much doubt—then American universities must indeed be at a low ebb; it is hard to realise what their junior courses can be like. It certainly does not strike a higher level than a popular work like Deschanel, and the most necessary mathematical investigations and even elementary theories are everywhere to seek. Much of it too is mere compilation, and even for the most elementary experiments and laws of electrostatics Maxwell is bodily reproduced. Further, the references are almost invariably mere names—"Lord Kelvin concludes"; "Maxwell says"; "According to Faraday"—without any reference to chapter and verse, so that the student is cut off from further inquiry. Compared with Winkelmann's Handbuch der Physik, which might be taken to represent the European standard of "advanced physics," this American text-book is food for babes; and we doubt whether it will even find a sale in this country among inquiring medical students.

SCIENCE NOTES.

MR. S. T. DUNN, of Chilworth, has in the press, nearly ready for publication, a Flora of South West Surrey, including Dorking, Godalming, Farnham, and Haslemere. The last Flora for this district [was Brewer's (1863). Another county Flora is in preparation, by Mr. W. H. Beeby. Mr. Dunn's little book is not intended to take the place of these more complete Floras, but to serve as a portable field guide to visitors. Messrs. West, Newman & Co. are the publishers.

A RECENT number of the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal (London: Kegan Paul & Co.) contains, in its natural history section, a paper on "The Communal Barracks of Primitive Races," by Mr. S. E. Peal, who is, we believe, a resident of old standing in Assam. Among most of the hill tribes bordering that province, the system of organised barracks for young men exists in its most perfect form. But it is also to be found, with modifications, throughout the Malay Archipelago and in the islands of the Pacific; while traces of it may be recognised in parts of Africa. With this system other customs seem to be connected, such as building houses on piles, platform-burial, head-hunting, blackening the teeth, cultivation by burning down each year fresh patches of the jungle, &c. These facts have been pointed out before. The novelty of Mr. Peal's treatment is that he infers from this evidence the priority of promiscuous intercourse to regular marriage. For wherever "bachelor barracks" exist, there is also complete liberty between the young of both sexes until marriage, while the barracks are invariably tabu to the married women, whether the tribe be exogamic or endogamic. After marriage, conjugal fidelity seems to be at least as great as elsewhere. Incidentally, Mr. Peal argues that this promiscuous intercourse among the young is fatal to MacLennan's theory, that the cause of exogamy is to be sought in the horror of incest, which he assumes to be most strongly developed among savage races. The paper is illustrated with two plates, showing the widespread similarities in building, &c., above referred to.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE Classical Review for July (David Nutt) opens with a Philological Note by Mr. F. W. Walker, continuing a series which has lapsed for several months past. On this occasion he deals with the origin of the Greek aorist in s or σ. His explanation rests on the three following propositions:—

"(1) The indicative active of the s aorist has the personal terminations of the perfect, and consequently is not an inherited form, but was created in Graeco-Italian after the pattern of that tense.

"(2) The point of departure for this creation is to be found in a s subjunctive and a s optative, formed from an unthematic aorist, and existing, (it would appear) in all or most Indo-European languages. These s moods allied themselves with an ancient s infinitive, so as to constitute a defective paradigm of s forms which invited completion by a corresponding indicative.

"(3) The s subjunctive, which was originally inflected with a short vowel, was in meaning a future as well as a subjunctive. At a very early period, most dialects of Graeco-Italian adopted a double inflection, i.e., both with a long and a short vowel, reserving the older short form for the future meaning."

Mr. J. G. Frazer and Mr. Andrew Lang both reply to Mr. A. E. Crawley, who had suggested in a former number that the story of Achilles being dressed as a girl may embody the reminiscence of some ceremony of initiation at the age of puberty. Mr. Lang fails to see that the story requires any explanation. Mr. Frazer, on the other hand, thinks that it may be a reminiscence of the custom of dressing boys as girls, in order to avert malignant influences, of which custom he quotes many examples from India, and some even from Europe. In illustration of the story of the early death of the six brothers of Achilles, at the hands of their own mother, he further goes on to quote examples from all parts of the world of the old custom of passing a new-born child over the flames in order to ward off evil influence. Mr. C. F. Abdy Williams writes about ancient metre and modern musical rhythm, concluding that

"Modern composers have, by following the instincts of their genius, unconsciously brought about a renaissance of the natural rhythms and musical forms known to the ancient Greeks, simply enlarging and developing them by the aid of modern resources, while adhering to certain definite principles which, on examination, are found to agree with those enunciated two thousand years ago by Aristoxenus of Tarentum [a pupil of Aristotle, fragments of whose treatise on Rhythm were discovered at Venice by Morelli, in 1785.]"

Mr. A. Tilley gives an account of his recent visit to Lake Trasimene, with the result of supporting the description of the battle by Polybius, as opposed to that by Livy. Mr. W. L. Newman discusses the value of the two families of the MSS. of Aristotle's Politics, with special reference to the views of Susemihl, and deals in detail with a number of readings. Incidentally, he deplores the absence of a well-executed Aristotelian Grammar. Mr.

Cecil Torr emphasises the irreconcilable evidence contained in Luke's Gospel with regard to the date of the birth of Christ. He suggests that there must have been two traditions, according to one of which Christ must have been much younger at the time of his death than is usually supposed; and in support of this, he adduces evidence from the earliest reliefs, mosaics, and frescoes. Mr. Robinson Ellis begins to print a collation of the Madrid MS. of Manilius with the text of Jacob (Berlin, 1846). Mr. R. A. Neil reviews, with more freshness than might have been expected, the several editions of the Mimes of Herodas which have already appeared; and Mr. Walter Headlam publishes a few more conjectural emendations, in advance of the edition which he has in hand. The only other review that need be mentioned is that by Mr. Arthur Platt, of Lang's "Homer and the Epic," which does full justice to the ingenuity, learning, and wit of the author's reasoning, without entirely accepting his conclusions. Finally, we must remark—as we have done before—that the section devoted to archaeology is very meagre, though the summary of the contents of foreign periodicals is useful.

FINE ART.

MESSRS. DEPREZ & GUTEKUNST have ON VIEW the most recent ORIGINAL ETCHINGS by J. McNeill Whistler, F. Seymour-Haden, Prof. H. Herkomer, R.A., and selections of the Works of Jacquemart, Bracquemond, Méryon, &c.—18, Green street, Charing Cross Road, W.C.

THE HOLFORD REMBRANDTS.

THE Rembrandts in the Holford Sale realised something like £16,000. Mr. Fisher's Rembrandts had fetched about £1500; Sir Abraham Hume's £4000; Mr. Seymour Haden's £4700; the Duke of Buccleugh's £10,000 or £11,000. The last is a figure that was expected never to be surpassed: hardly, perhaps, to be equalled. It has been surpassed very much.

Yet—to keep for the moment chiefly to the matter of prices—one extraordinarily famous piece, the "Hundred Guilders," did not, at the Holford Sale, sell for quite as much as was expected. It beat its own record: that was almost a matter of course. Instead of selling for the thirteen hundred which was given for another impression of it, and that not quite of such fine quality, it reached £1750; but there was needed only the presence or the commission of one more millionaire to send it up to over two thousand guineas, and that had been indeed looked for. M. Danlos, of Paris, was the dealer who took it away. The "Ephraim Bonus" with the black ring—the only one with this singular and somewhat petty distinction which could ever come into the market (the remaining impressions being tied up permanently at the British Museum and the Bibliothèque Nationale)—this "Ephraim Bonus with the black ring, we say, fetched £1950; and again it was M. Danlos who obtained the right to bear it across the Channel. When the most sensational price of the sale was obtained, for the "Rembrandt leaning on a Sabre," which was knocked down to Mr. Deprez for the sum of £2000, many people hoped that at least this rareissime print was destined to remain in England. But it also has gone to Paris: it joins, we believe, the other extraordinary rarities in the possession of Baron Edmond de Rothschild.

Leaving now these most exceptional prices, we resume the narrative of the ordinary course of the sale, of which a chief feature was certainly not only the high prices obtained, nor the excessive rarity (in some cases the uniqueness) of some of the items, but, likewise, the extraordinary quality of the impressions; and nowhere was this more true than in the case of the landscapes. Some of the landscapes, like many of the other pieces, sold for prices they have never before attained; yet, in view of the singular beauty of their impressions, we cannot honestly say that they were dear. Expensive they were, undoubtedly: dear they were not, since their art quality is scarcely to be matched in the world. The most brilliant "View of Omval" which it has ever been our fortune to see—a different thing totally from the Hume "Omval" which sold at £47, and from the Buccleugh, which sold at £44—was borne away to Paris by M. Bouillon, at the cost of £320. "The Three Trees" fetched £175. Herr Meder, of Vienna, bought the first state of the "Three Cottages" for £275—possibly for the Berlin Museum. The sum of £210 was the ransom of the first state of the slightly arched subject, "A Village with a Square Tower." This was from the Aylesford collection. It is of extraordinary rarity, and of unparalleled brilliance. M. Dutuit notes its presence at Amsterdam and at the British Museum. To M. Bouillon was knocked down for £260 a faultless impression of "the Canal," a print which in the Galichon Sale had passed under the hammer for £80, and even at the Buccleugh for £120. Messrs. Colnaghi bought for £145 a most sparkling impression of the rare first state of the broadly treated "Landscape with a Ruined Tower," more properly called by the French cataloguers "Paysage à la Tour"; for in this first state there is no sign of ruin. Doubtless, however, when the title by which it is known in England was first applied to it, the amateur was unfamiliar with this state, in which the dome of the tower is intact. In the second state it has disappeared, and in the third there are other minor changes.

What was very remarkable at the Holford Sale was the small sign of any of the very rarest things—le dessus du panier, as the French put it—going to America. Presumably for America was Mr. Sabine's successful bid of £245 for a perfect impression of the "Landscape with a Flock of Sheep" (from the Aylesford and John Barnard collections); but, with that exception, there was no indication of anything of the highest importance crossing the Atlantic, though the Americans will unquestionably have to pay dearly, some day, for that which, in our present period of depression, they are not taking the opportunity to acquire. To make an end of the landscapes, let us add that the "Landscape with an Obelisk"—first state—sold for £185 (Meder); an "Orchard with a Barn"—the early state before the plate was cut at either end—sold for £170 (Bouillon); a "Cottage with White Pales," £70 (Colnaghi); the "Goldweighers' Field," £72 (Colnaghi); and the first state of the landscape with a large boat, extraordinarily full of bur, £200 (Meder).

We may leave aside many of the sacred pieces—the most notable one, the "Hundred Guilders," having been already spoken of—and may dismiss the Rembrandts with some mention of the portraits, including one or two famous ones (apart from the "Sabre" portrait) of Rembrandt himself. The two subjects which were eminently notable were those of "Rembrandt in a Turned-up Hat and Embroidered Mantle," and of "Rembrandt Drawing." The first of the two—an almost unique first state drawn upon by Rembrandt—fetched £420 (Bouillon). Of the second there were two impressions. One of these, which Mr. Middleton-Wake assures us is actually the first, and which Wilson justly describes as at all events "the finest," sold for £280 (Meder). The impression was of unparalleled brilliance and vigour, the thing apparently as spontaneous and impulsive as anything in Rembrandt's work. The second impression sold—to which the honours of a true second state are now assigned—fetched £82, and was one of several fine prints borne away by Mr. Gutekunst, of Stuttgart. Of the portraits of Rembrandt's friends or patrons, one of the most notable sold was, of course, that of the studious young gentleman who is always dignified with the name of the "Burgomaster Six," though in reality a whole generation passed over his head between the time at which Rembrandt etched him and at which he became the recipient of civic honours. An impression of "Six" in the second state fell to Messrs. Colnaghi's bid of £380. The noble portrait of "Old Haaring"—a venerable, kindly, and perhaps even ceremonious gentleman, who practised the profession of an auctioneer—sold for £190 (Gutekunst). It was in the third state. And for nearly the same price, the benign portrait of "John Lutma," the goldsmith—in the first state, however—passed into the hands of the same buyer. "Cornelius Sylvius"—the impression pronounced by Wilson to be the finest—sold for £450 (Bouillon); a second state of the somewhat unaccountably favourite portrait of the advocate "Van Tolling" fetched £330 (Meder); and an exceedingly effective impression of the big portrait of "Coppenol," the writing master, realised no less than £1350 (Bouillon).

We may be suffered, perhaps, to add just a note on the much humbler prices of the Marc Antonios—things no longer in especial favour with the English collector. A Browning of our day, wishing to express in a couple of lines the preferences of the contemporary amateur, would not have occasion to write—as Browning himself did write, forty years ago—

"And the debt of wonder my cmony owes Is paid to my Marc Antonios."

The "debt of wonder" would be paid, now, to Rembrandts and Dürers, to Turners, Méryons, Whistlers—certainly not to Marc Antonios. Yet the best reproducer of the great design of Raphael—of his simple yet august inventions—is assuredly underrated. There must come a time again when he is invited to go up higher. On Thursday of last week, a splendid impression of "The Plague" did indeed fetch £370; but "Lucretia" sold for £66, "Les Grimpeurs" for £32, the "Saint Cecilia" for £31, the admirable "Venus and Cupid" even for £9. Yet at least one or two of these prints are among the best evidences of Marc Antonio's employment of what has been, not without reason, denominated son burin sobre et mâle.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. M. R. JAMES, of the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, has in the press a Catalogue of the Illuminated Manuscripts preserved in that moderately sized but very interesting collection. It would be well if all of our public and academic libraries possessed even so serviceable a handbook to their treasures of this kind as the little volume on the Fitzwilliam illuminated books, by the Rev. W. G. Searle, published in 1876. Mr. James's catalogue, however, will be on a greatly expanded scale. It describes each miniature that appears in every volume of the collection, and will be adequately illustrated by photographic transcripts of the more important examples.

THE famous collection of drawings and sketches by old masters, formed by the late John Malcolm, has been deposited by his son on loan in the British Museum, where it will soon be made accessible to students. Shortly before his death Mr. Malcolm gave to the British Museum a beautifully illuminated Milanese prayer-book, executed for Bona Sforza and her grand-daughter; and now his son has similarly made a present of a colossal cartoon by Michelangelo, representing the Holy Family, which was formerly in the Casa Buonarrotti.

THE annual exhibition of works submitted by students of Schools of Art for the national competition will be opened on Monday next at the South Kensington Museum.

PART I. of Mr. Louis Fagan's History of Engraving in England, containing thirty-three plates and an introduction, is now ready, and Part II. is approaching completion. The work is published by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

THERE is still on view, in the Guildhall Art Gallery, a collection of drawings of "Old London," in water-colours and in black and white, which were first exhibited on the occasion of the conversazione given to the Archaeological Institute. They represent the work, during the last thirteen years, of Mr. Philip Norman, who has done his best to make them interesting from the artistic as well as from the antiquarian point of view. An excellent catalogue shows that they range from the vanishing mediæval inns of Southwark to a Queen Anne house at Kensington, which has been tortured out of recognition within the present year: once the residence of a noble family, it is now the annexe of a draper's shop.

THE small gold medal of the Berlin Art Exhibition has been awarded to Mr. James Guthrie, the Scotch painter.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Homolle, the director of the French School at Athens, exhibited reproductions of a number of the sculptures recently found at Delphi, in the Treasury of the Athenians. He remarked upon the singular contrasts in style between one metope and another, and even between different parts of the same metope. In this he found manifest indications of an age of transition. M. Homolle also exhibited a series of designs by M. Tournaire, which reproduce a very interesting series of architectural painted terra-cottas.

LONDON may yet be indebted a great deal to Mr. Richardson Evans's efforts, and to those of the "National Society for Checking the Abuses of Public Advertising," for that which appeared at first Utopian. His advice, which at the most seemed a "counsel of perfection," is found, thanks to Mr. Richardson Evans's very careful and systematic thought about the matter, to have a vastly practical bearing—to be, so to say, within the range of practical politics. Through Messrs. Remington & Co., Mr. Richardson Evans—whose name and work are well known on one of the greatest of the daily papers—has published, under the title of The Age of Disfigurement, his now fully elaborated schemes and his cogent arguments. And the Society for which he pleads, and which, we rejoice to say, is influentially constituted, may really now hope—should but the public support it in sufficient numbers—to put a barrier in the way of any further defacement either of Nature or of the beauty of our towns by the wanton pranks of the advertiser who nowadays spares neither green fields nor the city street. All these things should be regulated. Mr. Richardson Evans shows clearly that they are capable of regulation; and no one who has suffered from the unsightly puff of the most excellent chocolate or the pictorial record of the hottest pickle, or even from the gentle reminder of the prominent upholsterer, hoisted in a hundred fields as you approach London—no one, we say, who knows anything of these cumulative horrors in modern life, and wishes them abated, should fail to possess himself of the eminently reasonable and modestly priced little book which has suggested our remarks. The Age of Disfigurement ought to be read promptly, and energetically acted upon.

THE STAGE.

THE THEATRICAL SEASON.

A SEASON disastrous for most managers, and not very interesting to the public—except for the opportunity it has afforded of seeing many foreign players—has now come to a close. Among the very few theatres that have done well, the Lyceum stands no doubt easily first, nor has the well-directed activity of Mr. Irving ever been more marked. Next to the steady successes there—successes of revival as well as of production—we should mention those, and especially the last of them, which good fortune, and perhaps some pluck and good judgment, have enabled young Mr. Alexander to obtain at the St. James's. After these things, what is really most noticeable is the continued and gigantic success of two or three farcical comedies, or long drawn farces, of the best order perhaps—Mr. Barrie's "Walker, London," at Mr. Toole's little playhouse; the extraordinarily acceptable piece in which Mr. Penley appears at the Globe, and the long-lived "Niobe" at the Strand; which Mr. Paulton or Miss Beatrice Lamb, or both (for both are fitted in it to a T) should take to the provinces and to America.

The great foreign opportunities have been Eleanora Duse and the Comédie Française. Both have suffered, it is currently reported, by unwise management—the success of both enterprises, we mean, not the individual interests of the artists concerned. The prices of admission to English playhouses are quite high enough—as a rule, indeed, it may be said that the ordinary price of a stall is an extravagant and unremunerated expense. Why then double it? Why practically do more than double it, as was done at Drury Lane, by the abolition of the pit—by taking the guinea stalls back even into the regions which may be inhabited generally at the price of half-a-crown? The mistake was a ridiculous one, and the management temporarily installed at Drury-lane was absolutely ill-advised. It is much to be wished that this should be thoroughly realised by M. Jules Claretie, the courteous and accomplished man of letters who has shown himself so admirable a theatrical manager. With the question of the charges at Drury-lane neither manager nor actors of the Théâtre Français had, we believe, anything to do. But though they had nothing to do with it, half-empty houses told somewhat on the spirits, and on the view of life, of not a few of the comedians; and the boulevardier has thought fit to speak not too well of London, which, in theatrical matters, is ever apt to be hospitable and enthusiastic. M. Francisque Sarcey, whose robust common sense still keeps him at the head of French theatrical criticism, does not share for a moment in the disposition to blame London and English taste. He bears witness to the warmth with which "Francillon" and "Denise"—with the exquisite performance of Mlle. Bartet—were received; nor is there any doubt that the interest of the competent and of the tasteful was excited by the single performance of what was almost the only novelty—Parodi's "Reine Juana," with its verse sonorous and correct, and its sentiment of dignity. Of course such a piece is not for all the world. That was admitted even in Paris, when it was brought out last May. It has admirable things—it is an œuvre de longue haleine—thoroughly studied and patiently wrought. It does not live for the hour alone. And this, we think, was quite recognised by those who have been privileged to see or to read it.

STAGE NOTES.

WE are glad to be able to announce that one of Michael Field's powerful poetic dramas is soon to be presented upon the stage. The third season of the Independent Theatre Society will open in October with a performance of "William Rufus," which is to be played "on a bare, draped stage, without scenery, so that every value may be given to the beauty of the poem and to the acting." A play by Dr. Todhunter; Ibsen's "The Wild Duck," translated by Mr. Archer; a comedy by M. Zola; and "The Death of Count Godfrey," by Mr. Walter Besant and Mr. Walter Pollock, are also announced; and it is proposed to give a performance, by marionettes, of M. Maeterlinck's "La Princesse Maleine."

MUSIC.

OPERA AT COVENT GARDEN.

"SIEGFRIED" was given on Wednesday evening, and proved the most successful of the performances given under the direction of Herr Steinbach. The conductor now seems to have his forces under excellent control, and the orchestral playing deserves special praise. Herr Alvary was the Siegfried, and a finer impersonation of the fearless youth it would indeed be difficult to imagine. In every movement in the first act he showed strength and dignity, and in the second act, when musing in the forest, tenderness. He was in fine voice, too; and the only criticism we have to offer is that in the forge songs there was a feeling of restraint, as if he were distrustful of his voice. It may well be imagined that, after the long strain of the opening act, a singer must be somewhat exhausted. To praise Herr Alvary is right enough; but with an inferior actor to play the part of the dwarf Mime, his acting would lose much of his power. Herr Liebau, however, acted in a most striking manner, and the contrast between the two was wonderfully effective. His deep study of the part revealed itself in every detail. In fact—though it seems almost ungracious to mention it—there were just one or two moments when the art was not entirely concealed. In the first act of "Siegfried," Wagner severely carries out his art-principles; and great acting helps us to understand those principles, and to admire the way in which they have been applied. The scene between Mime and the Wanderer seems unnecessarily long; but even this mauvais quart d'heure is soon forgotten when Siegfried returns to struggle victoriously, at any rate for a time, against the machinations of the dwarf and the stern decrees of fate. Herr Wiegand, as Wotan, was in good form. Frau Moran-Olden was impressive as Brünnhilde; but Frä. Olitzka, in the part of Erda, was nervous.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

MR. LAWRENCE KELLIE gave a very successful concert at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon, in aid of the Mansion House Fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of the men lost in the Victoria. Mrs. M. Macintyre, Mme. Amy Sherwin, Mme. Belle Cole, Mlle. Janotha, Messrs. Ben Davies, Eugène Oudin, and other distinguished artists generously offered their services.

SEVEN performances of Cyrill Kistler's music-drama "Kunihild" are to be given at Würzburg, between July 30 and August 15. Of this work Mr. W. Ashton Ellis, editor of the Meister, has written:—"After hearing 'Kunihild,' I have no longer any doubt that the chain of dramatic composers of the first rank has been increased by another link."

"Mr. Tollemache's essays seem to us to possess literary merit of a rare and high order. He is not only pleasantly anecdotic; he is eminently sympathetic, ingenious, thoughtful, and appreciative, and many of these qualities are also exhibited in his more speculative and less personal papers. His recollections of Grote, Charles Austin, and Pattison are full of interesting anecdote and suggestive comment, while those of Babbage, Sir Charles Wheatstone, Dean Stanley, and Canon Kingsley belong to the same order."—Times.

"That Mr. Tollemache has an inexhaustible fund of anecdotes is not saying much; but what is remarkable is the skill, the aptness, the felicity with which he applies them. Mrs. Tollemache's poems are penetrated with a love of nature truly Wordsworthian. It has been long since we read anything so interesting, amusing and delightful as 'Safe Studies.'"—Galignani's Messenger.

THE LIFE of SIR RICHARD FRANCIS BURTON,

K.C.M.G., &c. By his Wife, ISABEL BURTON. With numerous Portraits, Coloured and other Illustrations, and Maps. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 42s.

"It is a long time since a work so replete with varied and thrilling interest has been produced. The book is not only a valuable contribution to the history of the Victorian age, but a noble tribute of affection, reverence, and admiration to the memory of a dead hero by a woman in every way worthy of association with his astounding life achievements and unique intellectual powers. A product of rare and highly cultivated intelligence."—Daily Telegraph. "The two volumes are full of multifarious interest. The book presents a striking and faithful portrait of a very remarkable man, and a stirring record of a very romantic career."—Times.

"Richard Burton was so fascinating a man, his virility was so gigantic, his intellectual powers so remarkable, his activity so ceaseless, his courage so splendid, his adventures so numerous and so thrilling, that his 'Life cannot fail to partake of these qualities.'"—Daily Chronicle.

LITERATURE.

"TWELVE ENGLISH STATESMEN."—Edward the First. By Prof. T. F. Tout. (Macmillans.)

THE "English Statesmen" series has contained some excellent examples of compressed biography from the pens of eminent writers who are thorough masters of their subjects, such as the late Prof. Freeman's William the Conqueror and Mr. Morley's Walpole. The author of the present volume is not yet as well known to fame as some of his fellow-labourers, but he has given us an honest and careful piece of work by no means unworthy of the company in which it is placed.

Indeed, anyone who takes in hand to set forth the character of Edward I. as a statesman has a task of peculiar difficulty. The portrait of the great king—sketched, of course, mainly from the same point of view—has been painted so elaborately and in such living colours by Bishop Stubbs in the second volume of his "Constitutional History," that it is impossible for any later writer who deals with the subject to avoid drawing largely from the bishop's pages. This Prof. Tout has evidently done and very wisely; and it is not his fault if he is obliged, throughout the greater part of his little book, to say over again what has been said before by the greatest living master of mediæval history. At least, he has put the facts in a more concise and popular shape, and it may be hoped that he will find many readers who would shrink from the labour of reading the bishop's volumes through.

The theme is, in very truth, a noble one. In the list of English kings there have been many who were neither good nor great; in fact, it may be said that those to whom we could, after making the most generous allowances, assign either quality separately are in a decided minority of the whole number. Certainly, since the Norman Conquest there have been hardly any among the rulers of England on whom it is possible to bestow the two titles in combination; it may, indeed, be questioned whether two such can be found among those who bore the name of king.

But one certainly, after making all needful deductions, fully merits the praise of being both great and good; and that one was the First Edward as we style him, though, as Mr. Freeman used to say, he might with better reason be called, as some in his own day did call him, the Fourth. It is strange indeed that all our kings before the Conquest should be left out in the numerical reckoning of the royal style, and doubly strange in the present case, considering how strikingly Edward reproduced many of the features of his old English predecessors, and especially of his great namesake, the son of Alfred. It is curious that, while we in England have thus unduly curtailed the list of our sovereigns, other nations have unduly extended their lists. Thus, the French in their enumeration count in the purely German dynasty of the Karlings; while the Swedes outdo all others by including in their reckoning no less than six doubtful or mythical Charleses, the first of whom is said to have reigned about 2000 B.C., and before the time of the god Odin! which almost matches the story of the Scotch family, who had a boat of their own at the time of the deluge, or of the Welsh genealogical tree, which contained a marginal note a considerable way from the top to the effect that "About this time the world was created."

As we have said, Prof. Tout had not much scope for originality, but he has written a very clear and accurate sketch of Edward's career. He brings out well the part which he played in the troubles of his father's reign, and shows how much he learned from his great adversary, Simon de Montfort. "His long years of apprenticeship had not simply formed his character; they had also suggested the main lines of the policy on which he was to act for the whole of his long reign."

The account of Edward's legislation is good, though Professor Tout would have done well to eschew what Mr. Freeman once called the silly title of "the English Justinian." Between the personal character and general history of the two men there was as little resemblance as can be conceived, and even in the one point of apparent analogy the comparison soon breaks down when we come to details. Justinian's legislation was essentially the work of a theorist, who desires to put forward a complete system founded on first principles, while all Edward's measures were framed to meet some actually urgent necessity, and illustrate the intensely English and practical turn of his mind.

On the importance of the reign of Edward I. as marking the definite establishment of our parliamentary system, it was, of course, absolutely impossible to say anything new, since this forms the special province of Dr. Stubbs, and he has not merely carefully put together all the facts that can be known, but has also with his wonted masterly power drawn out all the inferences that can be suggested by them. Our author, like everyone else, could do no otherwise than follow in the footsteps of the great master. He has, however, shown some independence of view in treating of ecclesiastical matters, which form the one approach to an exception, if we may say so, to Bishop Stubbs's almost perfect impartiality. The bishop seems now and then to be trying to make the best possible case for every leading Churchman; and, in particular, the leniency of the judgment which he passes on Archbishop Winchelsea's opposition to Edward in 1297, is very noticeable when contrasted with the severity of his criticisms on the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, whose action certainly appears more constitutional than that of the Archbishop, and less influenced by merely class interest. Prof. Tout takes a decidedly more unfavourable view of Winchelsea than Bishop Stubbs, and he gives good reason for his opinion. The conduct of the Archbishop in bringing atrocious and absurd charges against one of Edward's most trusted ministers cannot be palliated, and appears fully to justify the king's conduct in banishing him. Bishop Stubbs certainly shows less than his usual sober judgment when he declares that "Winchelsea was a great man."

In treating of Edward's foreign relations and the administration of his continental dominions, Prof. Tout has a subject which has not been so exhaustively treated by previous writers as the internal English history of the reign; and he has been able to bring forward some facts which will be new to most readers. He points out Edward's constant endeavours for the improvement of his Aquitanian duchy, and its defence against French aggression. It is interesting to notice that Edward appeared as a founder of cities abroad as well as at home, the most important of which was the port of Libourne on the Dordogne, which has always remained a prosperous town, though of course it cannot vie with Edward's great English foundation of Kingston-upon-Hull. The care which Prof. Tout has devoted to this topic suggests that he might undertake a work which is much needed—a history of the connexion between England and Aquitaine. There is a great want of knowledge on this head even among those who are tolerably well informed on other parts of the contemporary history; and it requires a clear grasp of the facts in order thoroughly to understand the origin of the Hundred Years War, and to realise that France was the real aggressor, while England was only standing on the defensive.

Prof. Tout has given its proper place, and no more, to that portion of Edward's career which still, it is to be feared with many, constitutes the whole of his history—namely, his dealings with Scotland. Edward has indeed suffered greatly by this undue concentration of interest upon what after all was only an episode in his reign. In the first place, he has been judged entirely by a small portion of his actions, and in the next place an utterly ignorant and unfair judgment has been passed upon his conduct in that particular respect. It was natural that Scotchmen should have no particular love for Edward's memory, though this hardly justifies them in drawing pictures of him which would require some qualification if applied to Attila or Napoleon; but it is not easy to see why Englishmen should, without examination, unhesitatingly take the Scotch side against their own country. Probably there are still many who imagine that Edward's claims to the overlordship of Scotland were a new and unheard-of thing devised by himself for the first time; but every candid writer, whichever side he may take, will admit that this was far from being the case. The question is greatly complicated by the distinction between the three lands which united to form the kingdom of Scotland as it existed in the thirteenth century: Scotland proper, or the country north of the Forth; Welsh Strathclyde; and English Lothian—and by the different relations under which they had originally stood to the crown of England. There can be little doubt that some kind of supremacy over all had been constantly asserted by the English kings, and frequently admitted by the Scotch. Though Prof. Tout goes rather too far when he says: "In the old days, before the Norman Conquest, there had been countless instances of the Scottish kings acknowledging the English monarch as their father and lord"; yet there are certainly some cases which can only be explained away by ingenious special pleading. Edward thus only demanded rights which he had at least reasonable ground for believing to have been enjoyed by his predecessors, and which were most fully admitted by the representatives of the Scotch nobility, who appealed to him to decide the disputed succession. It does not follow, of course, that those who withstood Edward are to be condemned; all we ask is that his conduct may be admitted to come up to the standard not merely of an average king, which is saying very little, but of a decently honest man in private life. Edward certainly meant to govern Scotland well, but the Scots would have none of his government. They were quite justified in so resolving, but it is unfair to blame the English king for not displaying a degree of exalted virtue attained by no rulers even at the present day. Prof. Tout has striven with success to be fair to both sides, and we may quote the words with which he concludes:

"But if an independent Scotland bear witness that Edward's greatest ambition was a failure, his work lived on in his own kingdom of England, where after ages agreed to recognise in him one of the greatest and wisest of her rulers, and where the whole subsequent history of the land he loved so well bore daily witness to the strength and permanence of the great king's work."

R. SEYMOUR LONG.

Poems, Dramatic and Lyrical. By John Leicester Warren, Lord de Tabley. With Illustrations by C. S. Ricketts. (Elkin Mathews & John Lane.)

JOHN LEICESTER WARREN, LORD DE TABLEY, is perhaps not quite so forgotten a poet as he thinks; but nevertheless he has ceased to publish poetry for so many years, and his previous volumes were so many in number, that it would have been convenient if he had told us more precisely which of the poems included in this volume are here published for the first time. What information he does give us on this subject is misleading; for we are told in the prefatory note that they are to be found, some at the beginning, and some others at the end, of the volume. Those quite unacquainted with his work would naturally think themselves justified in setting the last but one of these pieces among the new poems; but this is the fine sonnet on "The Two Old Kings," which first appeared in Searching the Net, and has since been republished in Mr. Miles's Poets and Poetry of the Century, and probably in other anthologies. It is now accompanied by the best of the curious but very unequal designs with which Mr. C. S. Ricketts has adorned the volume—designs which remind one about equally of Albrecht Dürer and Burne Jones. It was particularly rash of this clever young designer to challenge so direct a comparison between himself and the elder master as he has done in his illustration of "The Prodigal." The comparison is unfortunate to Mr. Ricketts with regard to the prodigal himself, and perhaps still more so with regard to his pigs.

It does not very much matter whether the poems are new or old, if we regard the book—and we are justified in so doing—as an anthology culled by the author's own hand. They are all works of his maturity; and there is no sign throughout the book that his ideals of art or his poetical view of life have undergone much change or development in later years. The "Hymn to Astarte," with which the volume commences, is one of those impassioned appeals to a very much unknown goddess which the neopaganism of Mr. Swinburne brought into vogue more than thirty years ago; and "The Woodland Grave," though somewhat different in sentiment and imagery, is sister to the beautiful poem once called "The Ocean Grave," and now "The Churchyard on the Sands." Everywhere we find a note of something like despair, of a mind keenly sensitive to the beauty of the world and the joys of life, but viewing them all as the prey of the scythe of Time or of the shears of Death. But, if Lord de Tabley does not do much to sustain our hearts on this earthly pilgrimage, he solaces the sad journey with melodious laments, and delights our eyes with beautiful pictures, seen through the rifts of his melancholy. The "Hymn to Astarte" is full of them, and they almost compensate for the artificiality of the form in which the poet has clothed his passionate discontent with the arrangement of the universe. The vision of Astarte's home is beautiful and beautifully painted:

"I have seen thy silver fane,
And trod thy slippery stair,
Red with a crimson rain,
And footworn with despair.
Pale as dead men, ah, sweet
We kneel to kiss thy feet.

"We have leave one little hour
In thy white house to doze;
Broad passion-flowers embower
The portals amber-rose,
And lotus lilies keep Guard at thy shrine of sleep.

"As drowsy flies which bide
In some gray spider's stare;
Sleeplocked yet open-eyed,
Glad yet in half despair:
Lovers and maidens sit
In the yellow gates of it,

"Hand interpressed with hand. . . ."

The "Hymn to Astarte" is the most sustained lyrical effort in the volume, but it is too long and somewhat incoherent; and Lord de Tabley's imagination is more fruitfully and perhaps more congenially employed when he sets his rich imagination at work to conjure up some vision of that old world "of Hellas and of Hellas' gods" which he loves so well, and mourns so sweetly. One of the finest of these is the fragment which is called "Phaëthon," but is really concerned only with the loves of Apollo and Clymene, which are told with a force and fulness that few moderns could rival. Here the imagery is luxuriant but not too rich for its theme; and the fancy, swift though it is, does not outstrip the thought. The passion remains human still, though rising beyond humanity; and the poet exalts our imagination without estranging our sympathy:—

"Fickle are the gods;
After the brief night of their fervour done,
They do arise, and with one cold farewell
Sail cloudward: and the wan white victim weeps
For aye a broken lamb, wounded and mazed
Upon the altar of their amorosness:
But the Olympian lover melts in air,
His bright ascent a leaning rainbow tracks
Daedal with argent amethyst and tinged
In avenues of the marmoreal dawn—
Hard-eyed, immortal, griefless, loveless, lost!
But Phoebus loved not as these godlings use;
He needed in the garden of his soul
No lovelier roseleaf. Clymene alone
Wrote in his absence fancy-pictured loves.
She rode in spirit through the cloud with him.
He heard her footstep in the halls of heaven.
Her smile made pale his father's starry lamps,
In heaven he hungered for his earthly spouse;
And all the glorious precinct of his birth
Faded like a prison on his weary eyes.
And those Titanic palaces of dreams,
Golden, auroral, built for god desire
To sun itself in gardens of content;
Where the eternal lily never fades,
And there are no graves, no vicissitudes,
No sighs, no cypress; but the splendid groves
Murmur with happy May beyond the stars—
All these sweet places sickened on his soul,
Empty of love, empty of Clymene,
Most joyless desolations full of joy,
Unparadised, insipid, tearless heaven.
Then, as a lark, tired with the steadfast sun,
Or solitary singing to the cloud,
Reseeks with joy his lowly nesting tuft
And dreams beside his mate no more of stars,
Perfectly homed and utterly content—
So Phoebus down the blue lake of the air
Back to his nest of love and Clymene Descended."

These lines, good as they are, are not such a triumph as those which relate the wooing and conquest of Clymene. Nor are these all the beauties of this fine fragment. What can be more truly seen and more clearly recorded than this image of "old King Oceanus"?—

"Blue-eyed, and wrinkled as the sand is wrinkled,
A fair, wide face, hoary and ample browed,
Smiling a sort of helpless animal smile,
And whispering in the tangles of its beard.
Of intervolving sea-weeds: a vague hulk
Of humid godship, whom the fisher folk
See floating, like a limpet-crusted oar
Of some old Argosy wrecked long ago."

More striking, in some ways, than this fine fragment of "Phaëthon" is another, describing, in irregular rhyme, the house of Circe, and the wondrous piece of tapestry which it contains, all—

"Arabesqued and bordered intricate With hairy spider things
That catch and clamber,
And salamander in his dripping cave
Satanic ebon-amber.
Blindworm and asp, and eft of cumbrous gait,
And toads who love rank grasses near a grave,
And the great goblin moth, who bears
Between his wings the ruined eyes of death."

Marked by the same exuberance of grotesque fancy is the "Story of a Spider";

and these poems, taken together with the fine monologue of Jael (we wish he had given us a Judith also), the exquisite "Nuptial Song," the "Nimrod," and other pieces, show a considerable range of poetic sentiment and dramatic sympathy. Yet one cannot help feeling that his imagination is more at home in Greece and Olympus than in Palestine or England, and that his most perfect work is to be found in such poems as "Zeus" and "Pandora," "Daphne," and the Ode to Pan.

It is in his poems of this class that Lord de Tabley is most distinctly himself. He combines, in unusual degree, a true classic feeling with the freedom of imagination, the untrammelled richness of vocabulary, and the love of embroidered detail which are among the marks of the romantic school. And he has earned a place among the poets of this later renaissance who have re-filled the stage of pagan imagination with light and colour, and forms of living beauty.

It would be impossible for a man of his gifts and temperament to touch more familiar chards without some distinction. If it were only on account of their little sketches and studies of birds and flowers, so vivid, so instinct with personal observation, his more modern lyrics would be delightful. But they are all or nearly all tinged with a sentiment which if sad is tender; and such poems as "The Churchyard on the Sands" and "Love grown Old" will appeal not in vain to readers who care nothing for Pan and Apollo.

Wordsworth might almost have written—

"I would not change my sorrow, sweet
For others' nuptial hours;
I love the daisies at thy feet
More than their orange flowers.

* * *

Come hither, linnets tufted red,
Drift by, O wailing tern;
Set pure vale lilies at her head,
At her feet lady fern."

Yet the place of Lord de Tabley is not with the poets of current sentiment; it is with Keats rather than with Wordsworth. The latter, indeed, pities the man to whom a primrose is nothing more than a primrose, and Lord de Tabley him to whom "the nightingale is nothing but a bird"—but for very different reasons. Wordsworth mourns the deafness of the human soul, Lord de Tabley the dumbness of the Pierian maids.

COSMO MONKHOUSE.

Annals of My Life, 1847-1856. By Charles Wordsworth, Bishop of St. Andrews and Fellow of Winchester College. Edited by W. Earl Hodgson. (Longmans.)

THIS second instalment of Bishop Charles Wordsworth's Annals is, unhappily, posthumous. He died on December 5, 1892, having completed this part of his work a few weeks before, and leaving his papers all in order (see Prefatory Note, p. viii.) for the concluding volume, which, Mr. Hodgson informs us, will be published ere long under the editorship of the Bishop of Salisbury.

The record of a career of much interest and some disappointment—a career involved in some controversies, but without a touch of stain or of descent from its high ideal—will then be complete. To the last the Bishop's mind seems to have been as clear as ever: the Preface of this volume, reviewing the criticisms passed upon vol. i., shows perhaps some of the discursiveness of old age, but none of its languor. It is a great thing to have become a classic, and subject to conjectural emendation, during one's lifetime. The excellent Greek verses written at the Grimsel Hospice, and lost in a conflagration there, have been restored by admiring tourists who copied them from the Traveller's Book before the catastrophe. The varia lectio of γάλα for πάλιν is highly diverting: should we not read βαβαιὰς for βεβαιὰς, in the next line?

The long summary of discordant criticisms upon vol. i. (pp. 9-14) might, I think, have been omitted. It is not given to the diversity of critics, whether north or south of the Tweed, to agree upon everything, least of all upon style, or the merits of jeux d'esprit or light Latin verses. On the other hand, the proof of the mutual esteem that existed between the Bishop and Cardinal Newman—somewhat insolently questioned (p. 31) by a Catholic reviewer—was well worth inserting: it throws a gleam as of sunset on two venerable lives.

It cannot, I think, be denied that, except to the ecclesiastically-minded, this volume of the Annals of My Life is less interesting than the first. The foundation of Trinity College, Glenalmond, of which the then Mr. Wordsworth was the first Warden, was "among the first signs of renewed vitality and energy in the Episcopal Church of Scotland in the early part of the present century" (p. 1). In this aspect, it was dear to his heart; and the account of its early days, in chaps. i., ii., and iv., is full of interest. But the subsequent chapters, dealing largely with the complicated difficulties, first of the election to the Bishopric of St. Andrews, and, secondly, of the management of the diocese, are rather wearisome. There is the same frankness and candour as in vol. i.; but there is also, I think, more tendency to dwell on personal questions, and to resent personal slights—e.g., in the note appended to p. 93, on the subject of a sermon delivered at the consecration of the college chapel at Glenalmond.

Prominent throughout the book is the subject of the Bishop's growing distrust of Mr. Gladstone's policy, both in Church and State affairs: a divergence clearly found compatible with generous personal esteem on both sides, and therefore to be contemplated with regret, but not with pain. Into the merits of the dispute it would be out of my power to enter at any length—it would need an expert in theology, casuistry, and politics; but, in so far as the Bishop's part in the matter affects and colours so many pages, it may be reasonable, in trying to estimate the book, to say how the Bishop's attitude strikes an outsider who honoured him.

It appears to me that the Bishop never thoroughly realised that, on questions like those which divided Mr. Gladstone and him, men not only do draw, but may, without imputation of treachery or worship of spurious idols, be allowed to draw different conclusions from premisses substantially the same. Mr. Gladstone's plea (pp. 115-6) for the political equality of all religions is roundly compared—I do not say identified—with a temptation of the Evil Spirit (p. 115); when the same friend is reluctantly constrained to think that one of his convictions has been erroneous (p. 96), we are told that he ought, even then, "to have abstained from fighting against it." But against what are we to fight if not against what we have come to think erroneous? There is a touch of this same prohibitory tone in the Bishop's attitude towards Newman throughout the Annals. Manning and Hope (p. 98) are "deserters at that crisis"; nowhere can one feel that the Bishop understands that these changes could be, and were, purely conscientious. Sturdy in his convictions, he was reluctant to suppose that good men could conscientiously go wrong—he even asks (p. 84), "what did they gain by it," seeing that they had shortly to "embrace novel judgments," such as the Immaculate Conception and the Infallibility of the Pope? But they were not in search of gain or comfort, intellectual or other: they were honest men thinking, and would certainly never have rejected what they thought to be a truth for fear it should lead to some ulterior demand on their credulity. Why the Bishop speaks of such men as if they had acted lightly or perversely, I cannot tell. Again, the "unchristianising of our Legislature" (p. 96) was a grief of mind to the Bishop, as, apparently (p. 94), was "the Jew Bill," or measure for removing the political disabilities of the Jews; and here also he shows no sign of realising the full effect of his principles. If the presence of Jews in Parliament "dechristianises the Legislature," does not their presence in England do the same to the nation? Is not the logical result the expulsion of the Jews, in the name of Christianity? The Bishop lived to see this done, within the limits of Europe. Does Eastern Christianity look more, or less, Christian for that? Pío Nono thought a Protestant church inside Rome would "dechristianise" it; would the Bishop have agreed with him? In fact, Christianity does not mean the same thing to everybody; men as good as the Bishop—there were not many better—saw an essential want of Christianity in the disabilities and exclusions.

But it is not in these contentious issues that the Bishop's true greatness of character comes out. If his principles were not always broad, his practice was liberal and generous. When he says (p. 127) "I . . . most truly declare that there is no one in the diocese towards whom I entertain an unkind feeling," it is certainly confirmed by the subsequent (p. 164-7) "Letter to the Ministers of all Presbyterian Denominations," &c. And his financial generosity to Glenalmond (p. 91) seems to have been even excessive. It is pleasant to remember (p. 180) that, when even his retiring pension had to be halved, through the heavy liabilities (p. 170) that weighed on the school, another College, whose fellowships have seldom been bestowed on the active or the learned, closed with honour its privilege of electing fellows, by choosing Bishop Wordsworth of St. Andrews.

E. D. A. MORSHEAD.

The Moral Instruction of Children. By Felix Adler. (Edward Arnold.)

THOSE writers on ethics who contend that happiness is the ultimate aim of man, add a corollary to the effect that this aim must be kept in the background. The direct pursuit of happiness is not stimulating, but suicidal. Fox-hunting includes a great deal more than fox-catching. So the conscious and determined pursuit of happiness will defeat its own object.

A similar difficulty presents itself in the teaching of ethics. Like the second lord in "As You Like It," we "leave" the melancholy Jaques when he begins to "moralise the spectacle." It is the few only who care to stay and "cope" the moralist, to see how "full of matter" he may be. We are rather afraid of the man who points a moral or adorns a tale. Outside of church we do not like to be preached at. There is a world of scorn in the utterance of the words, a "goody-goody" story. In fact, insistence upon morals and morality may defeat its object as completely as may the self-centred pursuit of pleasure, or, as we have said, even the enlightened, ethical, self-conscious pursuit of happiness. If this is true for men, it is a fortiori true for children, who have no clear intellectual grasp of ethical problems as such, and are therefore not in the least interested in them. The world of life, of joy, of spontaneity is everything to the child. Woe be to the man who limits the spaciousness and the beauty of the child's world by unnecessary and premature insistence upon moral codes and regulations. The older teaching of religious ethics, in which the child was vainly pestered by the "vale of tears" theory of the world, led to much damping of energy and to more or less conscious hypocrisy. Ethics-teaching, independent of religion, in the hands of an unskilful teacher, might easily "bore" the child, as the absence of the religious element undoubtedly takes away something of great value on the imaginative side of the child's mind. We might get light without warmth, as Matthew Arnold would put it.

Dr. Felix Adler is not an unskilful teacher, nor is he a Jaques inspiring the reader to "leave" him. He teaches morals, without moralising. Children taught on the plan he proposes will have to bring their wits to bear on the material presented. Activity of mind brings or makes its own interest. The results arrived at are the children's own, not those forced upon them by the teacher. Taken up in such a spirit, there is no reason why Morals should not be as interesting a school subject as any other intellectual work. The material on which thought is to be exercised is carefully chosen throughout the book, so as to be suitable to the age of the children who are being taught. It comes within their experience. It is much of it extremely interesting in itself. It deals with subjects about which the child can reason, and about which the child would, in most cases, like to have opinions. It is a most valuable unfolding in a systematic way of the material there is at disposal for moral teaching.

This is high recommendation; for the will, to be good and powerful, needs that the desires and motives on which its acts are based should be tried in the balances and refined by presentation in thought of all the manifold kinds of action to which they may lead. Dr. Adler has only dealt with what we may term the elementary school course of ethics. The material which he especially considers consists of fairy tales, fables, stories from the Bible, the Odyssey and the Iliad. He then proceeds to deal with more direct moral teaching—viz., the duty of acquiring knowledge, the duties which relate to the physical life and the feelings, the filial and fraternal duties, duties toward all men (justice and charity), civic duty.

Dr. Adler gives three counsels for the use of fairy tales. (1) Tell the story. Don't read it or give it to be read. (2) "Do not make the story taper toward a single point, the moral point. You will squeeze all the juice out of it if you try. . . . Treat the moral element as an incident; emphasise it indeed, but incidentally. Pluck it as a wayside flower." This, surely, betokens pedagogic insight. (3) Eliminate from the stories whatever is merely superstitious, merely a relic of ancient animism, and of course what is objectionable on moral grounds. The remarks on fables are equally suggestive. Fable-teaching concentrates the thought upon some one point much more emphatically than fairy tales. It should, therefore, come later than fairy story telling, and it is of more direct value from the ethical point of view. The Bible stories are selected from an unsectarian, human standpoint. It is easy for Dr. Adler to show that the Odyssey and the Iliad are extremely interesting to young boys and to girls. Nor has he difficulty in showing that their moral significance is great. As to Dr. Adler's method for pointing out the duty of acquiring knowledge, I can testify to its value. I feared when I read the chapter that the moralising was too direct. I gave a lesson on the lines he suggests, and found that his material was effective, and that the lesson was highly useful to even very young boys. The appendix on the influence of manual training on character is, perhaps, the best chapter of the book. The following sentence is illuminative:

"The more machinery takes the place of human labour, the more necessary it will be to resort to manual training as a means of keeping up skill, precisely as we have resorted to athletics as a means of keeping up strength."

Dr. Adler can speak with enthusiasm of the good feeling between the classes aroused by education in the common schools of America. Is there not, therefore, sound sense when he says:

"Let manual training be introduced into the common schools; let the son of the rich man learn side by side with the son of the poor man, to labour with his hands; let him thus practically learn to respect labour; let him learn to understand what the dignity of manual labour really means, and the two classes of society, united at the root, will never thereafter grow asunder."

This must be pronounced fantastic in the short work Dr. Adler makes of the mighty labour question; but that the education of rich and poor towards similar good ends, and by similar good methods, will be an ameliorative factor in the coming struggle is indicated by favourable signs in more quarters than one.

Dr. Adler's great merits, I take it, are in the systematisation of his subject, and in his comprehensive suggestiveness of material for moral instruction. He has pointed out the order and progress of studies for the teachers, and has suggested methods for his special subject in accordance with the general methods based on psychology.

Dr. Adler, as I have hinted, has steered clear of all religious discussions. But there is quite as difficult an ethical cruz, which he does not satisfactorily deal with, before setting to work. What is the ethical standard? Do you adopt with Dr. Martineau, a canon of principles, or with Herbert Spencer, a canon of consequences? Dr. Adler is not clear. In the course of some excellent remarks on the indirect teaching of morals in the history and literature lessons, he mentions the desirability of recognising the difference of motives from which men in the past have acted. In an earlier chapter, however, he argues that he would not discuss the rightness or wrongness of actions with children. It is right to tell the truth; it is wrong to lie. Anyone who asks why disgraces himself in the question.

"It is wrong to lie. . . . You despise yourself when you have told a lie. But in order to strengthen your weak resolution, to confirm you in well-doing, let me show you that it is also contrary to self-interest to lie."

Accordingly, later on, we are given the fable of the boy who cried, "Wolf, wolf." This is an excellent story for pointing out the consequences of lack of truthfulness. It may be said that its outcome is prudence, not morality. Miss Shirreff, in her recently published lecture on "Moral Training," combats with great effectiveness this tendency of teaching. "A child may have burned himself as seriously by trying to prevent a younger brother or sister from being injured, as by going too near the fire for his own pleasure." In either case, the consequences might be bad. The moral value, however, of the two actions greatly differs. Again, a bad king may precipitate, by reaction, the adoption of good laws. The goodness of the laws which follows upon his badness does not make him good. The death of the martyr is a sad consequence of his persistence, and is contrary to self-interest; yet it is not regarded as an argument against his morality. Whether it is practicable to prepare a course of lessons showing, in a concrete form, the "hierarchy of motives," and insisting on the difference of value in the springs of action; whether it would be wise to do so; whether such a course, founded on the canon of principles, could be made complementary to the course founded on the canon of consequences, are points for the ethical specialist to inform us. I am obliged to point out that Dr. Adler, Mr. Herbert Spencer, and the late Mr. Ellis, in dealing with the subject, treat it from the point of view of the canon of consequences. This gives ethics-teaching a lop-sided aspect.

To that most difficult problem of the school—the individualisation of moral teaching—Dr. Adler gives two pages. He apparently proposes a specialist to teach morals throughout the school, who is to be a sort of lay-chaplain. He is to make a conscientious study of the character of the pupils, and to work in co-operation with the other teachers and with the parents. He should endeavour to make a "kind of chart of the character of each of his pupils." Indeed, to compass this, Dr. Adler would have the specialist win the confidence of a boys' friend if he can, "without undue prying," and learn further details, so as to correctly base an estimate of his character. Then, adds Dr. Adler,

"The teacher who knows the special temptations of his pupils will have many opportunities, in the course of the moral lessons, to give them pertinent warnings and advice, without seeming to address them in particular or expressing their faults to the class."

Surely the lay-chaplain is throwing aside his laymanship, and instead of inflicting himself on one day of the week is extending his worst functions to six days. Fancy school boys such as Shelley or Byron "standing such a master," not only on their own account, but on account of the boy "preached at"! Is Dr. Adler so inexperienced that he thinks his little ruse would not be "twigged," or is he so clever that he thinks he can outwit school-boys and improve them nilly-willy? No, these two pages are slight and has-y. "He will also be able to exercise a helpful surveillance over their conduct in school, and to become in private their friend and counsellor." Does Mr. Adler realise, from the practical side, what his proposal might lead to? It is quite possible that, following Dr. Adler's suggestion, Sir Austin Feverel might have walked straight into the schoolroom, and have been established there permanently. Dr. Adler, no doubt, has in view certain ideal men as specialist-moralist-teachers. But how does he propose to furnish a race of them? It may even be asked, Is not the task impossible for ideal men? To try "to act providence," for this is the logical result of Dr. Adler's suggestion, is probably in itself unwise. We know that it has proved morally fatal. Dr. Adler offers no safeguards against the perpetual repetition of failure. It is the ever-present danger of the moralist that by being too much en évidence, or by the unwise word, he may himself defeat his own ends. And then, there is no mercy! The Comic Spirit, "overhead, will look humely malign, and cast an oblique light, followed by volleys of silvery laughter."

The historical romance is at all times heavily handicapped. To write a story dealing with Jacobite rising in the Highlands is to show so thorough a conviction in one's capacity for adequate and novel treatment of the theme as to make the double handicap a weighty one indeed. Sir Walter Scott and Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson bar the way. Mr. Alexander Allardyce, whose ablest novel, The City of Sunshine, had a distinctive savour that suggested exceptional ability, is influenced both by the author of Waverley and by the author of The Master of Ballantrae. He displays, however, the discursiveness, without the impetuous full-flood, of the one; the delight in detail, without the paramount verve, the actualising, dynamic, wholly convincing characterisation, of the other. It would, none the less, be unjust to Mr. Allardyce to let it be inferred that he is an obvious imitator of the two great masters of Scottish romance. Balmoral is an interesting, picturesque, and occasionally moving story, with the glow upon it of one of the most romantic episodes of the most romantic national history in the world. But it is too long. Restricted to the half of its present length—restricted through concentration, and not through poverty of invention or any arbitrary cause—it would gain immensely. Mr. Allardyce has not learned that lesson which Mr. Stevenson seems to have apprehended intuitively: the knowledge when to leave well alone. The pedagogic professor, Meston, might have been made as living as Baillie Nicol Jarvie, as the old Scots steward at Ballantrae, as David Balfour. As it is, we have too much of him. He follows the common lot in fiction—he kills himself, so to say. Still, many readers, doubtless, will be sorry to part with the heroic old pedant when, drunk and classical to the last, he disappears from ken in the sudden glare of torchlight wherein the story ends. Mr. Allardyce is least successful in his heroine. Bess Farquharson is a phantom. She is, at most, the raw material out of which a heroine might be made. The hero, Edward Bardolph, is too long-winded; nor is he circumspect enough in his diction, for now he persuades us to believe in his authenticity, now he is obtrusively acting a part. In the main, however, this romance of the Farquharsons and the Farquharson country is a stirring one, and will be perused by all, and particularly by Scots readers, with unswerving interest. If it were written throughout on the same level as the section called "The Flight across the Polach," or as much of that entitled "The Great Hunting," it would be a permanently notable addition to its kind.

It is an abrupt passage from the historical episodes and picturesque background of Balmoral to Miss Robins' (Mrs. Baillie Reynolds') very modern novel. If one misses the romantic atmosphere, one notes also the lack of pleasure afforded by style. Mr. Allardyce has obvious faults of manner, but he writes with artistry. The author of In the Balance has a perilous fluency. There is no reason, beyond the exigencies of the three-volume novel, why this story should not be in four, or six, or seven volumes. Were six-volume novels the vogue, then, we may be sure, Miss Robins would be equal to the occasion: and Captain Denis Malwood would postpone "coming intil his ain again" till vol. v., and the baffled heroine become conventionally happy in the penultimate chapter of the sixth and last. The author's strong point is plot. That of In the Balance is certainly intricate enough. No doubt most readers will share in the surprise of Denis Malwood when he finds that the governess, Miss Ercildoune, whom he marries only to lose straightway for a time, is—well, there is no need to indicate who she was or was not. We have met each of the characters before, times without number; there is scarce one that is not as familiar as, to a certain dogmatic gentleman, "the man from Sheffield." The story, however, will please a large class of readers. It has everything needful to this end: succinctly, everything but the essential qualities of actuality. There is the wonted conjunction of "novelly" names, Loys Ercildoune, Vanda Hamlyn, Morse Carruthers, Geoffrey Delaval, and the like. Inevitably, too, when the heroine (no, it is the protagonist here) allows her lover to kiss her—"let him kiss her as much as he would, too surprised, and also too happy to make objections"—we are told that "she resigned herself to the torrent of his passion, which seemed to sweep her away with it." Dear old familiar phrase! Dear latest damsel of a mighty multitude, each of which, soon or late, invariably "resigns herself," with perfect propriety, to "the torrent of passion" on the part of a thoroughly respectable and law-abiding gentleman. Equally naturally, when Mr. Delaval (the owner of the torrent) has kissed the imperious Vanda in the little anteroom whither she went though she vowed she would not, "both trembled from head to foot with the mighty shock of union." These be flaws: let it be added that the book is not only good of its kind, but distinctly above the general level of its class.

Is Mr. Henry James solicitous of rivalling Balzac in extent of output? Only the other day a bulky volume of tales was published, and readers of the ACADEMY have already been informed as to the high claim of The Real Thing; and other Stories. Now he gives us another series under the collective title of The Private Life; and almost simultaneously is issued from the same publishing house a collection of critical and discursive Essays in London. The story which gives its name to Mr. James's latest book of fiction is, if not one of his happiest, certainly pre-eminently characteristic. There are readers, doubtless, who will rank it very high indeed; who may even regard it as a masterpiece of subtlety. Subtle it is, beyond question: so subtle that some, at any rate, who peruse it will wonder if the whole thing is an intentional though disguised mystification, or a symbolical narrative spun so fine that only the most clear-eyed will discern its drift. To others there will be something highly suggestive in the shadow-portrait of Lord Mellifont. It is a story told in a succession of nuances. Nothing is narrated; everything is hinted, vaguely suggested. Clever as the performance is, one cannot but wish there were more lucidity of expression, as well as crave for a style somewhat less tortured into the extreme of refinement. Mr. James can surpass every English and American writer of the short story when he is at his best—e.g., in "The Author of Beltraffio," "The Lesson of the Master," "Norah Vincent"—but every now and again he appears to be confronted by his double, the Henry James of adverse criticism, and to allow his real self to be merged in that unnecessary second personality, to the mystification of admirers and detractors alike. Mr. James writes always with so much delicacy, generally with so much verve, and often with such charm, that even when he is not at his best he must still be worthy of perusal. It will altogether depend upon the reader's standpoint whether he consider the six tales in this volume to be of Mr. James's best, or regard each as an interesting temperamental throw-off on the part of a writer whose deeper nature demands expression of a more robust vitality, of a less exaggerated tenuity.

Mr. Anthony Hope has written one or two clever novels. It is well to remember this in judging A Change of Air, which affords surprising hints of amateurishness. Yet the book is the product of an alert and sometimes acute intelligence, and in parts is written with such genuine craft, that one wonders the author allowed himself to work out so feeble a plot, with personages so puppet-like. In the minor characters he is happier, and in certain chapters he is at his best; but this is not enough to save from mediocrity a book that aspires to distinction—an aim to which Mr. Anthony Hope will no doubt attain speedily, as he has simply not found himself yet in the matter of subject. When he discovers his golden opportunity, he may be looked to for work of high quality: for a book of commanding interest.

Of the next four books on my list only one has any real claim to consideration. Mr. Hamlin Garland is among the ablest of the younger American romancists. I have reviewed two or three of his books in the ACADEMY, and now need only recommend readers who have enjoyed Main-Travelled Roads, A Spoil of Office, A Little Norsk, to spend an hour or two over the breezy vigorous tales which, to the number of nine, make up Prairie Folks. Doubtless these stories are too rough, and even coarse, to suit palates appreciative only of daintily disguised delicacies, or delicately disguised brutalities; but they are the work of a man and not a mannikin—and in literature, as in life, a word or two with a man is worth a whole series of conversazioni with mannikins. A Modern Agrippa is also an American product; but Miss, or Mrs., Caroline White is no rival to Mr. Hamlin Garland. The book is made up of two stories, one dull and the other duller, and both poor. Dull, also, painstakingly as well as painfully dull, is Miss Langford's Werona, a story of domestic Australian life. It is only fair to add that there is almost certainly pleasant entertainment here for readers of that large class which enjoy domestic stories of a nature neither too exciting nor too analytical. Tavistock Tales, again, is a collection of stories by colonial and American as well as native romancists. There are eleven tales in all, unacknowledged reprints. The best of a not very select or exceptionally entertaining company are "The March of the White Guard," "Sunshine Johnson, Murderer," and "The Man from the Four Corners," respectively by Gilbert Parker, Luke Sharp, and G. B. Burgin.

Though no indication of the fact is afforded by the title-page or elsewhere, Un Furto is certainly not Signor Carlo Placci's first book. I have read one or two volumes of earlier date by this clever Florentine writer, and, if I am not mistaken, he made his début as a poet. The plot of Un Furto is so far indicated in the title, but it is no ordinary robbery that is alluded to. Piero Tavolini is an enthusiast in art. His sovereign hope is that he may one day distinguish himself as a discoverer of some remarkable "old master"; may discern the handiwork of genius, of an unmistakable individuality, below the surface of some disguising touch. While still cherishing this idea, he falls in love with two objects: a beautiful American girl, named Daisy Roberts, and a small picture in the Tornabuoni collection. He comes to believe that this little canvas is an antique masterpiece. He is on fire to discover the mystery. Finally he succumbs to the temptation. By a cleverly daring act he removes, secretes, and escapes with the coveted picture. Then, naturally, the punishment of his folly begins. He is tormented distractingly, morning, noon, and night. Ruin seems to stare him in the face wherever he turns. He dare not even press his suit with Miss Roberts, though in his heart he believes he can win her. The hue and cry causes him to live in palpitating misery. Meanwhile, however, he discovers that the "Madonnina" is really Botticelli's finished and beautiful study for the "Incoronata." Filled with the joy of discovery, he is the next moment dashed by the reflection that he can do nothing. Ultimately he smuggles the restored canvas back into the Gallery of the Marchese Tornabuoni. In the end his two rivals get the credit of the discovery. His heart aching with bitterness, he turns away from the scene of his temptation only to learn that he has also lost Daisy Roberts. His "Theft" brought him more than his need of punishment, and leaves him a broken as well as an embittered man. Un Furto is overlong, and is crowded with unnecessary detail, but it is an interesting study of contemporary artistic society in Florence.

English names and English manners are not invariably treated with intimate knowledge by Signor Placci; but there are no absurdities. These, on the other hand, abound in the grotesque study of English life put forth by M. Jean Blaize in Amour de Miss. If the author has been in London at all, he has probably, at most, spent a week-end in the neighbourhood of Leicester Square. Amour de Miss (though meant to be a tragedy) is amusing, in truth, but not by intent of the author. A slip came with the volume, and this also is amusing. Doubtless M. Blaize, or his publisher, can speak with far greater authority than can an envious British critic. The slip informs us that Amour de Miss is a story "poignante et gaie, qui fait rire, palpiter et pleurer, ce qui n'est jamais à dédaigner, et, chose rare, le sujet en est absolument neuf." Further, that the book is written in a very superior fashion. Further, that to its double elements of drama and comedy, it adds an "émotion printanière," "pleurs d'aurore," and "rayons de mai." Further, that, possessing all the conditions which determine a great success, the public will certainly, &c., &c. This fantastic effort at realistic depiction of English life opens with an account of Lord and Lady Proctoral. The distinguished couple (whose name is so convincingly British) dwell in that fashionable resort of the aristocracy, Tottenham Court Road. In the second sentence we have a charming glimpse. The Tottenham Court Road abode boasts two pianos—one on which Lady Proctoral "offered her talent" to friends and relations; the other, "un petit piano tout simple," which knew the matrimonial selectness of those "belles choses qu'elle jouait au lord." Lord Proctoral, a kind of smug evangelist and Chadband in one, seen from a French point of view, has married the daughter of a "Mister Frozell." Mister Frozell plays an important part in Amour de Miss. This worthy Britisher starts a superb hotel in another fashionable quarter of London, at Blackfriars Bridge. Here he and his family sit down to meals with "his gentlemen," and here, "more Britannico," he has family prayers at two p.m.—and not only prayers, but "une lecture du Nouveau Testament, avec commentaires." Mister Frozell descends to whist, however. He adds to his British verisimilitude by smashing, while at table with his guests, a dirty bottle of anchovy sauce, and shouting, "Sales filles! damnées femmes!" At this, M. Blaize admits, Mister Plick and the other gentlemen "were arrested in their mastications," but only momentarily. The "Miss" who is the heroine is Miss Frozell, daughter of the excitable landlord of the New World Hotel, and sister of the aristocrat of Tottenham Court Road with the two pianos. A French commercial traveller takes advantage of "Miss." She has twins. Mister Frozell goes to Paris and tells Lothario he must make Miss Frozell an honest woman, or, dread alternative, "boxons-nous." Lothario repents, ventures across the perilous deep between Calais and Dover, but arrives too late. Little Jacques and Thomas were motherless; "Miss," "victime angélique de l'amour," died while Lothario was hasting Londonwards in the Club train. The whole thing is obnoxious to the proud soul of a Proctoral. "Le lord" consequently deserts Tottenham Court Road, and he and Lady Proctoral thenceforth dwell apart in Howard Castle, Sussex. Well may the tearful and indignant author of all this rubbish exclaim, "Ah, l'abjecte société, qui méprise de telles martyres!" We hear so much of the rainbow side of French literary art that it may be salutary to regard for a moment the impudent banalities of a writer who—deservedly or not in other respects, I cannot say—has a fair repute over sea.

WILLIAM SHARP.

SOME BOOKS FOR THE COUNTRY.

The Rivers of Devon from Source to Sea. By J. L. W. Page. (Seeley.) This book is illustrated with a good many wood-cuts of characteristic river scenery, and with four excellent etchings by Mr. Ansted. Indeed, the aerial distances of his "Bideford and the Torridge" are highly to be commended. The letterpress which accompanies the sketches is somewhat commonplace, giving the volume the air of a glorified handbook. Many people, however, appreciate this style of writing; and to them Mr. Page's book will prove a treasure, especially if they have yet to make the acquaintance of the river scenery of Devon. Its diversity constitutes its charm. Rocks, red fields, woods, moorland meadows—these shut in the different rivers, and sometimes all combine to beautify one at different parts of its course. Old-world villages and manor houses, which have belonged to some of the best blood of the realm and sheltered many a gallant knight and dame, dot the rivers of Devon. There are generally ghost stories connected with them to be heard for the asking. Mr. Page has judiciously combined these in his pages, garnished with fitting anecdotes and scraps of dialect, and, above all, with much literary appreciation of the fine prospects. The smaller rivers of the shire are omitted or but cursorily touched. Thus, Yarty and Coly, dear to trout fishers, are unchronicled, and many will think that less homage is paid than its right to Coleridge's Otter, a river of many associations. Mr. Page's heart is in Dartmoor and the wilder streams which find their parents among its tors and ferns—Teign, Dart, and Avon—and few will quarrel with his selection. These are certainly the most picturesque of the Devon rivers, and due justice is here done to their merits. The Tamar is also carefully treated, and Mr. Ansted's sketch of the Saltash viaduct over this river deserves special commendation for its poetic treatment. Mr. Page traces Tamar to its source on Wooley Moor, also the cradle of Torridge, as Plym-limmon is to Wye and Severn. When the author turns his steps to the north of the county, Oare Water, John Ridd, and Lorna Doone are naturally not forgotten. Rambling by rivers is a delightful amusement, and no one who reads this book will regret if he is thereby tempted to explore the rivers of Devon. They possess every charm to allure the poet, the geologist, or the sketcher, although it is vain for the fisherman to seek them in such a season as the present.

Out of Doors in Tzarland. By F. J. Whishaw. (Longmans.) The general aspects and customs of St. Petersburg, together with the working of the village commune in Russia, have often been described. But Mr. Whishaw possessed opportunities of making himself familiar with game-shooting in Northern Russia, and availed himself of them to the full; consequently the portions of this book which treat of natural history and sports are a welcome contribution to the scanty accounts that have hitherto been written on these subjects. In the chapters on capercaillie and blackcock, the reader is reminded at once of Mr. Lloyd; but Mr. Whishaw enters into more detail, and has thereby produced a book which will delight the naturalist as well as the sportsman proper. He is a careful observer, and some of his descriptions of wild life in the Russian forests are excellent. His style is spirited, when he does not fall into bathos or slang. The lek, or courtship, of the above birds is charmingly depicted. The manner in which woodcocks are shot in the "rides" of the forest during the twilight flights was a favourite sport with our ancestors, although they substituted nets for guns in such places. There is a good chapter on the double snipe, a regular migratory visitor in North Russia. The author does not forget lynx and wolf shooting, adventures with bears, and rambles in the forests on snow shoes among the haunts of the elk. Not being much of an angler, and the waters to which he had access being poorly furnished with the finer fish, Mr. Whishaw apologises for a somewhat meagre account of Russian angling, but his reminiscences of the Zaritch Club will excite the envy of every English fisherman. Finland trout are famous, and the pike of Lake Hottaka far exceed our own in Loughs Mask and Corrib. The book ends with a pleasantly-written chapter on winter sports at the ice hills in the capital.

The Farrier: or "No Foot, No Horse." By Major A. T. Fisher. (Bentley.) Innumerable treatises have been written on the horse, as may be seen in Mr. F. H. Huth's Bibliographical Record of Hippology; while not a few writers in recent years, from Miles to Wood and Mayhew, have treated specially of the horse's foot. Major Fisher's little book is honourably distinguished by its simplicity and sound common sense. He is ambitious of teaching farriers good workmanship in shoeing horses, and of protecting the poor animals themselves from stupid injury and consequent lameness. To effect these worthy ends, he gives an excellent account in plain language of the anatomy of the horse's foot. Then he treats of what a good shoe should be, and points out the many mischievous results of ignorant and careless shoeing. Lastly he deals with the diseases of the foot, and appends a few homely recipes with which the most untaught groom can do no damage to the animal under his care. Technical language is avoided throughout, and a hatred of cruelty commends the writer at once to his reader. There is an excellent chapter on navicular diseases; and the different systems of shoeing are lucidly explained, especially the use of the rectangular Charlier shoes. Major Fisher shows an exhaustive knowledge of his subject in every page, and his book is the most practical of manuals. It is just the book which would prove helpful to an intelligent farrier, who is willing to learn and improve upon traditional methods of treating the horse's foot, while it is especially suited to the country gentleman. Happy indeed ought any horse to be whose owner places Major Fisher's book on his shelves.

Lectures on Sanitary Law. By A. Wynter Blyth. (Macmillans.) For all who wish to possess a classified view of the powers and duties of local authorities in relation to the public health, these lectures will prove most useful. They were delivered by the author at the College of State Medicine, as part of the usual teaching of sanitary science. Mr. Wynter Blyth owns an analytic and discriminating intellect, points out what is obligatory and what permissive in the numerous statutes which have lately been passed on matters of public health, explains ambiguities, and always gives a lucid purview of the department of his subject which he strives to render more intelligible. The twelve lectures embrace sanitary districts and authorities, nuisances, drainage, water supply, the law on infectious diseases and the housing of the working-classes, port sanitary law, canal boat regulations, and metropolitan sanitary law. An appendix treats of the bye-laws in force in the metropolis with regard to certain offensive trades. This summary shows how comprehensive is Mr. Wynter Blyth's treatment. Clear arrangement is everything in such complicated questions as are here handled; and over and above the text and its careful distinctions, a capital index renders the book still more complete. Not only to medical and legal authorities will Mr. Wynter Blyth's book prove a convenient handbook; but many a paterfamilias would save himself time and worry, to say nothing of money, by making himself acquainted with the many modes in which modern sanitary subjects touch his property and responsibilities. The author's chapter on sewage and house drainage is excellent, while the sections on bye-laws, their extent and legality, betray the resources of a thoroughly legal mind.

Practical Fly-Fishing founded on Nature. By John Beever. (Methuen.) There is a pleasant flavour of Ruskinism about this little book. The "master" wrote the letters of Hortus Inclusus to the author's sisters in that charming garden which even outsiders know so well from Mr. Tuckwell's Tongues in Trees. A sympathetic memoir of Mr. Beever (who died in 1859), is contributed by Mr. W. G. Collingwood, while notes and a chapter on char-fishing are appended by Arthur Severn, Jun., and Agnew Ruskin Severn. Naturally it is tastefully bound and printed, while its piscatorial directions are (as old Franck would have said), "calculated for the meridian of the Lakes," and for Coniston in particular. Collectors of angling books will remember that this book in its first edition (1849) was attributed to "Arundo." Its fame is now assigned to John Beever, who was an ardent lover of nature and especially skilled in fishing the lake district. His wrinkles are: that a man should make his own fly-rod, imitate natural flies as much as possible, and throw a short instead of a long line. All these positions might be easily controverted. Perhaps a wise angler would herein imitate Sir Roger de Coverly, and give it as his opinion that "a good deal might be said on both sides of the question." In any case, all lovers of the country will like to add this dainty angling book to their shelf of favourites.

Fishing Experiences of Half a Century. By Major J. P. Hopkins. (Longmans.) Unpleasant though it be to say, it is long since we lighted upon a book of sport so coarse and vulgar as this. Its heavy drinking and thinly veiled oaths carry it back sixty or seventy years to the "bloods" and "bucks" of the Regency. The experiences herein recounted might have happened to every angler; and there is no sympathy with nature, no observation of the instincts of birds or fish, to be found among them. There is certainly one remarkable story about catching a pollock of 19 lbs., which we should be sorry to describe as mythical, but it was certainly a large fish. For those who love minnow fishing Major Hopkins devotes a chapter to instructions on the use of the fast reel. On himself reviewing his book, the author will probably agree with us that its tone is a mistake.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. SEELEY & Co. will publish early in the autumn an important monograph on Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans, better known as "Madame," from the pen of Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Henry Ady), author of Saccharissa. It will contain two portraits, and will give a full account of the romantic career of this brilliant but ill-fated Stuart Princess, the daughter of Charles I. and sister-in-law of Louis XIV. Mrs. Ady's work will include several hitherto unpublished documents from the French and English State papers of the period, as well as a valuable series of ninety-eight letters addressed to "Madame" by her brother, Charles II., and now, by permission of the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, first published in their original form.

PROF. SANDAY'S Bampton Lecture for this year, on "The Early History and Origin of the Doctrine of Biblical Inspiration," will be published in the autumn by Messrs. Longmans.

THE next volume in Murray's series of "University Extension Manuals," edited by Prof. W. Knight, will be Mr. Edmund Gosse's Jacobean Poets—that is to say, the post-Shaksperian dramatists, from Ben Jonson to Massinger, together with such other contemporary poets as Chapman, Donne, Campion, Wither, and Quarles.

MESSRS. OSGOOD, MCLVINE & Co. will publish next week a new novel by Mr. C. F. Keary, entitled The Two Lancrofts.

SIR GEORGE CHESNEY, author of "The Battle of Dorking," will shortly publish a new story entitled The Lesters, through Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

MISS FLORENCE PEACOCK will have ready for publication in the autumn a volume of poems, some of which have already appeared in the ACADEMY.

MR. JOHN MURRAY contemplates adding to his series of red handbooks a volume entirely confined to New Zealand.

Tools for Teachers, a Cyclopaedia of Illustrations, compiled by Mr. William Moodie, is announced for early publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

THE Henry Bradshaw Society will next week issue to its members a facsimile edition of the famous Bangor Antiphoner in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, the collotypes of which have been prepared by Messrs. Griggs; and the following week the Society will distribute an edition of a Barlow Manuscript in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, containing the offices peculiar to the abbot of Evesham, and also a second volume completing the text of the Westminster Missal, the first volume of which has already appeared, and containing photo-lithographs of the music of the Coronation Service. With these works the books promised by the Society up to the present time will have been issued, including those of the current year.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON will issue in the autumn a new edition, with illustrations, of Miss Olive Schreiner's Story of an African Farm.

WE have received the prospectus of yet another book in Lancashire dialect, the collected works of "Th' Owd Weighver," to be published by Mr. James Clegg, of Rochdale.

Holidays in England, by Mr. Percy Lindley, an illustrated handbook for American travellers by the new route from Liverpool to London, through East Anglia, is in the press. The book will be published simultaneously in New York and London.

AN illustrated history of the Cunard Line, entitled, The Cunard Line and the World's Fair, Chicago, 1893, is nearly ready for publication by the Electrotype Company.

MESSRS. HODDER BROTHERS announce a work entitled Up and Down the Thames: from Hampton Court to the Sea, fully illustrated with views, maps, &c., and containing a description of all objects of interest on either bank of the river.

SIGNORE ULISSE ORTENSII, the translator of Poe's poems into Italian, has in the press a translation of the poems of Burns, to which will be prefixed a preface in English by Mr. John Muir.

ON Monday, July 31, Mr. Gilbert Dalziel will publish the first number of Quips, a half-penny story paper for all ages, sexes, and sizes. It will contain the opening chapters of three serials, written by Paul Meritt, Clo. Graves, and H. T. Johnson.

"THE GERMAN ARMY BILL," by Dr. Karl Blind, is the title of an essay, partly military, partly political, which will appear in the August number of the United Service Magazine.

THE Queen has accepted a copy of Mr. Allardyce's romance Balmoral, reviewed in the ACADEMY of this week, and has conveyed her thanks to the author.

MAX O'RELL (M. Paul Blouët), after a two years' tour round the world, including America, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, was to sail by the Mexican from Cape Town on July 19, arriving in England on August 7. During the tour Max O'Rell has given 425 comedy-lectures.

WHAT we believe to be the last important book-sale of the season was to begin on Thursday of this week, when a number of different collections will be dispersed by Messrs. Sotheby. First comes the library of Bishop Stortford School, consisting largely of black-letter books, in poor condition. We have not noticed any Caxtons; but there are several Wynkyn de Wordes, the St. Alban's Chronicle, quite a number of rare but imperfect Bibles, Cranmer's copy of the Greek Testament of Erasmus, the editio princeps of Euclid (Venice, 1482), bound collections of injunctions and special forms of prayer, Hakluyt, Purchas, &c. Whatever the history of this library may be, it can hardly have been formed for the benefit of the boys. The collection of "a dignity of the church" is less notable, though it does include some good Ruskins. The second day opens with the library of the late Dr. Brinsley Nicholson, who was not only a great Shaksperian scholar but also interested in the philology of South Africa. Then follows the "property of a lady," who possessed a number of the holograph MSS. of Southey. The rest of the catalogue shows less character, but contains greater rarities. It includes Byron's portable writing table; a collection of Tennysonianiana, including the original draft of the closing lines of "The Passing of Arthur," and the Chancery bill of complaint against J. C. Hotten, filed July 30, 1862; the MS. of Swinburne's French verses to Adah Menken; an extra-illustrated copy of Percy Fitzgerald's David Garrick, with portraits, play-bills, and autograph letters; as well as many of the modern illustrated books which are most sought after at the present time.

MR. EDWARD STANFORD has been permitted to reprint, from the Admiralty chart, a sketch map of the area covered by the naval manoeuvres now being conducted around Ireland, with the "forbidden belt" clearly marked. The coast-line assigned to the opposing fleets is coloured blue and red, and the names of the several ships are printed in the margin. As is always the case with charts, the figures for soundings seem to invert the relative importance of land and sea; while, according to some strange principle, Ireland is made to look more mountainous throughout than Wales.

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK have published a "Guide Map" of Scotland, by W. & A. K. Johnston, "for tourists." It is really a large-scale hydrographical map, with the rivers, lochs, bays, &c., beautifully marked in blue. To this have been added (in black) the railways, the chief mountain summits, and the tourist resorts, together with occasional items of information; but there is no shading or contour-lines.

IN the current number of the Historical Review (Longmans), Mr. S. R. Gardiner has a note upon the familiar phrase "member of parliament." The earliest instance that he can find of it as referring to the House of Commons alone is in the order-book of the Council of State, under the date of June 27, 1650. Previously it was used as a common designation of the members of both houses. Mr. Gardiner, therefore, thinks that its use in the present sense arose after the execution of Charles I., when the House of Commons declared itself to be "the Parliament":

"Getting into vogue, it was retained after the Restoration for members of the House of Commons taken singly, when men had forgotten that it could only be fitly used by those who were resolved to govern 'without a king or house of lords.'"

HYMNUS WICCAMICUS.

[THE following is the text of the Latin hymn which was sung in "Chamber Court" at Winchester, at the five-hundredth anniversary of the opening of the College of St. Mary of Winchester, on Tuesday, July 25. We trust that we are violating no confidences in adding that the hymn was written by the Bishop of Salisbury.]

"Gaudete pubes Wiccami, Gaudete, cantantes Deo,
Qui quinque nos per saecula
Hunc in diem servaverit.

"Dei datoris omnium
Confusus ille gratia,
Christo Mariae filio
Hoc obtulit Collegium.

"Exinde forti examine Robusta proles Wiccami.
Ivit, rediit, exiit
Ecclesiam redintegrans.

"Quis filiorum Wiccami
Renuntiabit nomina?
Hos ara, castra praedicant
Forum, senatus, curia.

"Proles futura Wiccami,
Ne sit prioris degener!
Fide manente pristina Fides manebit Numinis.

"Hic lecta plebs Scholarium, Immixta Commensalibus,
Severa vitae munera Obire discat invicem.

"Cantate pubes Wiccami, Cantate, laudantes Deum,
Qui quinque nos per saecula
Fideliter servaverit."

OBITUARY.

H. D. DARBISHIRE.

BY the sudden and untimely death, from pleurisy, on July 18, of Mr. H. D. Darbishire, fellow of St. John's College, Indo-European etymology loses one out of the small band of younger Cambridge philologists on whom its future advancement in Great Britain seems now mainly to depend. He was only thirty years of age.

Herbert Dukinfield Darbishire was a native of Belfast. He took his degree in 1888, obtaining a first class in two sections of Part II. of the Classical Tripos. The dissertation which he then sent in, afterwards published in the Cambridge Philological Society's Transactions, under the title of "Notes on the Spiritus Asper in Greek," was a very remarkable performance: especially noteworthy was the way in which it used hitherto unobserved coincidences in Greek and Armenian, of the spiritus lenis to Armenian y, and of the spiritus asper to Armenian v, to distinguish two different v's in the parent language. All his contributions to the Classical Review, and other learned publications, showed the same acuteness of vision and freshness of treatment.

He was no mere etymologist. He had a broad interest in all literary studies. In almost the last letter which I received from him, he made the ingenious and fruitful suggestion that in a corrupt passage of Propertius, ii. 20-30, "Atque inter Tityi uolucres mea poena uagetur," inter has been corrupted from iecur.

Mr. Darbishire was an excellent teacher; and it was a matter of some regret when he left us for the Bar, though there is no question that his acumen and subtlety admirably qualified him for that profession.

Mr. Darbishire, as all his friends can testify, was a man of a singularly modest and amiable character. His loss makes us sadly feel, in the words of Horace, "neque candidiores Terra tulit neque quis me sit deuincior alter." His death was not without its touch of pathos. It took place in college, in the rooms of an undergraduate which he was occupying temporarily, in the presence of a medical friend who had only just come in to attend him.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Euskul-Erria of San Sebastian in its recent numbers has some interesting extracts from the archives of the towns of Guipuzcoa. From Zumaya we have an example, December 17, 1702, of the election of the parochial clergy by the people. In May 31, 1704, and subsequently, of the nomination of a Freira or Seror, a kind of deaconess, or sextoness, to lead the devotions of the women, to marshal them in processions and at funerals. These Serores, as we learn from de Lancree, were sometimes regarded as a kind of beneficent or white witches. At Zumarraga, June 14, 1733, rules are established for the town conjurador, or exorcist, to follow in order to make his exorcisms on stormy days (para hacer los conjuros los dias de tempestad). A successor is appointed, April 16, 1754, from among several benefited candidates (entre los señores Beneficiados solicitantes); but on April 28, the vicar protests because the Chapter had no voice in the matter; the Council, however, maintain their appointment. In 1684, and in 1755, a medical man is appointed jointly for Villareal and Zumarraga, to be paid by a tax on wine; but in the latter year the freeholders of Zumarraga successfully protest against any increase of this tax. In 1416 the guardians of Juan II., of Castille, attempt to impose a tax on Guipuzcoa, in aid of the war against the Moors. The town of Mondragon alone paid it, and was forthwith disenfranchised, and excluded from the Junta of Guipuzcoa, and declared ipso facto to have lost its privileges of nobility (hidalguia) and of freedom. The town accordingly petitions the Queenmother to declare that the Act is no precedent, and does not impair its rights and privileges. It is an instance of the way in which the Basques, both French and Spanish, clung to their privilege of paying their subsidies in a lump sum only, voted as a free gift to the king. The distribution and levying of the tax were retained in the hands of the Provinces and the Municipalities. The general constitution and liberties of the Basque Provinces are well known; but particular instances of their mode of defence against violations are less common.

THE ORIGIN OF THE PETER-GOSPEL.

I.

THE superlative importance of the Peter-Gospel as a factor in New Testament criticism is now so widely recognised that no apology is necessary for the ensuing text-to-text examination.

Was pseudo-Peter directly acquainted with our canonical gospels? Did he make use of those earlier gospels, behind the canonical, which so many students of the synoptic problem desiderate for its solution? Had he access to any independent tradition? These are the questions which the examination is designed to answer.

But first of all as to pseudo-Peter's date. That this date was very early is now generally admitted. Justin Martyr, writing in the middle of the second century, shows evident signs of acquaintance; and though theological prepossessions have led one or two hyper-orthodox divines to call his quotations in question, yet, so far as the critical world is concerned, they sing to the deaf. Justin's use of the Peter-Gospel is practically settled. But there is far earlier evidence than Justin's. The Peter-Gospel is presupposed, we can now see, in another Docetic work—the Vision of Isaiah—which Dillmann and Deane are disposed to place as early as A.D. 110. More than a decade or two later it can scarcely be. For pseudo-Isaiah wrote at a period when the date of the second advent still furnished a subject for "fierce dispute." He speaks of contention between "pastors" and "presbyters," but makes no mention of ἐπισκοποι. His Gnosticism is obviously anterior to the complex aeon-system of Valentine. And he speaks of "prophecy" as still surviving. At the latest then, he, at any rate, is far earlier than Justin.

Pseudo-Isaiah gives us three angels at the sepulchre (the angel of the Christian Church in heaven who will show the blast of judgment, the angel of the Holy Spirit, and the Archangel Michael). They visibly descend, all three. And Christ issues from the sepulchre with the support of more than one, "on the shoulders of the seraphim." This is decisive. Among minor coincidences we may notice that pseudo-Isaiah attributes the crucifixion to the Jews (cf. "the torture with which the children of Israel shall torture Him"); they are said to deliver Christ "to the king," i.e., Herod; the offence of the Twelve lasts while Christ is in the sepulchre; the Blessed Virgin is reckoned, as by Justin, as being herself of Davidic descent; and the interval between the Resurrection and Ascension is fixed at 545 days (Ascensio Isaiae ed. Dillmann, pp. 13, 43, 53, 57). Of this last point, more presently.

I come now to a second authority, the "Epistle of Barnabas" a composition which critics generally find it difficult to place elsewhere than in the reign of Nerva (A.D. 96-98), and which, they are agreed, is at any rate prior to the revolt of Bar-Cocheba, A.D. 131. The author of the Epistle tells us that Christ was offered vinegar and gall while on the cross; that while he was on the cross "Israel was falling" (πίπτοντος τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ); that after His death the people—as distinguished from the priests—"fasted and mourned" (τοῦ λαοῦ νηστεύοντος καὶ κοιτομένου). He apparently attributes the whole guilt of Christ's death to the Jews directly: "In that day they shall see Him with a scarlet robe, and say, 'Is not this He whom we once despised and pierced and mocked and crucified?'" And surely his statement that Christ came ἵνα τὸ τέλειον τῶν ἀμειρημάτων ἀνακεφαλαιώσῃ, and ἵνα τελεωθῶσι τοῖς ἀμαρτήμασι is a reminiscence of pseudo-Peter's ἐτελείωσαν κατὰ τῆς κεφαλῆς αὐτῶν τὰ ἀμαρτήματα. To this it may be added that twice Barnabas's additions to the canonical narrative are paralleled by authorities whose obligation to pseudo-Peter is indisputable. I have recently pointed out in the Athenaeum (May 13) that Lactantius and the Edessan writers fall in this category. Now the former apparently re-echoes the saying attributed to Christ in the Epistle, that we must obtain the kingdom "by tribulation and suffering" (vide Resch's Agrapha, p. 100). And the Edessan statement that Christ remained on earth fifty days after the Resurrection, and ascended on a Sunday, is remarkably coincident with Barnabas's idea that "on the eighth day Christ rose again, and, having manifested Himself, ascended." It may be noticed, too, that this figure, "50," offers, in conjunction and confusion with the canonical "40," a ready explanation of pseudo-Isaiah's curious "545."

Alongside with the "Vision of Isaiah" and the "Epistle of Barnabas" may, perhaps, be placed those "Acts of Pilate," by which Justin corroborates certain statements drawn from the Peter-Gospel. The Acts indeed to which Justin primarily appeals are merely hypothetical documents, such as he believed the state archives would be found to contain; but the definiteness and explicitness of his appeal suggest that he made it with what he believed to be authentic copies in his hand. Such supposititious copies are forthcoming: they quote from the Peter-Gospel largely, as I have shown in the Athenaeum article above referred to; and though dating in their present form only from the fourth century, or the fifth, yet, as Tischendorf showed, and from certain Edessan references, there are strong grounds for suspecting the existence of some very early prototype. Setting aside these Acts, however, still the evidence of St. Justin, of the "Vision of Isaiah," and of the "Epistle of Barnabas," makes it clear that pseudo-Peter cannot have written later than the third decade of the second century, and leaves us wondering whether he may not have written as early as A.D. 96. The importance therefore of determining his exact relationship to our canonical gospels is simply incalculable.

For simplicity's sake I will prefix the conclusion to which I believe the phenomena point. That pseudo-Peter had in his hands the primitive gospels out of which the canonical gospels were composed, and had the canonical gospels also, but no independent tradition whatever. I shall endeavour to show that his work, however warped, represents on the whole a bona fide attempt to describe events as the writer believed, and, circumstanced as he was, was more or less justified in believing, that they actually happened. One certainly puts the Peter-Gospel down—after the first perusal—with a clear conviction that the author was no romancer like the authors of the Infancy Gospels. The Christ whom he describes is a Christ in whom he believes. And this being so, one does not expect to find, on further examination, that he treated his authorities wantonly.

As a preliminary we may clear out of the way those extra-canonical details for which the canonical narrative supplies a ready hint, or which obviously have their source in Old Testament prophecy. Any reader could draw the inference that at the ninth hour "the sun shone out again." When we hear that on Saturday the guarded tomb attracted a good many visitors, does not thus arise from a too literal adhesion to ὅτι ταβύτων, Matthew xxviii. 1? When Mary Magdalene starts for the sepulchre with the intention of embalmment, and, if unable to gain admission, of casting down the unguents at the door, surely the writer has realised the difficulty of reconciling one narrative which represents the sepulchre as sealed and guarded, with another in which the women anticipate no difficulty of entry. The thunderclaps at the Resurrection and the lightning accompaniment are borrowed from Psalm xvi., and the same source supplies the idea that Christ issued from the sepulchre with the support of angels. The intention imputed to the Jews of testing Christ's power by their outrages is apparently drawn from Isaiah iii. 10 (LXX.) and Wisdom ii. 10, &c. Under the influence of Isaiah lviii. 2, the challenge to prophesy, "Prophecy unto us who is he that smote Thee?" is changed into "Judge righteously." And Herod and Pilate sit side by side—obviously pseudo-Peter wrote at a period when the prophecies of the Old Testament were more sacred than any gospel text—in conformity with Psalm ii. 2. cf. Acts iv. 26-28. Such additions to and deviations from the canonical narrative, with their genealogy written on their face, have of course no structural importance; but it is necessary to my plan that the explanation of pseudo-Peter's peculiarities should be full and complete.

Nor need we discuss at much length, as a separate question, pseudo-Peter's direct acquaintance with our canonical gospels. For his coincidences with all and each are obvious. It is only his deflections that have caused serious difficulty in admitting his indebtedness. And if I can succeed in tracking these deflections to a source in the gospels behind the canonical, the objection to his acquaintance with the latter disappears. With the materials to hand out of which our canonical gospels were composed, he would sometimes feel himself in a position to go behind the canonical text and substitute inferences and adaptations of his own for those of his predecessors. The only question that remains is, whether his use of the same material as our canonical evangelists furnishes by itself adequate explanation of the coincidences. And this question, of course, can be answered in the negative or affirmative, according to the scheme of gospel formation adopted. It is sufficient for me to mention here:

Firstly, that pseudo-Peter shows evident signs of acquaintance with Luke xxiv. and St. Luke's Gospel is as I have endeavoured to show in my book, "Formation of the Gospels,"—posterior to St. Matthew and St. Mark. Just as the two angels of Luke xxiv. appear to be due to St. Luke's failure to identify the angel of Matthew xxviii. with the differently described angel of Mark xvi., so pseudo-Peter fails to identify that angel with either of St. Luke's. He gives us three angels, first, the two of the Third Gospel, and then the single angel of the First and Second.

Secondly, that pseudo-Peter adopts the Johannine date of the Passover, moreover in especial connexion with the entombment (*ὁ Ἡρώδης ἔφη· εἰ καὶ μὴ τις αὐτὸν ᾔδει, ἡμεῖς αὐτὸν ἐθάψαμεν, ἐπεὶ καὶ ταβύτων ἐπιφώσκει· καὶ παρέδωκεν αὐτὸν τῷ λαῷ πρὸς μᾶς τῶν ἱερέων, τῆς ἑορτῆς αὐτῶν, cf. John xix. 31); and there is not the slightest hint in the synoptic gospels that any primitive evangelist anticipated the author of the Fourth Gospel in this peculiarity. But the following estimate of pseudo-Peter's position will not be clear unless it be further premised that he did not regard the Fourth Gospel as of primitive authority. To us the Fourth Gospel is an entity and an original in a far higher degree than the synoptic gospels. But we shall find that pseudo-Peter regarded it as dependent,* in great measure at any rate, on the other documents which he held in his hands. Consequently, pseudo-Peter's deflections from the Fourth Gospel are especially striking and impressive, so much so, in fact, that one almost wonders whether the deviation is not partly designed. Was the Gospel of Peter written to rival the Gospel of St. John?—the docetism of the one, a counterblast to the anti-docetism of the other? In the Gospel of Peter St. John is seen neither at the cross, nor at the tomb, nor on the Lake of Tiberias.

Starting the analysis, then:

Pseudo-Peter throws the whole guilt of Christ's death on to the Jews, and acquits the Romans. Herod, not Pilate, pronounces sentence; Herod's soldiers, not Pilate's, mock and crucify. Consequently, the derisive title takes the form "King of Israel," and the three hours' darkness extends "over Judea alone," for Judea alone is guilty. He will not have it that those holy women who attended Christ refrained from performing the proper offices for the dead in deference to the obsolete law of the Sabbath: they refrain in consequence of the murderous hostility of the Jews, and come to the sepulchre while it is "yet dark" in order to escape detection. He corrects the bad idea of Pilate's character which might be conveyed by τολμήσας, "Joseph went in boldly" (Mark xv. 43), telling us that Joseph was "friend of the Lord and of Pilate." When Joseph enters, Pilate does not demur, but is obliged to refer to Herod, as he has entirely freed himself from all responsibility. Similarly, as to the coup de grâce, the σκληροκοπία, not given, according to John xix. 31-33, because Christ had expired during the interval in which the Jews went to ask Pilate's permission. But the soldiers, according to pseudo-Peter, are Jews in full authority, and have no need to repair to Pilate. Consequently, another and an immediately operative reason must be found why the mercy-stroke was not delivered. He therefore alleges a desire to protract Christ's agony. Lastly, we hear nothing of the disgraceful bribe by which the mouth of the Roman guards was stopped; but, on the contrary, they make a full report to Pilate immediately, and only keep silence in obedience to legitimate orders.

It is pretty clear from the above that pseudo-Peter wrote with a strong anti-Judaic bias. The canonical narrative appears racked and distorted. Pseudo-Peter bewrays himself by his awkwardness. But it does not necessarily follow that he perverted his authorities (assuming them to be such as I have suggested) consciously. For example, one instinctively prefers the motive for the Saturday rest alleged in Luke xxiii. 56—"they rested according to the commandment"—to pseudo-Peter's; but the motive alleged in Luke xxiii. is probably St. Luke's own commentary on Mark xvi. 1, 2, and, if so, a later evangelist, while admitting the fact that the women rested, might feel justified in accounting for the fact otherwise. So, again, as to the attitude of Joseph to Pilate. If an earlier narrative behind Mark xv. 43 (cf. Matt. xxvii. 58) had no τολμήσας, pseudo-Peter might feel justified in substituting an inference of his own.

A loop-hole for pseudo-Peter's version of the guard story is left by Matt. xxviii.—"certain (τινές) of the guard came to the Chief Priests." Where did the rest go? Pseudo-Peter arrives at the conclusion that they repaired to Pilate, by identifying the incidents related in Matt. xxvii. 51-54 with those related in Matt. xxviii. 2-4. In the former passage we read: "The earth did quake, and many bodies came out of their graves after His resurrection; and the centurion and they that were watching (τηρουντες) Jesus feared exceedingly, saying, 'Truly this was the Son of God.'" In the latter passage we hear of the earthquake at the sepulchre: "There was a great earthquake, and the watchers (τηρουντες) did quake, and became as dead men." It is easy to see that if pseudo-Peter found these two passages in different documents—it must be remembered that the "doublets" have furnished more than one Gospel critic with a principle of disintegration—and, moreover, believed that the text of the former was prior to the parallel passage in Mark xv. 39, where the centurion's exclamation is attributed to his having been impressed by the manner of Christ's death, he might feel justified in referring to one and the same occasion narratives which a canonical evangelist has distinguished. As the case stood, he was bound to do so; for, as said above, he had made Herod's soldiers crucify, not Pilate's, and, consequently, room for the centurion could only be found at the sepulchre. Accordingly, it is there that he finds the cause of the centurion's pious exclamation, "Truly this was the Son of God." Possibly in further making the centurion and his comrades refer to Pilate, pseudo-Peter had Mark xv. 44, 45 in sight, where the centurion reports to Pilate the fact of the Lord's death—presumably, too, the marvels by which it was accompanied—for if the centurion was present at the sepulchre and not at the Cross, his interview with Pilate had to be postponed. Possibly pseudo-Peter was readier to manipulate Mark xv. 44, 45, on the ground of its being an addition not found in the earlier narrative (cf. Matt. xxvii. 58); or it may be that in the earlier narrative there was some ambiguity as to the time and purpose of the interview, which the canonical narrative does not reproduce.

Lastly, we come to the most important fact of all—the transference of guilt from Pilate and his Roman soldiers to Herod and the Jews. Pilate washes his hands and withdraws, leaving the entire responsibility to Herod. Herod pronounces sentence, and his men of war, after mocking Christ, carry it into execution. Now, prima facie this departure appears wholly and absolutely unjustifiable. The four canonical evangelists agree in making the crucifiers Romans. And in Luke xxiii. 15 we are explicitly told that Herod acquitted Christ—"No, nor hath Herod found any fault in Him, for he hath sent Him back to us."

But in the first place it must not be forgotten that both in Matt. xxvii. and Mark xv. there are several signs of a dual narrative. One account may have called attention especially to the Roman outrages, the other to the Jewish. Notice how Jewish and Roman outrages alternate and somewhat impede one another; for example, how the Roman offer of vinegar on a reed and (v. r.) the spear-thrust interrupt the cry "Eli" and the jibe, obviously from Jewish lips, "Elias." No doubt is really left as to the agency of Roman soldiers all through, yet the differences between St. Matthew and St. Mark, and the various readings, suggest that an earlier document behind may have been slightly ambiguous. It is only in St. Matthew that the Praetorian soldiers are specified as "the governor's." One authority makes the hall into which they lead Christ the High Priest's. Another makes Pilate deliver Jesus to the Jews—"Then delivered he Jesus unto them that they might crucify Him."

And in the second place, the passage in which "No, nor Herod" occurs seems to be expressed entirely in St. Luke's special style. The phraseology is paralleled in the last part of Acts. May it not be then that "No, nor Herod" was merely an inference of St. Luke's own? Without it one might interpret Herod's act, not as an acquittal, but merely a concession of jurisdiction. And this would attune better with Luke xii. 31—"Herod seeketh to kill thee"—and with Acts iv. 27, 28—"Of a truth in this city against thy holy servant Jesus, both Herod and Pilate were gathered together to do whatsoever thy hand pre-ordained." Pseudo-Peter, if he had St. Luke's authorities in his hands, would not necessarily feel himself bound by St. Luke's treatment of them. But how comes it that pseudo-Peter brings Herod's agency down to the very end? According to Luke xxiii., Herod has nothing more to do with Christ after the remission, and some portion at any rate of the subsequent trial before Pilate appears to be derived from the same independent authority, e.g., "I will chastise Him and release Him" (contrast Mark xv. 15), as the preceding narrative. Pseudo-Peter found his justification, I suppose, in identifying the mockery by Herod's soldiers with the mockery by Pilate's—the "gorgeous apparel" with the "purple robe," and accepting the chronology of St. Matthew and St. Mark. And so we find him making the παλαβόρες of Matt. xxvii. 27, consequent to a command of Herod's. This explains, too, why pseudo-Peter connects the delivery to Herod with Pilate's ablution.

CIVIL LIST PENSIONS.

THE following list of all pensions granted during the year ended June 20, 1893, and charged upon the Civil List, has just been issued:—

Mr. William Smyth Rockstro, in consideration of his services in musical literature and of his inadequate means of support, £100; Mrs. Cashel Hoey, in consideration of her literary merits and of her inadequate means of support, £50; Mrs. Emilie Dittmar, in consideration of the services to chemical science rendered by her late husband, Prof. William Dittmar, £75; Miss Lucy Mary Jane Garnett, in recognition of her literary merits and to enable her to prosecute her researches in Oriental folk lore, £100; Mr. Robert Brown, jun., in consideration of his merits as a student of archaeology, £100; Dr. Samuel Davidson, in recognition of the value of his works on theology and biblical criticism, £100; the Rev. Richard Morris, in recognition of his merits as a student of early English literature and philology, £150; Miss Margaret Stokes, in consideration of her researches into early Christian art and archaeology in Ireland, £100; Mr. John Gwenogvryn Evans, to enable him to continue his researches in Welsh literature, £200; Mrs. Cornelia Minto, in consideration of the literary merits of her husband, the late Prof. Minto, and of her inadequate means of support, £75; Mrs. Annie S. C. Rogers, in recognition of the merits of her husband, the late Prof. Thorold Rogers, as a writer upon political economy, £50; Mrs. Thérèse Wolstenholme, in consideration of the merits of her husband, the late Rev. Joseph Wolstenholme, as a mathematician and of her straitened circumstances, £50; Mrs. Frances E. Trollope, in consideration of the literary merits of her husband, the late Thomas Adolphus Trollope, and of her narrow means, £50; total £1200.

On comparing this list with those of some recent years, it will be observed that learning receives more recognition than literature; and that the plea of poverty is less prominent.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE "EDINBURGH REVIEW" ON THE TEL EL-AMARNA TABLETS.

Queen's College, Oxford: July 27, 1893.

For the sake of English oriental learning, I must raise a protest against the inaccuracy and charlatanism of the article published in the current number of the Edinburgh Review on the "Tell Amarna Tablets" (sic). I leave other scholars to deal with the blunders that have been committed in it with regard to themselves, and confine myself to the few cases in which my own name is mentioned. In every case except one (on p. 26) the statements made regarding me are incorrect:

(1) The tablets of which I am said, on p. 4, to have made "transcripts"—whatever that may mean—never were "at Boulak"; the copies which I made at Boulak have never been published, but will be found, if examined, to agree substantially with those made by Dr. Winckler, except where the latter scholar has inadvertently omitted some of the lines of the originals.

(2) I have never stated that the Khabiri were "Babylonians." On the contrary, in numerous publications I have maintained that they were not, and have tried to explain who they really were. Consequently, there is no warrant for the reviewer's assertion that "Dr. Sayce's grasp of the political conditions seems to be insufficient, since he is led to suppose that the Khabiri . . . were Babylonians."

(3) I have never called my translations of the Tel el-Amarna tablets in the fifth volume of the new series of the Records of the Past

"tentative," nor has anyone else hitherto called them so. The assertion first appears in the following passage of the reviewer's article:

"As for renderings which do not follow the rules of common sense and good grammar, they can only be compared to the famous school translation, Triste lupus stabulis, 'The sorrowful wolf in the stable.' A very flagrant instance occurs in a passage of which Dr. Sayce has offered what has been called a 'tentative' translation, as follows:—'If thou art a servant of the king in verity, why dost thou not eat his stomach before the king.' As regards this rendering, it is natural to ask—first, was it a custom of the ancients in civilised countries to eat the stomachs of ruling men in the royal presence? Second, how was this operation performed? Third, what was its object? Fourth, was the viand eaten raw, or if not, how was it cooked? The real meaning of the passage is, according to Major Conder, 'Wherefore is his cutting off lawful in the sight of the king thy lord?' The right of the former translator to speak with authority may perhaps, therefore, be regarded as doubtful."

Unfortunately for the reviewer, the Assyrian words which are here in question are all well known. Akûlu means "to eat" not "to be lawful," karzi is "a fragment of flesh" or "stomach," and su is the pronoun of the third person. The phrase is also a well-known Semitic one, and actually occurs, word for word, in two passages of the Old Testament (Dan. iii. 8, vii. 25).

Before presuming to write on a subject like that of the Tel el-Amarna Tablets, the reviewer ought to have acquainted himself, to some extent at least, with the languages of the Hebrew Scriptures. That he should understand Assyrian is perhaps too much to expect. His knowledge, indeed, of this latter language is gauged by the assertion that "Khabiri would be written more correctly 'Abiri!'"

BASQUES AND BERBERS.

Sittington Rectory, York: July 25, 1893.

The ancient Iberian skull greatly resembles that of the Berbers. This fact has suggested to Prof. Von der Gabelentz the probability of a connexion between Basque and Berber speech, and he has published a paper on the subject in the Transactions of the Berlin Academy for June.

Unfortunately for the theory, we cannot identify the Basques and the Iberians. Van Eys and Vinson agree in the opinion that the language of the Iberians did not belong to the Basque class; while Broca has shown that, though the skulls of the Spanish Basques resemble to some extent those of the Iberians and of the Berbers, the skulls of the French Basques belong to a different type. The probability is that the race to which the French Basques belong imposed its language on the Spanish Basques, a people of the Iberian type, who at the same time received a tincture of Basque blood. The philological researches of Prof. Von der Gabelentz tend to establish this conclusion. The resemblances which he has discovered between Basque and Berber speech are just what we should expect in the case of a conquered people acquiring the language of their conquerors. Basque and Berber agree in certain phonetic tendencies; and they share a few culture words, chiefly the names of animals and articles of dress. Iberian, in short, may have affected Basque in the same way that Celtic has affected French and English.

We may, therefore, adhere to the old conclusion, that in the more essential points the affinities of Basque are with the languages of the Ural-Altaic class, which are totally different from the Berber languages, which belong rather to the Hamitic family.

ISAAC TAYLOR.

"THE LORD" IN THE GOSPEL OF PETER.

London: July 21, 1893.

A remarkable fact in relation to the recently discovered fragment has not yet, so far as I am aware, received the attention it deserves. I refer to the total absence of the name "Jesus," and the frequent employment of the title "the Lord." Though "the Son of God" is sometimes used, "the Lord" is pre-eminently the name of Christ throughout the sixty verses (according to Harnack's division) of which the fragment is composed. A comparison of the parallel portion in the canonical gospels shows a very remarkable difference. Having, now many years ago, given a good deal of time and attention to the manner in which the New Testament writers employ the title "the Lord," the use of the same title in the new fragment has some special interest for me; but it is scarcely to be contested that the matter is in itself one of no small importance. To account decisively for the fact adverted to may not be easy, but suggestions tending towards a solution may yet be offered.

The identification of the fragment with the long lost apocryphal gospel of Peter has been determined mainly by the account given in Eusebius of the relations between the church at Rhossus, a place on the Cilician coast, and Serapion, bishop of Antioch at the commencement of the third century. On visiting Rhossus, Serapion found no serious cause for anxiety on the score of heresy. There would appear to have been some differences with regard to a gospel bearing the name of Peter, which was in use in the church, but this at the time Serapion had not read. Subsequently he learned that a certain heresy had taken root at Rhossus: a heresy which he connects with the name of Marcianus, against whose doctrine is brought the charge of inconsistency and contradiction. Serapion, therefore, obtained a copy of the gospel from the Docetae, who were much addicted to its use: he went through it, and found that, though very much of it was in accordance with the teaching of orthodoxy, there were nevertheless some modifications or additions which were objectionable, and of these he subjoined a list, which, unfortunately, has not come down to us.

The probability of the identification may be conceded, and it is likely enough that the Docetae, or a portion of them, endeavoured to draw from the Gospel of Peter arguments on behalf of their peculiar tenets; but there is no small difficulty in the way of admitting that this gospel had a Docetic origin, and that its author regarded the Incarnation or the body of Christ as a mere seeming, devoid of reality. On the contrary, it would appear that in his view the body itself when dead, and removed from the cross, still possessed a divine potency, for, on its being laid on the ground, the earth itself shook (ἡ γῆ πάσα ἐσεισθη). And some other details, which have been taken as evidence of Docetism, may be explained in a different manner.

The allusion to Marcion (if, as seems probable, he is to be identified with Serapion's Marcianus) is important and suggestive. The authority to which Marcion appealed was St. Paul; and it is regarded as one of the assured results of modern criticism that Marcion's gospel was formed out of that one of the Synoptics which had a specially Pauline tendency, namely, the Gospel of St. Luke. Now St. Luke's Gospel is distinguished by the comparative frequency with which it designates Christ as "the Lord"; and no careful student of St. Paul's Epistles can need to be reminded of the emphatic manner in which the apostle proclaimed the doctrine that Jesus is "the Lord," a name which he evidently used as even of divine dignity (comp. e.g., 1 Cor. ii. 8; Phil. ii. 9-11). Now the heresy afterwards connected with Sabellianism had not improbably an origin equally early with that of Gnosticism itself. Without in any way attributing Sabellianism to St. Paul, it is not very difficult to understand how that heresy might engraft itself on the Pauline doctrine concerning Christ as Lord. And something of Docetism might easily associate itself with this Sabellianism. In speaking of "the Lord of glory" it might seem not unreasonable to modify human characteristics. We may thus explain the tranquillity of the Lord when nailed to the cross, as though suffering nothing (ὁ μὴδὲν πόνον ἔχων, Petr. Ev. ver. 10). The divine utterance "My power, my power, thou hast forsaken me," seems entirely in accordance with the view I have suggested, though on comparison with Psal. xxii. it may seem that the divergence from the canonical gospels proceeded from some knowledge of Hebrew. A tendency more or less marked towards Sabellianism would naturally conflict with a desertion by God.

In referring the employment of "the Lord" to Pauline influence exerted directly or indirectly, no difficulty need be felt as to Peter being put forth as the author of the gospel (v. 60). The Pauline influence on the First Epistle of Peter is scarcely to be mistaken, however it may be accounted for.

With regard to the use of the title Kύριος by the Marcionites, I append an extract from Prof. Salmon's article "Marcion" in Smith's Dictionary of Christian Biography. The fact mentioned is interesting and important, even if a later age is referred to than that of our fragment. Prof. Salmon says:—

"An inscription was found not long since which had stood over the doorway of a house in a Syrian village (Le Bas and Waddington, Inscriptions, No. 2558, vol. iii, p. 583) which was as follows: Συναγωγή Μαρκιωνιστῶν κώμης Λεββάων τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ προνοία Παύλου πρεσβυτέρου τοῦ λχ' ἔτους. . . . It is noteworthy that the Marcionites, anti-Jewish as they were, should call their place of meeting by the name of Synagogue."

When I wrote last week, I wrote with only Kemble before me. On referring to Simeon of Durham, I find that he states in no less than four places (Rolls Ed. i. 75. 211, ii. 93. 124) that Æthelstan's gifts to St. Cuthbert were made on his Scotch campaign of 934. At that time the see of St. Cuthbert was located at Chester-le-Street, a fact which was not present to my mind when I wrote.

SCIENCE.

Essay on the Language of the Southern Chins and Its Affinities. By B. Houghton. (Rangoon: Government Printing Press.)

Nor the least valuable of the results of our occupation of Burma has been the gain to linguistic and anthropological science. The scanty materials formerly possessed by European students have been supplemented and corrected, and new light has been shed upon questions of scientific interest by a close study of an important section of mankind. Mr. Houghton's "Essay" is among the first fruits of our increased knowledge of the trans-Indian populations; and we hope that the example he has so admirably set will soon be followed by other members of the Civil Service.

Mr. Houghton is the Deputy-Commissioner at Sandoway, where he has studied the Chin language in the mouths of the people who speak it. These "tame Chins," as he calls them, are a branch of the wild Chins of the hills, who have been forced into the lowlands of Lower Burma, and there brought into contact with Burmese civilisation. They keep pigs, however, partly for the sake of food, partly in the interests of ancestor-worship; and as these pigs are destructive to the gardens of the Burmans, "Chin houses must always be by themselves, and not intermixed with Burman ones."

The Chins are of Tibetan descent, and their language, which Mr. Houghton has reduced to writing, is particularly interesting to the philologist. Like the other languages of the group to which it belongs, it is provided with tones, and scholars will be especially grateful to him for the care with which he has noted them. His system of transliteration, indeed, is remarkably clear, and, unlike so many pioneering attempts of the kind, leaves the reader in no doubt as to the pronunciation of each word.

After a full account of the phonology of the language, in which a strong tendency to aspiration must be noticed, we have a very conveniently arranged grammar, followed by "some idiomatic expressions," and eight pages of conversational sentences; then comes a double vocabulary of Chin-English and English-Chin. In this Mr. Houghton has quoted, for purposes of comparison, words from no less than thirty-eight "cognate" languages, among which he includes Chinese. The comparisons are, of course, only tentative, but may serve as a basis for future research.

The book is provided with several appendices, three of which are of anthropological as opposed to linguistic interest. One of them gives a careful description, with measurements, of the Chin physical type. The fourth, in which the clan or unit of the Chin community is discussed is of special value. The third appendix is philological, and is devoted to the support of Mr. Houghton's belief that a connexion exists between the Burmo-Tibetan languages to which Chin belongs and the Dravidian languages of Southern India. The two languages compared are Chin and Tamil, with both of which Mr. Houghton is acquainted. Doubtless, Mr. Houghton has succeeded in indicating some curious resemblances between the two tongues, the most striking of which are to be found in the verbal forms. The agreement here is certainly remarkable. But when we turn to the vocabulary, we fail to find any similar agreement in the case of such test words as the numerals or the names of the parts of the body. It may, therefore, be questioned whether the resemblances Mr. Houghton believes he has detected between Chin and Tamil are not really due to the fact that he is familiar with the two languages, like the resemblances which have been discovered by missionaries in the Pacific between Hebrew and the Polynesian dialects; and whether similar resemblances could not have been detected between Chin and some other agglutinative language, such as Basque, by a scholar who was thoroughly acquainted with the latter.

At any rate the student of Indo-European phonology will do well to examine the tonic system of Chin. With its three tones—"the short acute, the heavy grave, and the rising"—it presents a remarkable parallel to what must have been the character of primitive Indo-European speech. It is not often that the antiquarian philologist has an opportunity of testing in the actual world of today the hypothetical phonetic peculiarities to which his researches have led him. It is possible that, if he will consent for once to look beyond the limits of the Indo-European family, and see what Chin can teach him, he will obtain a clearer idea not only of what tonic accentuation means, but also of the phonetic changes of which it may be the cause. One fact, in any case, is worth noting. Mr. Houghton tells us that "in the negative voice, and in giving Chin personal names, a particularly low tone of voice is affected, very much the same as that known in Mandarin Chinese as the k'ü, or 'departing' voice." It is curious that in modern English society also the name of a person to whom one is introduced is usually uttered in a "low tone of voice."

CORRESPONDENCE.

TREGGAR'S MAORI-POLYNESIAN COMPARATIVE DICTIONARY.

Nelson, New Zealand: June 12, 1893.

In the ACADEMY of December 31, 1892 (by some accident only lately received), I find a notice of the above-named book, which speaks of it as "a monumental work of which New Zealand may be proud"; and it is said of the author, Mr. Treggar, that he "may claim to be at once the Johnson and the Skeat of the Maori language"; that the Maori words are exhaustively treated; and that "the references are complete and exact." This is high praise, the more especially as no errors or defects are mentioned or suggested.

Will you allow me to make two or three comments in the interest of what I believe to be fair play and genuine learning?

I am not proposing to speak of the mythological part of the book—its best part, I think, and a useful index to the works of Sir George Grey, Dr. Shortland, Mr. J. White, and others—beyond one remark: the author makes no apparent attempt to distinguish between the old traditions and their modern accretions, the outcome of European intercourse.

Your reviewer says nothing of the sources of the book as a Maori dictionary. Mr. Treggar's name alone appears on the title page, yet the work in this aspect is only in a very qualified sense his. The great bulk of the Maori words and definitions—some seven-ninths apparently—are taken bodily, with some alterations not often for the better, from Williams's Dictionary of the New Zealand Language (third edition, by Archdeacon Williams, who, by the way, has since published a fourth edition). The standing advertisement of Mr. Treggar's book claims for it that it contains "the 7000 words with their meanings which have hitherto been included in the authentic lists [sic], but also comprehends some 2000 words (or additional meanings) not supplied in any prior work." Unfortunately the trustworthy part of the book, that taken without alteration from Williams's Dictionary, is not distinguished in the text from the rest—a serious exception to the completeness of the references.

In his "comparative" work the author does not help his reader with any discussion of the structure or grammar of the languages he is comparing, nor even as to the analysis of compound words. He is content to apply the simple but efficacious method which made him famous in New Zealand some years ago, when by its means he proved to the satisfaction of his disciples that the Maori language was an elder sister of the Aryan family: the proof being that many words in those languages, when put in Roman type beside a corresponding number of Maori words, were more or less similar in look and meaning. This may be philology, but not that of Dr. Skeat. The etymological part of the book, I venture to say, has still to be written.

In a somewhat lengthy and detailed criticism of the book, printed here, I have called attention to the foregoing points, and have challenged the accuracy and extent of Mr. Treggar's knowledge of the sounds of the Maori language, of its elementary grammar, and of the meaning of a good many of its most important words, and have given two or three cases where his new words, involving entirely new departures in the grammatical forms of the language, are merely the misprints of previous writers.

I send with this a copy of the criticism I speak of, in case your reviewer should care to see how I support the foregoing statements.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE Royal Society has made a grant to Mr. R. Lydekker, in order to enable him to visit South America, with the object of examining the fossil mammals and birds to be found in the museums there.

THE Smithsonian Institution has subscribed for a table at the Marine Zoological Laboratory at Naples, to be used by American investigators.

MESSRS. LONGMANS announce a book on The Micro-organisms in Water, written by Prof. Percy F. Frankland, of Dundee, and his wife.

WITH the last number of the Internationales Archiv für Ethnographie is issued an appeal for further support, printed in English, and signed by the editorial committee—Prof. Kern and Prof. Schlegel of Leiden, and Dr. Dozy of the Hague. If such support be guaranteed, the publication will hereafter be taken over by the publishing house of Messrs. Brill, though Mr. Trap undertakes to continue his services in the production of the coloured plates, which have been such a special feature of this periodical. The present number contains three of them, illustrating a paper on "Sinhalese Masks," by Dr. Albert Grünwedel, of Berlin. There is also a paper, by Mr. S. K. Kuznezow, of Tomsk, upon the belief in another world and the worship of the dead among the Scheremias.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. announce Scholia Aristophanica: being such Comments and Adscripts to the text of Aristophanes as are preserved in the Codex Ravennas, arranged, emended, and translated by Dr. W. G. Rutherford, headmaster of Westminster.

WE have received the fourth volume of Harvard Studies in Classical Philology (Boston and London: Ginn), which contains Dr. J. C. Rolfe's dissertation on the pseudo-Euripidean tragedy of Rhesus, already noticed in the ACADEMY.

But the article most worthy of attention is that on the Herondas Papyrus, by Mr. J. H. Wright, dealing mainly with palaeographical questions. Treating first of the spaces occasionally found between letters in the MS., which must have been the work of the original scribe, he maintains that they always possess the value of strong interpunctuation. The few exceptions he regards as intended to suggest a slight rhetorical pause. As to the punctuation by dots or points in the line, he attaches less importance to this, partly because dots are used for other purposes, and partly because they may be the arbitrary work of later correctors. Next, dealing with the "short, horizontal line, drawn distinctly, firmly, and usually with full reed," he admits that it may have various values, though he doubts whether it is ever used to designate a long syllable. But its chief use, sixty-three cases in all, is to indicate a change of speaker in the dialogue; and in this function it may be identified with the very ancient sign known as the παράγραφος. This, too, Mr. Wright thinks was inserted by the first hand. Not to be confused with this horizontal line is the short line drawn obliquely, usually from right to left, which is found both in the text and on the margin of the papyrus. This, which Mr. Wright compares with the ὀβελός of Alexandrine criticism, seems to be chiefly used in order to call attention to verses requiring examination for one reason or another. Mr. Wright thus expresses the hypothetical opinions he has been led to form with regard to the early history of the papyrus:

"The scribe had before him, as the original to be copied, a manuscript in which the verses were written line by line, with occasional spacings to indicate punctuation; it was also provided, at least to some extent, with diacritical marks—παράγραφος and the signs ·—but not completely with signs for accent. It was written on the whole legibly, and in a style of writing not differing essentially from that of the papyrus, and exhibited peculiarities of orthography such as prevailed only in late Alexandrine times and afterward. Not to take into consideration the perishableness of papyrus manuscripts when much used, this original could not have been prepared much before the first century B.C., if even as early as that.

"This original manuscript the scribe now copies, with reasonable fidelity, cutting himself a new reed once or twice. In copying, he makes mistakes of various sorts: occasionally he unconsciously changes the Ionic forms of the original into the more familiar Attic forms, and sometimes slightly blunders in his grammar and syntax; here and there he appears to be carrying the thought and not the exact words of the original in his mind, and thus when he writes he unconsciously substitutes a new word for the word first read; of course, he makes mistakes in reading the letters, and occasionally gives us nonsense, and also writes verses metrically impossible.

"Some of his errors he detects just after they have been made; and there he corrects on the spot, either, when possible, by changing the actual forms of the letters, or by drawing his reed across the wrong letters and writing the correct ones just above. In the actual progress of writing the first draft he probably does not copy the παράγραφος, possibly not all the diacritical marks, and certainly not all the accents.

"His draft now completed, he takes it in hand for revision. That the original scribe revised the manuscript, and not another hand, is clear from the handwriting of many of the corrections. At first he carefully collates his copy with the original, and corrects innumerable blunders. It is at this time that he puts in the παράγραφος, and some of the diacritical marks; letters and words to be omitted he now neatly indicates by putting points over them; letters or words to be substituted he now writes in between the lines, just above those that he had mistakenly written. Some of the errors or obscurities in his own written copy he cannot correct from his original—in these instances he dashes an 'obelus' in the margin to mark the verse as one requiring subsequent attention.

"This collation now finished—a hurried collation, since he leaves a number of corrupt passages not only uncorrected, but also unnoticed—he examines the 'obelised' lines in detail, and here for the first time appears to have called in the aid of a second manuscript: i.e., he uses a second manuscript only to correct otherwise obscure passages, not for the purpose of preparing a critical edition. In this second manuscript the accents in particular were more fully given than in his original, and the reading of the text was different in a few places; for the 'obelised' lines in question he adopts the readings and corrections suggested by the [second] manuscript, though occasionally he appears to reject them on second thoughts.

"From the spasmodic way in which the στίγμα are put in, we might infer either that the scribe began to copy these marks while first writing, but soon wearied of the effort and gave it up, only now and then later in the progress of this writing copying a στίγμα; or, what is more probable, that he or another later hand at a subsequent time began, but did not complete, the task of punctuating with the points.

"The manuscript, thus prepared for use, passes into other hands. In its later history, it suffers more or less modification. Errors previously undetected are now corrected (iv. 61, 80, &c.); conjectural emendation is attempted, sometimes unhappily. Readings, interlinear or marginal, are apparently imported from other manuscripts, from Herondaean quotations in other authors, or, in the case of some proverbial expressions, from variant forms in literature or life. The glossator appears with his bits of scholia, very few in number and in abbreviated form."

Finally, Mr. Wright appends excursions on two passages in the text of Herondas. In 1, 55, he would read ἄθ. κτος ἐς Κυθηρίην σφρηγίς.

And he insists upon the space between the two last words as a mark of punctuation, showing that ἄθ. κτος cannot be taken with σφρηγίς. In iii., 24-26, he substitutes Μάδων for Μάδωνο, upon the authority of the scholiast on Theocritus (Id. vii., 125).

We must be content to notice the other contributions to Harvard Studies in Classical Philology more briefly. The first article, by Mr. Albert A. Howard, is on the αὐλός, tibia, or pipe, its various parts, and the modes of playing on it. This is illustrated with photographs of eight examples: four from Pompeii, and four in the British Museum; accurate measurements of them are also given. Mr. Frank W. Nicolson—following the statistical method dear to American scholars—gives tables showing the use of the exclamations hercle, edepol, and ecastor in Plautus and Terence. It appears that all four words together occur more than twice as often in Plautus as in Terence; that hercle is used only by men, and ecastor (with two possible exceptions) only by women; that women preserve the form pol to edepol, and men the reverse; that in Plautus men swear about equally by Hercules and by Pollux, and women about equally by Pollux and by Castor. Under the title "Accentual Rhythm in Latin," Mr. J. B. Greenough traces the history of the Sapphic verse, showing how it changed from its original purely quantitative scheme to an accentual one, as in early Christian hymns; and he even suggests that an anticipation of this change may be found in Horace's occasional neglect of the caesura. Mr. Richard C. Manning deals—again statistically—with the omission of the subject accusative of the infinitive in Ovid. Mr. J. B. Greenough propounds some very ingenious Latin etymologies, all based upon assumed transfers of meaning. For example, he finds the original meaning of auctor in the auctioneer, the man who increases the price; and he thinks that opto is akin to ops, opus, and opera, and originally meant "serve," in a specially religious sense, then "pray," and then "choose." There follows a still more ingenious paper by Mr. Frederic D. Allen on the well known line the description in the Shield of Achilles (Il. x. 501):—

ἔ. φω δ' ἰδομένη ἐπὶ Ἰστροί πεῖραρ ἔλθεσθαι.

This he would translate, quite literally: "and both were hastening to grasp the rope before the umpire." He would also interpret it literally, regarding the grasping of the rope as a symbolical act, typifying an actual bodily contest, and preliminary to a trial before judges—analogous, in short, to the ceremony called manum conserere among the Romans. The "tug of war" occurs elsewhere in Homer more than once; and analogous examples are quoted from among savage tribes.

FINE ART.

ENGRAVINGS AND DRAWINGS by OLD MASTERS.—Messrs. DEPPEZ & GUTKUNST have always on hand a selection of WORKS by the best Masters. Collections arranged, valued, and purchased. Prints and Drawings mounted and framed.—18, Green Street, Charing Cross Road, W.C.

SOME NEW ETCHINGS.

WE have just examined a proof from the all but completed plate which Mr. W. Hole—an Edinburgh painter who during recent years has devoted himself mainly to work with the etching-needle—has been executing for the Royal Association for the Promotion of the Fine Arts in Scotland, as the next presentation work for their members. It renders, on a scale of unusual amplitude—the plate is 28 inches by 15½—the superb Velasquez portrait of the Admiral Adrian Pulido-Pareja, originally in the collection of the Duke of Arcos, and acquired by the National Gallery, from the Earl of Radnor, in 1890. Another version of the picture, with slight alterations in the details of costume, and with a background, showing a naval engagement, added by another hand, is at Woburn Abbey; and a third belonged to the Marquis of Leganés, passed into the possession of the Altamiras, and seems afterwards to have been included in the (now dispersed) Ashton Hall collection. Mr. Hole's method of work as an etcher is admirably adapted for doing justice to the brush-work of Velasquez, and to the general force of presentation that distinguishes that master's art. In his work we have none of the "attitudinising with the line," which has been said—too contemptuously—to characterise the practice of some other dextrous living etchers. In fact, Mr. Hole seems to work rather by spaces than by line; and his plates, seen from a little distance, have an effect recalling that of a forcible mezzotint. His most curious speciality as a reproductive etcher is the exact and literal fidelity with which he renders the surface of his originals—their touches of impasto oil-colour, and their whole system of light and shade. This quality was notably visible in his plate from the "Wood-Cutters" of Millet, and is present, hardly less markedly, in this etching after Velasquez. The production of a plate like the present is a strong proof that the directors of this Northern art association are keeping thoroughly abreast of the times; and its selection indicates that they feel justified in appealing to a distinctly high standard of taste in their subscribers.

A SERIES of four etchings of Great Marlow have just been executed and published by Mr. Trythall Rowe at Vine Cottage, Cookham Dene, and merely as a reminiscence of a charming place upon the Thames, the series, which is issued at no immoderate price, and the "pro:fs" of which are limited to twenty-five copies, should be welcomed by what it is the fashion to describe as "the riparian visitor," who, as a rule, is as unable to sketch as a sailor is to swim. But in truth these etchings of Mr. Trythall Rowe's may be hailed with satisfaction by others than those who spend the month of August in a house-boat; for they are good etchings, in which the etcher has taken careful count of the resources of his art, and has been in his work neither too sketchy nor too elaborate, while in the selection of the scale for his design he has avoided equally the insignificant and cramping size and that "huge plate" which Mr. Whistler rightly tells us is an offence. "From the Towing Path" is the least satisfactory. "Peter Street" is a pretty bit of observant and delicate draughtsmanship. "Shelley's House"—its composition of light and shade—is very well put together. The plate has much of the fascination of an old-world country town. And "The High Street" is a luminous and agreeable dry point, showing the place in the light of a blazing midsummer day, when the awnings are put down over the shop windows, and it is a positive adventure to cross the street.

MR. CHARLES HOLROYD—following in the earlier ways of the great etchers, from Rembrandt to Mr. Whistler—will issue shortly, from his own house in Church-walk, Hampstead, in a convenient portfolio, his series of etchings of the famous monastery of Monte Oliveto: prints which we had occasion to speak of very favourably when they were publicly displayed at the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers last spring. Several of the plates of this series show admirably Mr. Holroyd's decisiveness and delicacy—his most characteristic union of austerity with grace, and style with charm.

THE BRITISH SCHOOL AT ATHENS.

WE quote the following from the Times:

"The Archbishop of Canterbury presided, on July 19, at the annual meeting of the British School at Athens, which was held in the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries, Burlington House. The attendance was unusually large, including Sir Edmund and Lady Monson, Lord Lingen, the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, Mr. Edmund Egerton (British Minister at Athens), Prof. Jebb, Mr. F. C. Penrose, the Provost of Oriel, Prof. Clifford Albutt, Mr. Bywater, Prof. Percy Gardner, Prof. Joseph Mayor, Prof. Alex. Kerr (of Madison University), Mr. Ernest Gardner (the director of the School), Mr. Walter Leaf, Dr. Sandys, Dr. H. A. Holden, and Mr. George A. Macmillan, the hon. secretary.

"The secretary, at the chairman's request, read the report, which stated that the year just ended was rather of quiet progress than of sensational achievement; that the number of students admitted or re-admitted had been fully up to the average; and that the new students were Mr. Robert Carr Bosanquet, of Trinity, Cambridge; Mr. J. M. C. Cheetham, of Christ Church, Oxford; Mr. R. T. G. Mayor, of King's, Cambridge; Mr. J. L. Myres, of New College, Oxford; and Mr. V. W. Yorke, of Trinity, Cambridge. The work at Megalopolis was this year carried to a completion, under the superintendence of Messrs. Bather and Benson, by the clearing out of the Thersilion. This very interesting building and the theatre now presented great attractions to all visitors. No further site for excavation had yet been decided upon; but towards the end of the season a preliminary trial was made on the site of Aegosthena, at the extreme east corner of the Corinthian Gulf. Though little was known of this city in ancient times, the extant walls, which presented a remarkably perfect example of the fortification of probably the fifth century, sufficed to show that it was a place of no little importance. The School had, as in former years, been visited by many English travellers, and had been found of practical value in supplying them with information and guidance. Special mention was due to a visit paid by the Princess of Wales, together with the King and Queen of Greece and other members of her family. Mr.

gerton, the British Minister, and other members of the Legation had shown a particularly active interest in the work of the School, both in Athens and in other parts of Greece. The relations of the School with the other foreign institutes in Athens and with the Greek archaeological authorities continued to be most friendly. The committee once more urged upon all who were interested in the matter to use their utmost efforts to secure either substantial donations or annual subscriptions towards the support of the School.

"In moving the adoption of the report, the chairman said that the excavation of Megalopolis was a work about which our fathers would have gone wild with delight. It was a vast city, and embodied one of the most perfect theoretical constitutions which ever existed. The theory was translated into the most magnificent stone and marble which even Greece ever produced. The city had had a strange fate. The magnificent hall with the bases of its columns was still there, and we could realise the space and traverse the area in which 10,000 Greeks used to assemble. We did not know what the Thersilion was, for it was the only one in the world. Perhaps it was called after the name of a man. In that space every man of an audience of 10,000 could see and hear an orator. It might be that the model of the Hall of Liberty or of Audience was taken from Susa. Another strange fact was that this vast room was the background of the theatre. It was, however, a disputable point whether the Greek theatre had a stage at all, or whether a stage was first introduced by the Romans. Dr. Dörpfeld had given great labour to these questions. The School desired to leave the ancient city in the beautiful order in which the Germans had left Olympia. There was now before the world a magnificent book on the subject. There was also in the city an altar 6 ft. wide and 36 ft. long, the like of which was not to be found in any other city. Aegosthena presented a very different aspect from Megalopolis. It was one of the great series of fortress towns on the Corinthian Gulf. It was an acropolis 190 yards long and 90 yards wide. It had never been tampered with since it was inhabited—a period probably in the early years of our era. Besides these works, there was much excavation going on in Athens itself, which was every day revealing fresh treasures. He was proud, indeed, of having a son at work in the Asklepieion. At Athens Prof. and Mrs. Gardner were surrounded by an ardent band of workers, and collections of the highest educational value were being brought together. The next stage by which our knowledge of the classical world was to be materially advanced was the earnest pursuit of archaeology. They were unusually fortunate in the presence of both the present and the late British Ministers at Athens, to whom the School owed so much. The Greek Government had also shown great kindness. The Ephor—it was delightful to think there was still such an official, M. Kavadios—had afforded every facility possible to the work of the school. Foreign governments gave largely to support their schools; but it was not our way to do so. It was certainly a reproach to this country that such an institution as the British School at Athens should suffer for lack of the moderate funds which were needed to bring its work to a perfect issue.

"Lord Lingen, in seconding the motion, gave an account of a recent visit to Athens, in which what most struck him was the much greater richness in the remains of ancient life as compared with Rome. The reason was, probably, that Athens was in the days of Roman dominion the academic centre of the world. The Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge then moved the election of officers. Sir E. Monson seconded the motion, and expressed his gratification at being able to attend the meeting. He could speak professionally of the admirable diplomatic qualities by which Mr. Gardner had been able so successfully to conduct the work of the School. He confessed that the meanness of our countrymen had often amazed him. The French Government gave munificent and the Germans adequate support to their Schools, and the American public gave bountifully; while the wealthiest country in the world left its School in an almost starving condition. Prof. Jebb moved a vote of thanks to the chairman for his presence and the brilliant and practical address which he had given. Many years ago, when the support of the Government was asked of Mr. Robert Lowe, the reply was that the deputation had better discover a modern Herodes Atticus. They had been looking for him ever since; they were still looking for him. They thanked the Archbishop, who had so nobly maintained the traditions of the See of Augustine. Mr. Egerton, British Minister at Athens, in seconding the motion, desired to endorse every word which had fallen from his predecessor. When they heard that the French Government had given an additional 600,000*fr.* to the excavations at Delphi, the penuriousness of our own Government and countrymen was brought into unpleasant relief."

THE EXHIBITION OF THE EGYPT EXPLORATION FUND.

THE private exhibition of the Egypt Exploration Fund held, by kind permission of the Marquis of Bute, at 83, Eccleston-square, from July 15 to 26, was highly interesting to students of ancient Egyptian art and civilisation. Fragments of wall-paintings from tombs of the XIth or XIIth Dynasty, at El Bersheh, were exhibited side by side with water-colour sketches made but a few months ago by Mr. Percy Buckman, and faithful copies of scenes and signs from the tombs of Beni Hasan and Dê el Gebrawi by Mr. W. Blackden, and Mr. Howard Carter. The fine work in drawing and colours, the enamel-like firmness and thickness of the paint, on a small fragment of limestone with a drawing of three geese upon it was particularly noticeable among the ancient work. But a great attraction to Egyptologists was to be found in copies of single hieroglyphs of the XIIth and earlier Dynasties, such as were still drawn and coloured in conformity with the nature of the objects which they were originally intended to represent. Nearly two hundred of these hieroglyphs have now been carefully facsimiled by artists of the Egypt Exploration Fund during the last two seasons. We have only to look at the condition of one fine fragment from the tomb of Tahutihotep at El Bersheh, to recognise afresh how imperative it is that faithful pictorial records should forthwith be made of the exposed monuments of Ancient Egypt. M. de Morgan is pushing on this work in the name of the Service des Antiquités with his well-known administrative ability; but the field is wide and the skilled labourers in it are few, while even the strong hand of the Director of Ghizeh cannot altogether stay the destruction wrought there by the hand of nature and by the natural man. The tomb of Tahutihotep has long been wrecked beyond all possibility of reconstruction in situ—probably by earthquake; and, on that account, Mr. W. Fraser, as an officer of the Egypt Exploration Fund, was permitted by M. Grébaut to save the best of the fallen painted blocks from further damage and defacement by the Arabs.

In the Times of October 7, 1890, Mr. Villiers Stuart offered £50 to the Egypt Exploration Fund, on condition that forty-nine other persons should each give a like sum, towards the work of securing exact copies of scenes and inscriptions from the Ancient Egyptian monuments. At present, we understand that only three persons (two English and one American) have come forward in response to his challenge. But this exhibition will certainly have aroused both fresh and new interests for an undertaking which appeals to all students of science, of art, and of history.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. WILLIAM AGNEW has this week presented to the National Gallery Frederic Walker's famous picture—which, in the opinion of many, was his masterpiece—"The Harbour of Refuge." It was painted in 1872, and has ever since been in Mr. Agnew's possession.

MR. J. P. HESELTINE has been appointed a trustee of the National Gallery in the room of the late Lord Northbourne.

THE collection of Old Masters' drawings which has been left by Malcolm of Poltalloch, and which his son generously deposits on loan at the British Museum, is—as it will hardly be necessary to say to the historical student of art—the most important that has been amassed in private hands possibly since the days of Sir Thomas Lawrence; and in some respects it must be more important than any that could have been formed half a century or a century ago, because the growth of connoisseurship in these things has enabled men to rectify attributions which were at once popular and erroneous. The Malcolm collection, though it includes a remarkable representation of the Italian schools—Florentine, Umbrian and Roman, Milanese, and Venetian—includes those in no overwhelming number, and never to the exclusion of other schools, among which the German, Flemish, and Dutch are perhaps especially well represented. The collection was formed for the most part at a period when the almost recently developed interest in the eighteenth century school of France had not had time to make itself felt; yet it will be found not to be wholly lacking in examples of Watteau, Pater, and Boucher. The earlier and more classical Frenchmen—Claude and the Poussins—are, of course, more strongly represented; while, as regards the Dutch school, the representation is in the main, admirable, Rembrandt and the greatest of his contemporaries occupying no inconsiderable share of space in the ample cabinets of the genial and tasteful collector who died so full of years, and whose art possessions, it may fairly be hoped, will not be scattered.

MR. W. CAREW HAZLITT will publish, with Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co., early in the autumn, a comprehensive work on European Coins (gold, silver, and bronze), which is believed to be the first attempt of the kind made in this country to deal with a subject abounding in interest from many points of view. The author claims a practical acquaintance with this branch of study, to which he has devoted his attention during many years. The illustrations, which number upwards of 250, have been drawn from examples in Mr. Hazlitt's own collection. The New York house of Messrs. Macmillan & Co. will issue simultaneously an edition for the American market.

At the recent congress of antiquarian societies, it was announced that the archaeological maps of Essex, Lancashire, Cheshire, Surrey, Sussex, and Derbyshire have been considerably advanced since the meeting of last year. Maps are being prepared by societies in Herefordshire, Cumberland, and Westmoreland. A series of symbols has been devised by the standing committee, for the diagrammatic representation of ancient objects and sites; and a resolution was passed, expressing a hope that all societies joining in the archaeological survey of England will ensure uniformity by adopting these symbols. Mr. H. S. Pearson gave a description of a photographic survey of the county of Warwick. Each photographer who took part in the work was assigned a district of about six square miles; and the photographs were submitted to the approval of a committee. Up to the present time, about 1700 excellent photographs have been taken; and permanent prints of them have been mounted, and placed in the Free Library at Birmingham.

THE August number of the Studio, to be devoted chiefly to "Sketching from Nature," will contain reproductions of a fine study of trees by Constable (hitherto unpublished), and also sketches by Henry Moore, Wilfrid Ball, Nelson Dawson, Michael Dignam, Alfred Hartley, Arthur Lemon, &c.

A RECENT number of the Proceedings of the Asiatic Society of Bengal (London: Kegan Paul & Co.) contains reports by the philological secretary (Dr. A. F. R. Hoernle), upon twelve finds of old coins in Northern India, under the Treasure Trove Act. In almost all cases, the coins were of no particular rarity. We may, however, mention one find, near Delhi, of no less than 320 gold mohurs of Akbar, Jahangir, Shahjahan, and Aurangzeb, which were forfeited to Government because the finders had attempted to conceal their discovery. From the numismatic point of view, the most important lot is a number of silver coins which came to light after a landlip in the district of Kangra. Of these, twenty-one were pieces of the so-called Bactrian king, Apollodotus II., who reigned in the Punjab about 150 B.C. Four varieties are represented, all of which are to be found in the British Museum. The others, fifty-four in number, belong to the kuninda class of king Amoghabuti, who ruled in the hill districts on both sides of the Satlej at about the same time. Here there are three varieties, one of which—bearing a svastika beneath the legs of a deer—seems to be unpublished. The others have been described and figured by Sir Alexander Cunningham.

MUSIC.

"AMY ROBSART" AND "THE VEILED PROPHET" AT COVENT GARDEN.

MR. ISIDORE DE LARA is a fortunate man: in the course of two seasons, two Operas from his pen have been produced at Covent Garden. In the "Light of Asia" he had a subject which did not lend itself to dramatic treatment. The composer seems to have felt this himself, for he wrote his work originally as a Cantata; and it can be readily understood that such a metamorphosis was not in the direction of improvement. But for his present venture Mr. de Lara hit upon an excellent subject. The story of Amy Robsart is a striking one; and in the arrangement from Sir Walter Scott's novel, Sir Augustus Harris has seized hold of the main points, discarding many details which, though interesting in themselves, and suitable to the form in which the tragic tale was told by Scott, would have weakened the dramatic action. In the first act we have the interview between Amy Robsart and Tressilian; in the second, the festivities at Kenilworth and the meeting of Queen and Countess; and in the third, the last interview of Amy and Leicester, and the final catastrophe at Cumnor. The fact that the plot of Mr. de Lara's opera is a familiar one works greatly in its favour; Wagner himself said that many Italian operas would gain in interest if the public could know what they were about. The composer may be congratulated on his success, though he must not forget that it was not all due to his music; the very fine performance and the sensational stage effect at the close contributed also towards that result. If "Amy Robsart" be compared with works which have become famous, the result would be unfavourable; but if it be taken on its own merits, as the really first dramatic attempt of a composer whose natural instincts seem to point rather in a lyrical direction, then a certain amount of praise is not out of place. Mr. de Lara's intentions are good, but he at present lacks the power to carry them out successfully. His aim was evidently to write a music-drama, and not a ballad opera; but his dramatic powers at present are not strong, and he dwells willingly on the lyrical moments offered. The love duets in the first and third acts, the concerted finale to the second act, are the best portions of the opera. In future—for he seems ambitious and will probably write more operas—Mr. de Lara must try and shake off the influence of contemporary writers, and try altogether to forget the concert room. He deserves encouragement, for how few composers are there who venture to climb the terribly steep hill of stage fame? The performance of "Amy Robsart" on Thursday, July 20, with Mmes. Calvé, Armand, and Messrs. Alvarez, Bonnard, Castelmary and Lassalle, was, as already stated, admirable. It was given under the spirited direction of Signor Bevgnani.

On Wednesday evening Dr. C. V. Stanford's opera "The Veiled Prophet" was given for the first time in London; the work was originally produced at Hanover twelve years ago, but has since been considerably altered and improved by the composer. The story, taken from Moore's poem, "The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan," has been worked up into a fairly good book by Mr. Barclay Squire, but no amount of literary skill could make the impostor an effective personage. The moon miracle is ridiculous on the stage, and Mocanna's death singularly tame; when he falls into the lake, not a ripple is seen upon its surface. The book, however, offers more than one good situation to the composer, and of these Dr. Stanford has taken due advantage. When he wrote the work, Wagner's "Nibelungen" had only just made its appearance, and the system of representative themes was in the air.

Escape from it at that time was well nigh impossible; now, composers are beginning to find out that Wagner's sword without his hand to wield it is of little avail. Two other influences can be traced in the music—that of Schumann, and of the English composers who wrote for the Church. It must be confessed that this mixture of styles is not altogether satisfactory, but at the time the music was written it could scarcely be accounted a fault: it is easy to see that the predominating influence was that of Schumann.

In the first act the processional music for the entrance of the Prophet is interesting; and there are some fine dramatic touches in the scene in which Zelica, the virgin priestess, gazing through the lattice window, recognises Azim, the warrior, and her former lover, who has been invested with the leadership of the army, about to give battle to the Caliph's soldiers by which the city is invested. The closing scene, too, between Zelica and Mocanna, is not lacking in power. Azim's allegiance to the cause is to be strengthened by the allurements of the harem, and Mocanna forces Zelica to act as leading enchantress. Act 2 opens with the scene in the harem. The opening chorus and the ballet music are delightful; the chorus is full of charm, and the quaint first dance, both in its intervals and rhythmic savours strongly of the East. In these numbers Dr. Stanford displays great skill in orchestration. Zelica and Azim recognise each other, and both decide to escape. Mocanna enters and Azim attacks him, but in vain, with his dagger. In the third act we have the defeat and death of the impostor. The end of the act is rather tame; but the moon-music is fine, and so is Zelica's Invocation to Hope. In spite of its weaknesses, Dr. Stanford's opera is really clever and interesting, and it seems a pity that—notwithstanding his later failures—he does not write again for the stage. "The Veiled Prophet" is full of promise. The performance was, on the whole, good. Mme. Nordica was the Zelica, Miss Lucille Hill the Fatima, and Signor Viguar the Azim, and M. Ancona the False Prophet; and all deserve praise. Signor Mananelli conducted. The harem scene in the second act was admirable, the grouping of the chorus being most effective. By the way, the lovely song, "There's a Bower of Roses," well known to concert goers, was sung by Miss Hill. The opera was well received.

THE ILLUSTRATED EDITION.

A SHORT HISTORY of the ENGLISH PEOPLE.

By JOHN RICHARD GREEN. Vols. I. and II. have been published, and Vol. III. is now being issued in Parts Part XXIII. now ready. Super-royal 8vo, 1s. net each Part.
GUARDIAN.—"The second volume of the illustrated edition is even more magnificent than the first. The illustrations are exactly what their name implies. They lighten up the history. Places, buildings, persons, all receive their due share of attention, and how large that share is, may be inferred from the fact that the description of them and the sources whence they are derived occupies some five-and-twenty pages. Indeed, they are a 'short history' in themselves."

The Campaign of Waterloo: a Military History. By John Codman Ropes. (Putnam's Sons.)

(First Notice.)

THIS is an able and conscientious, if not a masterly work. Mr. Ropes, who has made his mark as a military critic, need not offer apologies for having added this contribution to Waterloo history. It is not only that the conflict was one of supreme importance and surpassing interest, and that it closed an era of world-wide war and witnessed the ruin of the first of generals. It is not only that the subject invites the most careful and minute attention, and that it presents to the thoughtful student of war problems of strategy and tactics of peculiar value. A variety of causes has made our knowledge respecting the contest still imperfect: the facts have been distorted by passion and prejudice in almost every conceivable way; and not a decade has passed without throwing fresh light on different incidents of the eventful drama. Mr. Ropes, therefore, has done well in collecting the evidence at present extant respecting the campaign of 1815, and bringing it up to the present date; in commenting at length on the many questions which a study of this passage of arms suggests; and in examining the conclusions of the numerous writers who have entered this remarkable field of inquiry. The book is deficient in breadth of view, and in the power of generalising from masses of details with philosophic and clear insight; it does not bring out some facts of importance in anything like sufficient relief; in some particulars it is, I think, in error; and I wholly dissent from some of its judgments. But Mr. Ropes has investigated with praiseworthy diligence every incident of the historic days from the 14th to the 18th of June. In dealing with the facts he has, in some instances, given proof of no ordinary critical power. He is singularly impartial and calm in his views; and he has added not a little to our store of knowledge, as regards more than one part of the campaign. The book is the best and most complete commentary on Waterloo that has appeared for some years; it should be in the library of every thinker on war.

I can only glance at the most salient points of Mr. Ropes's narrative, and of his deductions from it. In describing Napoleon's spring on the Allies, he does not fully bring out the characteristic splendour of the project of the advance into Belgium, the admirable discernment of the qualities of his adversaries shown by the great master, and the exquisite art with which his forces were assembled on the verge of the frontier; and he has not pointed out how the Emperor lost the support of 20,000 men at the last moment, a loss in the highest degree disastrous. He has accurately given the numbers of the French army; and he has further remarked that, on the one hand, it was far from equal to the old Grand Army, and that, on the other, its chiefs were far from good. Soult, a general-in-chief, and an indolent man, was unfit to be a chief of the staff; Grouchy had completely failed in independent command; Ney had lost head and heart since he had betrayed the Bourbons. Mr. Ropes has also stated nearly correctly what the force of the Prussian army was; but he has underrated the strength of Wellington's army—that is, of his available troops—by very nearly 10,000 men, though he has truly observed that the Duke's army was a bad army in nearly all respects. Mr. Ropes thinks that Napoleon's project on June 15 did not contemplate the seizing of the two points of Quatre Bras and Sombrefe, and that he intended simply to attack Blücher first, to defeat him, and then to turn on Wellington. And, undoubtedly, much is to be said for this view; Napoleon, in one passage, pronounces for it. Still, I incline to think that the Emperor wished to occupy Quatre Bras and Sombrefe on the 15th. This would have facilitated his attack on Blücher and made sure that Wellington would be kept away; and Gourgaud's narrative points to this inference. In common with all writers, Mr. Ropes shows how formidable was the position of the French army, as respects its enemy, on the evening of the 15th: delays and misadventures had occurred; Ziethen had ably retarded the advance of Napoleon, yet the Emperor was close to the allied centre; the Allies were widely apart from each other; and success on the next day seemed assured to the French. Nor can I doubt that Ney had been ordered to occupy Quatre Bras on the 15th, a move that would have held Wellington at bay and have placed Blücher at Napoleon's mercy. It is impossible to get over the evidence of the Moniteur. One great drawback had, however, taken place: D'Erlon's corps was far behind in the rear—D'Erlon, indeed, had shown himself to be a laggard in Spain, in 1813—and the effect of this retardation of the First Corps is indicated more clearly by Mr. Ropes than by any other commentator on the campaign.

Turning to the allied chiefs, it is difficult to accept Mr. Ropes's view, that they had not arranged, in the event of Napoleon attacking their centre, and advancing from Charleroi, on the main road to Brussels, to concentrate at Sombrefe and Quatre Bras; for there is much evidence this was their purpose. However this may have been, Blücher rushed to Sombrefe with three-fourths of his army, as his profound antagonist foresaw might happen; and it is a mistake to suppose that Blücher had a right to expect the aid of Bülow on June 16. Mr. Ropes does not bring this sufficiently out: whether Bülow disobeyed his orders or not, whether Gneisenau's instructions were clear or obscure, Bülow could hardly have reached Sombrefe in time for the battle which was fought at Ligny. Blücher, therefore, with his "hussar habits," had hurried into his enemy's mouth; and had Napoleon occupied Sombrefe, I do not think it would have made any difference. On the opposite side of the field of manoeuvre, Mr. Ropes dwells rightly, and not too severely, on the hesitations and delays of Wellington—exactly what Napoleon believed would happen. National vanity has put forward two theories with respect to the bad strategy of the Duke; but the first is contradicted by the facts, the second is palpably false—nay, preposterous. The Duke did not rapidly move on Quatre Bras: on the contrary, he took care not to do so until the morning of June 16, when he should have been altogether too late; and as to the notion, that he was justified in directing his forces on D'Enghien and Nivelles, and leaving a huge gap between the Prussians and himself, this was simply playing into his adversary's hands. Undoubtedly, after the events of June 15, Blücher and Wellington ought not to have tried to concentrate on Sombrefe and Quatre Bras—this has been clearly explained by Napoleon—but as Blücher did move on Sombrefe, Wellington was absolutely bound to move on Quatre Bras, at once; and that he did not take this step on the evening of the 15th all but caused the loss of the campaign, and must have caused it had the French Emperor been properly seconded by his lieutenants. I entirely agree with all that Mr. Ropes has urged on this important subject, distasteful as it may be to the Duke's worshippers. The truth is, Blücher was rash and thoughtless; Wellington was unduly cautious and slow; and both were all but surprised, and were wholly out-generalled.

Though the French army did not hold as favourable positions as it might have held on the morning of the 16th of June, it was still very well placed to defeat its enemy. Mr. Ropes rightly points out that the backward state of D'Erlon's corps was the probable cause that the Emperor did not advance at an earlier hour; and this disposes of the adverse comments of Charras. If Napoleon was not fully aware of the exact positions of Blücher and Wellington, Mr. Ropes clearly shows how perfectly designed his arrangements for coming events were; they ought to have assured him decisive success. Ney was ordered to march, with the left wing, to occupy Quatre Bras, and to send a detachment to Marbais, to give the main army support, while the Emperor should move against Blücher with his centre and right; and had Ney executed his orders well the Prussian army would have been destroyed and Wellington paralysed, if not defeated. Mr. Ropes makes some excuses for Ney: he points out that the Marshal had no staff; and he rather blames Napoleon for not having given his lieutenant his command until the afternoon of the 15th. The faults, however, of Ney on the 16th were due to himself, and not to the want of a staff; Napoleon and Ney had distrusted each other since the ill-fated Marbais had deserted the king; and this was the true reason why he was not sooner employed. Mr. Ropes has ably explained the operations of Ney; they contributed largely to the failure of the campaign, though Reille and D'Erlon were also to blame. Ney on the morning of the 16th had 9000 men at Frasnes, that is, barely two miles from Quatre Bras; he might have had more than 30,000, not to speak of a fine body of horsemen, under Reille and D'Erlon, at Quatre Bras, between 1.30 and 2 p.m.; there was nothing in his path but a feeble division sent to the spot, most luckily, without the Duke's knowledge; and the Marshal, therefore, might easily have seized Quatre Bras, have sent the required detachment to Marbais, and have rendered Blücher's overthrow certain, had he simply executed his allotted task. Demoralised, however, and no longer himself, he threw away hours of supreme importance: allowed Reille to move slowly; did not summon D'Erlon from the rear; and thus lost an occasion which, if ably seized, might have changed, for a time, the fortunes of Europe. He attacked late, and with troops brought up piecemeal; was not assisted by D'Erlon's corps; and, in short, conducted the combat of Quatre Bras recklessly. This fatal irresolution gave Wellington time to repair, in part, the delays of the 15th: to prevent Ney from seizing Quatre Bras, and from sending a man to support his master. And though Ney succeeded in holding the Duke in check, and in keeping the British apart from the Prussians, he wholly failed to fulfil his mission. Had he occupied Marbais as he might have done, as Mr. Ropes correctly remarks, the Allies could not have escaped a disaster, and Waterloo would not have been fought.

While Ney was engaged at Quatre Bras, to the left, Napoleon, on the right, had attacked Blücher, in the positions he had taken between Sombreffe and Ligny. I agree with Mr. Ropes that the veteran chief fought the battle trusting to himself alone. The Duke gave no positive pledge of assistance; this, indeed, was scarcely possible, although Wellington, deceived by an erroneous report, believed his army to be nearer Quatre Bras than it actually was—that is, not far off from his colleague. Mr. Ropes discusses at some length the question whether Napoleon was right in directing his efforts, for the most part, against Blücher's centre, or whether he ought rather to have turned his right; but from the point of view of the Emperor, there can be little doubt. Napoleon believed that Ney would support him from Marbais, and fall on the flank and rear of the Prussians; he attacked their centre, with this conviction; and had Ney done what his master expected, the Prussian right and centre would have been crushed, and three-fourths, perhaps, of Blücher's army destroyed. On the other hand, the turning of Blücher's right might indeed have forced him away from Wellington; but it would not have gained decisive success; and this was always Napoleon's object on the field. Mr. Ropes indicates truly how defective were the arrangements of Blücher throughout the battle, and how superior were Napoleon's tactics; but this is acknowledged by all commentators. Ney did not descend, as we have seen, on Marbais; but had D'Erlon taken part in the battle, the result would have been exactly the same—that is, Blücher would have been entirely routed. I cannot agree with Mr. Ropes as to the operations of D'Erlon and his corps; I think Napoleon ordered D'Erlon to the field, and probably acquiesced in his recall by Ney. Much is to be said on both sides of the question; but the evidence points to the conclusion I have drawn; the opposite view rests, in the main, on hypotheses, and on difficulties in the way of the better opinion. The absence of D'Erlon and his troops from Ligny and Quatre Bras made Napoleon's success on the 16th incomplete; and, as Mr. Ropes takes care to point out, the delay occasioned by this misadventure was disastrous too at Ligny. Napoleon, nevertheless, won a real and brilliant victory; and this, as affairs stood on the night of the 16th, might easily have had prodigious results.

If Ligny had not been another Jena, to be followed, perhaps, by another Austerlitz, it had given Napoleon a great advantage, and placed the Allies in grave peril. They could no longer unite on their true line of junction, the lateral main road from Namur to Nivelles; and they were forced back into the difficult region of marsh and forest watered by the Dyle. Blücher and Wellington, as every one knows, fell back, the one on Wavre, the other on Waterloo; and they agreed to join hands on this second line, and there to await the attack of Napoleon. Mr. Ropes's comments on this bad strategy are, in my judgment, very far from adequate. He indicates, indeed, how this double movement exposed Wellington to crushing defeat on the 17th; and he evidently approves of Napoleon's view, that his enemies should have retreated on Brussels, concentrating their combined armies, for in that case they would have opposed an infinitely superior force to that of the Emperor. But Mr. Ropes should have dwelt more fully on the admirable opportunity the retreat on Wavre and Waterloo gave the great chief of the French. Napoleon might, on the morning of the 17th, have called on his army to make an effort—he had certainly 40,000 fresh troops—and have fallen either on Blücher or Wellington, distant from each other and unable to unite; and, in that event, he must have gained a victory. Or, drawing together his whole forces, he might have attacked Blücher, on the 18th, at Wavre, or Wellington on the same day at Waterloo, and this, too, would have made his success certain. Or, finally, in accordance with the true principles of war, he might have despatched, at an early hour on the 17th, a restraining wing to hold Blücher in check, and have turned against Wellington with three-fourths of his army; and in this instance he would have secured a triumph had he acted with his accustomed power. Whatever English or German critics have written, the double retreat on Wavre and Waterloo was a bad half measure of extreme danger; and the Napoleon of 1796 would have made it fatal.

A series of accidents, however, saved the Allies from what should have been their ruin. Mr. Ropes properly condemns the extreme remissness of Ney, Soult, and Grouchy on the morning of the 17th. All three gave literally no orders; and they allowed the defeated Prussians to escape, and Wellington to draw off from Quatre Bras, without observing the march of the enemy. Napoleon, too, would have been gravely to blame for not following up his success at Ligny, had his energies been equal to the task; but he had retired to Fleurus, and was so ill that he was unable to give a single command. Mr. Ropes does not dwell enough on this incident: he admits that the Emperor was worn out with fatigue; but he hardly seems to know how strong is the evidence that Napoleon, whose health had been long in decline, was made unfit for his work on the morning of the 17th. The Emperor reached Ligny in the forenoon of the day. There can be no doubt that his belief was that Blücher was retiring on his base—that is, towards the Rhine—far away from Wellington; and this assumption was, in truth, natural, though it would not have been made had his lieutenants explored the theatre before them, as was their duty. After a delay of two or three hours, on being apprised that Wellington had still some troops at Quatre Bras, Napoleon came to a definite purpose. He divided his army into two masses, the one about 72,000 strong, destined to attack Wellington under his own eye, the other perhaps 34,000 men, a restraining wing to keep away Blücher. This wing was placed in the hands of Grouchy; and the Emperor's orders to the Marshal were, that he was to pursue and follow the Prussians, and to interpose between Blücher and Wellington, who, Napoleon added, was to be assailed should he stand before the forest of Soignies, a great wood around the main road to Brussels. This strategy was quite right in principle; but, owing to the neglect of Napoleon's lieutenants, the direction taken by Blücher was unknown, and the Allies were on their way to Wavre and Waterloo; and owing, I believe, to an intermittent illness—an affection of the skin and the bladder—which occasionally paralysed his mighty faculties, the Emperor had not pursued his enemy with even an approach to the vigour of the past. The task of Grouchy, therefore, was not easy, but it was within the powers of a capable soldier.

Napoleon had joined Ney at about 2 p.m.; and the main French army marched from Quatre Bras on the track of the last columns of Wellington, who had been retreating since the forenoon and had assembled the mass of his forces at Waterloo. Mr. Ropes, I conceive, is too severe on Ney for not having pressed the pursuit in the morning: the Marshal had been worsted, on the whole, on the 16th; and Ney was less to blame on June 17 than on the 16th and the 18th afterwards. Mr. Ropes insists that the Emperor showed his wonted activity in following up the enemy, but there is much evidence to the exact contrary; and in any case this is no proof that he was not really ill for hours after Ligny. The French advanced guard reached the low hills of La Belle Alliance as evening fell; and Wellington's batteries warned his adversary that a large army was in position before him, and that a great battle might be expected next day. Leaving the Duke and Napoleon face to face, we turn to the operations of Grouchy and his wing. Mr. Ropes truly shows that these movements have not been explained with the research and candour which their supreme importance requires; and the simple reason is that English and German writers have more or less avoided the subject, for a clear and full explanation of the facts would have been a condemnation of the allied strategy, and especially of the march on Wavre and Waterloo. Napoleon, we have seen, when leaving Ligny, believed that Blücher was falling back towards the Rhine; and he clung perhaps to the belief for hours afterwards. But he had ascertained, on his way to Quatre Bras, that a large Prussian force had been seen on the Orneau—that is, not at all far from Wellington. This intelligence made him suspect at once that Blücher might be trying to join his colleague; and he instantly sent off a message to Grouchy, which, Mr. Ropes correctly remarks, has not been given the weight it demands. In that important despatch he ordered the Marshal to occupy Gembloux, a small town some thirteen or fourteen miles from Wavre—that is, scarcely a march distant; and he distinctly informed Grouchy—who, we repeat, knew that Wellington was to be attacked, should he offer battle, in front of the great wood of Soignes—that “the Allies might be attempting to unite, and to try the fortune of arms again.”

Grouchy received these orders in the afternoon of the 17th, and set off immediately, with all his troops, to Gembloux. He arrived at the place before night had fallen, a great part of his force, however, being in the rear; and at Gembloux he obtained intelligence of the direction taken by the Prussian army, which, if not in all respects correct, ought not the less to have fixed his purpose. He was apprised that the Prussians were retreating in two main bodies, the one on Wavre, the other on Liège—that is, the one gradually drawing near Wellington, the other falling back towards the Rhine; and he informed the Emperor in two despatches that, if the mass of Blücher's force were making for Wavre, “he would pursue it in that direction in order to separate Blücher and Wellington,” showing thus that he understood his mission, marked out from the first, and made plain afterwards. With the intelligence before him, and knowing besides that Napoleon intended to attack Wellington, the course of the Marshal should have been self evident. He might neglect a hostile column retiring on Liège, for that would be wholly out of the account; but obviously he should follow the hostile column which he had learned was on the way to Wavre, for Wavre was not far from the forest of Soignes, where Wellington, it was to be supposed, would stand, and it might effect its junction with the Duke by a cross march from Wavre to Waterloo. As it was, besides, the paramount duty of Grouchy to keep Blücher away from Wellington, he was clearly bound to break up from Gembloux at the first dawn of the 18th of June, in order to come up with the Prussian army; and obviously it would be his best course to make for Wavre in such a way as, if possible, to approach Napoleon and at the same time to hold Blücher in check. To effect this he had but to cross the Dyle and make for the tract between Wavre and Waterloo; this movement would place him on the flank of the Prussians, should they leave Wavre to join Wellington, and would bring him near the main French army.

Mr. Ropes explains all this very well, and properly lays much stress on the facts, for they are of the first importance in a study of the campaign. Had Grouchy done what he ought to have done, Blücher could not have joined hands with the Duke, and the Allies could not have gained Waterloo.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

THE BADMINTON LIBRARY.—Swimming. By A. Sinclair and W. Henry. (Longmans.)

Felice hora: Just as men are seeking the seaside and looking forward to many a struggle with the waves, and girls are deploring the absence of a manual to teach the theory of swimming, the volume to please all appears.

The joint authors have excellently accomplished their task. After a few pages of introduction with regard to the swimming of the ancients, concerning which singularly little is known, for the art was evidently deemed as instinctive a mode of progression as walking, a careful review is instituted of the physiological principles involved in the act of swimming. These sections are worthy of particular study, and even those who can swim already may learn much from their perusal. The different varieties of swimming, including fancy swimming of all kinds, succeed. The most approved methods of resuscitation naturally follow, and this part of the book renders it specially useful to all who are fond of water sports. Next, the latest development of swimming—water polo—is lucidly described. For the benefit of the uninitiated this may be explained as a kind of football played in the water, and it is a game in great favour at present in Oxford University. The book concludes with advice on training, particulars of public swimming competitions, and the like. It is not too much to say that this is the only modern treatise which can lay claim to anything like a complete and philosophical treatment of the subject. As such it worthily upholds the claims of the Badminton Library, and admirably suits the needs of the present generation.

The book which of all others during the last fifty years has unquestionably taught most persons to swim (so far as such an art ever can be theoretically taught) is youth's familiar friend, The Boys' Own Book. A boy who, during the summer holidays, daily practised the simple lessons contained in it, and after accustoming himself to the regular motions of the stroke, fastened a bladder to each of his shoulders, would forthwith find himself able to swim without any other instructor. When the feeling of confidence has once been acquired, through the ability to keep the body afloat, the rest is a mere matter of practice. Messrs. Sinclair and Henry highly recommend an elaborate system of swimming-drill on dry land. It would, doubtless, teach swimming, but most pupils would prefer lessons in the water from the beginning. The next most practical handbook known to us is, probably, out of print; but, in spite of an illiterate style, it is a thoroughly useful manual. It boasts a preface by Mrs. Oliphant, and was published in 1875—The Art of Swimming in the Eton Style, by Serjeant Leahy. He teaches a slow unvarying stroke, totally opposed to what is now largely used in swimming short races, and is known as the “Trudgeon stroke.” Prof. Hartelius, in a little book on Home Gymnastics (Isbister, 1881) has some good sections on swimming, illustrated by diagrams. The value of these books in a few particulars only enhances the excellence of the Badminton treatise on Swimming in all. To teach swimming properly, an intelligent appreciation of the conditions under which the human body floats is necessary. The pupil must be shown that buoyant as the body is (it is slightly more so in females than in males), it yet requires a little support by the action of the limbs, and that the tendency to sink increases in proportion to those parts of the frame which are out of the water, just as a timid person sinks at once on throwing up his arms. The arms, he may next be taught, do little more in the act of swimming than support the body; the necessary speed is procured by the action of the legs. A sensible lad, who is not a “water-funk”—to use the expressive term of the period—if the theory of the art be thus explained to him, ought to swim in six or seven lessons. The rope and pole, or some modification of these aids, may sometimes be used to advantage in a city bath; but in open river or sea common sense and steady practice ought speedily to teach a lad to swim. Seeing what an excellent exercise swimming is for girls, it should be an encouragement to them to bear in mind that they can learn the art easier than men, as their specific gravity is less; while children can float more easily than either. While on this part of the subject few readers who have reflected on the purity of English family life will agree with the authors, when they deplore the prohibition at most seaside places in England of whole families bathing together, and add “such an absurd veto is an abuse which needs remedying.”

Pearl-diving affords materials for an interesting chapter. From six to eight fathoms are, it seems, the depths to which the professional divers of Ceylon generally descend. On one occasion a depth of fifteen fathoms was undoubtedly reached. Similarly, one minute and forty-nine seconds is the longest time during which a diver has been timed to remain under water. Life-saving is treated at a length commensurate with the importance of the subject, and no one will think that a page here is superfluous. In particular, the excellent rules of the authors, on the manner in which a rescuer should act when seized by the drowning man, should be carefully perused and borne in mind by every swimmer. The book is well illustrated, full of anecdotes, and of great practical utility to all who either can swim, or wish to learn. The pages on public school swimming and on the art as pursued in New Zealand and Australia will appeal to many readers. In short, the book well maintains the high standard which the publishers of the Badminton Library have set before them. It is a treasure to all fond of the waves, to all who love, with Browning, to cleave the sea:

"Stem tide, part wave, till both roll on thy jewelled road
Of triumph, and the grim o' the gulf grow wonder-white
I' the phosphorescent wake."

M. G. WATKINS.

A Study of the Works of Alfred Lord Tennyson, Poet Laureate. By Edward Campbell Tainsh. (Macmillans.)

"I THINK Shakspeare deserved—what, in a case of another sort, the Athenians inflicted—a fine for writing 'Othello.'" This is Mr. Tainsh's deliberate opinion, stated confessedly to explain his attitude towards certain of Tennyson's poems, and to define the standpoint from which his own book is to be regarded. But it is more than this. It is an exact and final indication of the spirit of his criticism: it embodies, within the narrowest bounds, an expression of Mr. Tainsh's limitations. "A fine for writing 'Othello'!" It is difficult to grasp the full import of the phrase at a first glance, but familiarity with Mr. Tainsh's method helps to explain his meaning. Let us gather a few supplementary opinions to confirm his attitude.

"'Lucretius' is a pathological study, and seems to me more fit for an essay in the Lancet than for a poem." "The story of 'The Promise of May' is, of course, shocking." "The situation [of the prince's presence in Ida's college] is a delicate one, and makes one a little anxious in the reading." "I had misgivings whether the infliction of so repulsive a picture [as Vivien] were not wanton and, therefore, immodest." "In and after the 'Enoch Arden' volume there are a good many pronounced examples of the introduction of preternaturalism. . . . I think such things spiritually unclean, morally corrupt."

From these utterances I think we may acquire a just appreciation of Mr. Tainsh's canon of criticism. Obviously his estimate is principally ethical. This, indeed, he grants at the outset. "Upon the strictly art field," he says, "I have but touched here and there. My main purpose throughout has been to bring out the central thought or lesson of each poem." In this we have no cause for quarrel with Mr. Tainsh. Tennyson's work has, as he himself says, many aspects, many beauties; and, though to attempt a study of his ethical significance, apart from the beauty and variety of his form, is undoubtedly to approach the work in too exclusive a spirit, still the inner thought and suggestion of the poetry are so emphatic as to render such a study rich in reward for the student. But, before such a research can be conducted with success and sympathy, the mind must be cleared of prejudice. Any narrowness of view, any intrusion of personal like and dislike, are fatal to the freedom and illumination of the criticism. The study must be approached with a certain degree of eclecticism.

Now Mr. Tainsh's study has many merits, and has long been invaluable to the Tennysonian. It stimulates thought, it provokes discussion, it is intimate, and—we need scarcely add—it is always reverent and generally enthusiastic. But that one very necessary trait—the freedom from prejudice—is not to be reckoned among Mr. Tainsh's equipments. His point of view is invariably narrowed. He regards the significance of every poem with the eye of the moderately-cultured Englishman: he is for ever trembling lest the poet's liberty should broaden down into licence; he hides his eyes before Cleopatra's nakedness; he marvels that Lancelot should yearn for Guinevere's lips; he never forgets that Shakspeare ought, in the course of justice, to have been fined for writing "Othello."

There are many sides of criticism which a writer endowed with Mr. Tainsh's attainments might safely illustrate. He might tabulate and arrange; he might analyse and dissect; and these things Mr. Tainsh has done, if somewhat too fully, still admirably. But with the one limitation of British prejudice, the one inability to separate art from ethics, or the thing displayed from the thing suggested—with this shortcoming, it was impossible to produce a study of Tennyson's poetry which should be thoroughly sympathetic, which should reveal a keen and intimate insight into the meaning of the poet.

For to say that because Tennyson is at times direct he is therefore wanton, to maintain that to be dramatically passionate is to be wittingly lewd, that to be influenced by mysticism is to approve the spiritualistic scéance—to confound, in a word, the field of art with that of practical morals, is surely to lose one's hold on criticism in its first and elementary stage. The time is coming when we shall have to free ourselves finally from the bondage of Philistinism. English criticism has gradually widened its borders, and learnt to distinguish between the outward and inward import of the work subjected to its examination. We are learning that the naked may be unashamed, so long as it is pure in heart. To veil our statuary with dust-cloths would seem to the narrowest of us an absurdity. When shall we attain to a like appreciation of the truth in the realm of literature? Not, perhaps, until we are able to separate, at a touch, the function of art and of ethics, not until the criticism which confuses them is felt to be retarding.

Mr. Tainsh, as I have said before, has earned in many ways the gratitude of the student of Tennyson. His analysis of In Memoriam is very suggestive: his study of the Idylls is the most interesting and appreciative review of the epic hitherto attempted. I must confess to a personal dislike for the rigid system of classification to which he has subjected the poetry as a whole; but this view is not generally shared by critics, and the arrangement has, of course, its advantages for the student. In many respects Mr. Tainsh's book is invaluable: doubtless within the limitations which he has set upon himself it could scarcely have been better.

But those very limitations are, after all, limitations in the very essence and spirit of the work, limitations which no amount of painstaking labour can altogether condone. When once you have said that Shakspeare deserved a fine for writing "Othello," you have resigned your pretension to take rank as a critic.

ARTHUR WAUGH.

Memoirs of the Life of Sir John Clerk of Penicuik, Baronet, Baron of the Exchequer. Extracted by himself from his own Journals. 1676-1755. Edited by John M. Gray. (Edinburgh: For the Scottish History Society.)

"THIS book," says Sir John, "may be read by all my friends in the House of Penicuik, but is never to be lent or carried out of the House." Ordinary folks become restless at such hints of gossip: antiquaries read in them a high command to discover the hidden story. By happy circumstance the Scottish History Society is now able to satisfy the curious; and, fortunately, the Baron's memoranda are eminently worthy of their wider fame. To kindly editing and comely printing there can surely be no objection, and in a goodly number of appreciative readers no fault. So we are all "friends" of Sir John, and there is an end of apologies to him for "dispersing his memoirs abroad."

The volume deals, roughly, with the earlier half of the eighteenth century. Although there are over forty pages of chat on his family history and his own youth, the story proper begins about 1702, when he was twenty-six, and continues with considerable fullness beyond the 'Forty-five. His residence in or near Edinburgh, his attendance at the law courts, and his later position as Baron of Exchequer gave him an intimate knowledge of the political and social stir of those memorable fifty years in Scotland. His gossip is of many things; of the negotiations for the Union, the merits of a squadron volante in politics, the rebel doings about the capital in the 'Fifteen and 'Forty-five, the collapse of the Mississippi and South Sea Companies, the great frost of 1739, and the personal appearance of Queen Anne. He may not add much that is new; but he gives, what is always welcome, a vivid and first-hand version of the old story. Of the great folks of the day, whom he met in England during his visit as Commissioner for the Treaty of Union, we have some valuable impressions given in the genuine plainspoken diary manner. Lord Oxford's "rogues" inspire a paragraph or two of political moralising, certainly not intended for his lordship's ears; Lord Lovat had been "all his life a cunning double man," but "a year or two before the rebellion he began to dream and dote, and committed many great absurdities"; poor Queen Anne, who gave him three interviews, is painfully interesting to us with her "red and spotted face," her negligent dress, her gout-punctures, and her swarths of "dirty rags." He was as much at home among the curios of Sir Hans Sloane and Doctors Woodward and Stukeley as in Oldbuck adventures on the site of Blatobulgum. In his youth he studied under Gronovius and Spanheim, drew with Mieris, and formed a friendship with the clumsy genius Boerhaave, who was, like the memorable "Doctor of Phisik," no specialist in religion. We have glimpses, too, of Prof. Gregory the mathematician, and William Paterson of banking reputation. Between these sketches lie the commonplaces of successful lairdship and happy fatherhood, with a grumble or two on advancing years, indigestion, and the danger of educating the Scottish youth in England.

The Baron confesses that he "attempted a poem in Milton's way, under the title of The Country Seat, but tired upon the revising and correcting the style of it." He wrote a large number of political and antiquarian tracts, and is responsible, as the editor tells us, for some madrigals and songs still reserved for his "friends" at Penicuik. "I could spare," he says, "100 dull things for the sake of one fine thought or expression"; but he adds in the next sentence, "I curbed these salies of fancy as what I thought inconsistent with the gravity of a judge and a man of business." He had his literary likings, but there was more honour in a full-bottomed wig and in the friendship of the Duke of Queensberry. He might, indeed, have boasted of his literary frolics as he did of his wine-parties, that he had not been "any way intoxicated above twice at most these forty years." He seems to regret that his brother, "though in many respects a very desirable person," did not show the same artistic restraint; for he played on the 'cello "with all the perfection of the greatest Master, and rather too well for a gentleman." Sir John, however, despite his high resolve and the ledger-methods of a diary, gives proof of better things, as in the touching description of the death of his second wife or his adventure with a young Spanish lady at Villa Franca. But he rather misses the proper effect in his mourning for his son: "O my son, my son Peter, would to God I had died for thee!" and shows over-much condescension to Grub-street in invariably calling his teeth, which sorely troubled him, the "pins of his earthly tabernacle." There is evidence, too, that he possessed not a little cynical humour. Perhaps it was a family trait; for he tells how his brother Harry, "when he found how he was going off, called to a friend, Dr. Clerk, next his bed, that, if he pleased, the Glouers might come in" to see him die. The Baron quaintly admits that he concealed as best he could the dislocation of his tabernacle pins, especially from strangers "who were gaping for his office to some of their friends." But prudent men have their follies, and he stands condemned by the very last paragraph of his diary. Its sad tale is that in December 1754 he fell ill of a flux. "My distress was occasioned by eating too much cabbage broth. N.B.—All greens affect me in the same way, and for the future must be avoided."

We cannot, however, gossip further about the old worthy. Our thanks are due to Mr. Gray for this happy introduction. He has given us, in addition, a Preface, narrating in brief the gist of the memoirs and concluding with a valuable account of his other writings. He has fringed the pages with excellent and useful notes, and enhanced the beauty of the volume with a few interesting portraits. The full index will serve all historical purposes, but the majority of readers will search for the facts themselves, and so find pleasant pastime.

NEW NOVELS.

A Passage through Bohemia. By Florence Warden. In 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

The Saffron Robe. By Margaret B. Cross. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

Jaco Treloar. By J. H. Pearce. In 2 vols. (Methuen.)

The Shadow of Desire. By Irene Osgood. (New York: Cleveland Publishing Co.)

Waynflete. By Christabel R. Coleridge. In 2 vols. (Innes.)

A Deformed Idol. By James J. Moran. (Digby, Long & Co.)

From Whose Bourne, &c. By Robert Barr (Luke Sharp). (Chatto & Windus.)

Mr. Mackenzie's Wedding. By Jane H. Jamieson. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

The Man in Possession. By Rita. (White.)

MISS FLORENCE WARDEN'S sketches of Bohemian life—the life that is led by travelling showmen and theatrical companies—are so vivid, that one is tempted to wonder where, and how, she gained her experience. Some of her scenes are genuinely pathetic, while others merely lift the curtain on the seamy side of life. The hero of A Passage through Bohemia is Victred Speke, whose father was heir to the title and estates of the Earl of Malpas. The Earl was a "horsey" man with a heavy jaw and low forehead, who held forth, with regard to the supposed wrongs of his tenants, in fine, old High Tory style. The Earl hated Victred, probably for the reason that he was a perfect contrast to himself. He was healthy, handsome, popular, and a true gentleman. Owing to the Earl's brutal insults, things came to an open rupture one day; and the quarrel ended in the accidental death of the Earl, and the flight of Victred. The story is rather weak here, for if a verdict of "Wilful Murder" were returned (as it was) against Speke, Miss Warden would find that the authorities would make much more strenuous efforts to discover the alleged murderer than they did in this case. It was easy to track him, when he was found by his own cousin, Tracy Fitzalan, taking the part of a giant in a travelling booth. His great height alone—six feet four—was a strong point against him. In the travelling company was one who took the part of a dwarf, Red Jack by name, supposed to be son of Dennis M'Rena, the agitator; but in reality she was a woman, and M'Rena's daughter. She had the gift of eloquence, and was employed by her father in stirring up the poor to revolt. We have here again an objection to raise. Miss Warden has so poured contempt on the "People's Cause" that at last the noble faith of Red Jack in it is completely undermined. Now the cause was in itself noble, and it was a pity to shatter belief in it because some of its advocates were insincere. But the aspirations of the patriot give place to the affections of the woman. Little by little, Victred and Red Jack arrive at the knowledge that love has them in its thrall. The discovery is no sooner made, however, than poor Red Jack dies of consumption, and the description of the death-scene is extremely touching. Victred is now Earl of Malpas, through his father's death, and the reader must discover for himself how he is absolved of the charge of murder. A low woman whom the Earl has been inveigled into marrying when he was a mere boy has the decency to disappear from the mortal stage; and the hero eventually marries Lady May, sister of the dead Earl, who has loved him from the first. The novel has plenty of spirit and animation, and in parts is really clever and sparkling.

The somewhat fanciful title of The Saffron Robe would scarcely seem to indicate a thoroughly English story of to-day; yet such is the fact. The heroine, Diana Moore, is first introduced to us in a yellow silk dress, on her return from a wedding; and this reminds the hero, Dick Outram, that the correct thing in wedding dresses in the days of the ancient Greeks was a saffron robe—at least all the girls put one on when they became the "Servants of Venus." Diana Moore is a magnificent creature, with much of the lissom grace and striking beauty attributed to her namesake of the chase; and she is clever and original withal. She owns a brother, however, who is an unmitigated cad, and who, after committing forgery and generally making an ass of himself, tries to bully his father's rich, but delicate, ward, Rosamund Hastings, into a marriage, in order to get rid of his debts. The elder Moore is a conceited prig in a velvet coat, who is secretary to a learned society, but with plenty of leisure to dabble in politics, chemistry, philanthropic movements, and what not. But neither he nor his fiery political antagonist, Squire Outram, is without good points. Diana and Dick have understood one another since childhood; yet as man and woman they are ever verging on the subject of love without naming it. With an intense love of nature, and much poetry in her soul, Diana is yet practical; but when charged with this by her lover, she exclaims,

"It does annoy me when people divide humanity into bundles and ticket them. A practical woman—no sentiment, no feeling. A sensitive woman—no brains, and no reason. A pretty woman—no heart, and no sense."

She is, nevertheless, conscious that she is practical, but she does not like being described so in a sweeping kind of way. Miss Cross's three volumes are mainly occupied in tracing the devious fortunes of Diana and Dick, until the time comes when they can no longer resist the promptings of love, and realise the fact that life apart is impossible. Dick turns out a splendid fellow in the end. The story also traces in a minor degree the fortunes of Walter Moore, the betting youth, who, to account for his evil plight, asks a question which—apart from the question of names—may be regarded as a generic one for all his race: "Who the devil would have believed the Ruffian could have pulled the Perennial away from Dimity Pink?" Dick Outram behaves magnanimously to young Moore, and is largely instrumental in making him a decent member of society. Without being strikingly original, this novel is interesting, and far superior to the majority published every season.

The originality and picturesqueness of Mr. Pearce's Jaco Treloar are beyond question; but the British reader will be a little startled by its outspoken realism. The author describes his novel as "a study of a woman," and it certainly is a very intense and powerful study. Jaco Treloar is a Cornish woman of great animal beauty, a sort of splendid human panther; while her husband is an honest but loutish carpenter, of mean appearance, and of no particular individuality. Into their home comes the serpent in the shape of a lodger, the Rev. Mr. Smith, who soon begins to make love to the wife. His superiority to the average man in the little retired fishing village is so manifest that Jaco soon succumbs to his charms. Then he goes to London, and after a time writes her a letter to say that he is coming to fetch her to go off with him. This falls into the hands of the husband, who really worships his wife in his faithful dog-like way, and he murders the Rev. Mr. Smith under horrible circumstances. When Jaco discovers the tragedy, she provides another sensation by taking poison herself, so that the plot cannot be called very exhilarating. With regard to the heroine, the author gives us too much about "the peculiar warmth and abandon of her emotions, the luscious quality of the passion that thrilled her, and the sensuous charm of her nature as a whole." The curate, too, responds very eagerly to the amorous spell. Mr. Pearce calls a spade a spade in enforcing the contrast between Jaco and her sister-in-law Priscilla, and also in some other passages. But setting aside these things, the author reveals unusual power as a novelist, and may yet do first-class work. His descriptions of natural scenery, and his application of them to human circumstances, are admirable.

If Mr. Pearce's story is somewhat too sensuous, what shall be said of Irene Osgood's The Shadow of Desire? It simply astounds us that any woman could write such a book, and for the sake of our own countrywomen we are glad that it is by an American. Is she Miss or Mrs.? Among the characters in the story is Mr. Van Brent, an artist, "a sad-looking dark man, with the soft manners of a luxurious panther." His hobby was to hang up a human skeleton in his studio, head downwards, the skeleton being gilded all over. Of all the hideous nightmares in the shape of a book ever put before the public, surely Irene Osgood's takes the palm.

The Prologue to Waynflete, which relates how a ghostly tradition came to be associated with the Waynflete family, is a brief but graphic piece of writing. It tells how Guy Waynflete arrived too late to redeem the family estates in 1785, though he rode madly till past midnight. The galloping horseman was a spectre heard, if not seen, periodically ever afterwards. The story proper opens in 1885; and it shows how the Waynflete estates were redeemed through the energy of a female member of the family, while it also describes the curse which holds a young descendant, Guy Waynflete, as in a grip of iron. He makes terrible struggles to free himself from an evil apparition, his spiritual double; and, at length, with the aid of a girl, whom he marries, the fearsome spectre is exorcised for ever. The lighter parts of the book are furnished by some girl friends, one of whom is a writer of stories for the young, at a very precocious age. Indeed, at fifteen, she plans out her little stories and sketches like a regular bookseller's hack. When she gets older she goes to the University, but comes to the conclusion that university life is very narrow, and that "it is much easier to learn moral philosophy than to find it make any difference in one's life." Miss Coleridge's story is not at all of the common type, and it bears with it certain high moral lessons which can easily be apprehended by the sympathetic reader.

The hero of A Deformed Idol is "the most celebrated author of the season," and "almost as unapproachable as the Great Mogul," but he can talk twaddle and act foolishly notwithstanding. Harold Hooper, Q.C., a man equally celebrated at the bar, penetrates his sanctum, and inquires with worshipping enthusiasm "where the wonderful work was composed that created such a sensation." "At that desk," replied the great genius, pointing to a wide, old-fashioned desk, with its litter of letters and books, and a pile of blank MS. paper, Hooper invites the author to his place in Somersetshire. The best thing about "the author" is his unfaltering attachment to a girl who has lost the use of her lower limbs, but who happily recovers in an extraordinary manner. But the love passages in the story are very commonplace, as, indeed is the whole thing. It is dangerous to put celebrated men into books, for the public are pretty sure to be disappointed with them. We are not acquainted with Mr. Moran's other works, but there is nothing in this to lift it out of that ordinary run of novels which is so vast in extent.

The three sketches in Luke Sharp's volume, From Whose Bourn, &c., are some of the cleverest short stories which have been published for years. The first of them might be voted a little ultra-sensational, inasmuch as it shows us a man who has been poisoned still walking the earth as a spirit, and planning with other dead spirits how to bring the murderer to justice. But even this is decidedly clever. "One Day's Courtship" and "The Heralds of Fame" are stories of a wholly different type, permeated with genuine humour. Many of the author's sayings have the true epigrammatic ring about them. No reader of this volume can fail to enjoy a rich treat.

The two short stories in Mrs. Jamieson's little volume, entitled Mr. Mackenzie's Wedding, are just readable, wholesome sketches. If nothing can be said against them, neither can much be said for them, except that they are thoroughly pure in tone. As both are about wooing and wedding, they may be expected to commend themselves to young people of both sexes who are anxious to go and do likewise.

"Love will find out the way," says the old song; and it was a novel idea for Rita to make the hero in The Man in Possession—a gentleman of wealth and position—exchange places with the bailiff put into the house of Cornelius O'Brien, the father of the heroine. He assumes the clothes of the bailiff, but is nearly betrayed by his manners and appearance. Kate O'Brien is a delightful girl, with Irish beauty and Irish obstinacy, and there are also two good Americans in the story. One of these, Mrs. Lafaye, speedily finds out that things are all wrong between Kate and her lover Tom Rivers, and she prevents the former from throwing herself away on a drunken baronet. Ultimately peace is made, and those marry who ought, so that all ends smoothly. There is not much in this little volume, perhaps, but it is unquestionably very readable. Perhaps that is no empty compliment as things go.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

SOME VOLUMES OF VERSE.

Selections from the Poems of Walter C. Smith. (Glasgow: MacLehose.) The author of this book was happily inspired when he decided to fill it with lyrics from his longer works. Poetry by the league is dispiriting; even the fervent disciple of Browning must be somewhat baffled and brain-weary after twelve times twelve parassangs of The Ring and the Book. Much more comfort is there in the song that can be read in our chance little leisures—the song that goes with us to catch the early train, and that prettily pushes its music among our sheep-skin matters. It has been said of old that the goods of our neighbours shall not be envied. If a man's poems rank among his chattels, we often feel driven to break this commandment; and at this moment we confess to a similar wickedness. Dr. Walter C. Smith is often careless in his rhymes; not seldom he allows himself to sink in the quicksands of doggerel; he often breaks his measure, a very risky enterprise in a short song. Though these be great vices, there are virtues enough to counterbalance them. The absolutely perfect lyric is rare, but sprinkled not niggardly about these pages are lovely verses that are bridals of music and thought. Dr. Walter Smith is not of those who compel the muse, he responds to a genuine impulse. Here follows a poem, entitled "Scattered," that is sober in statement and beautiful in simple pathos:—

"Scattered to East and West and North,
Some with the faint heart, some the stout,
Each to the battle of life went forth,
And all alone we must fight it out.
"We had been gathered from cot and grange,
From the moorland farm and the terraced street,
Brought together by chances strange,
And knit together by friendship sweet.
"Not in the sunshine, not in the rain,
Not in the night of the stars untold,
Shall we ever all meet again,
Or be as we were in the days of old.

"But as ships cross, and more cheerily go,
Having changed tidings upon the sea,
So I am richer by them, I know,
And they are not poorer, I trust, by me."

There are some character sketches that are vivid enough, but not particularly poetical.

Teresa, and Other Poems. By James Rhoades. (Longmans.) "Teresa" is a tragedy in one act. Time: thirteenth century; afternoon. On the rising of the curtain two men-at-arms are discovered. These talk in what Mr. Rhoades is content to imagine thirteenth century lingo:

"First: I like not this office. Hast any liquor about thee?"

Second: Nay, I have not moistened these two hours."

This may have been the mode of men-at-arms six hundred years ago, but it has a mighty modern sound. It is the language of the pocket flask. It is flat nineteenth century. The question is, how could a man at arms have any liquor about him? Unless he had a secret wine-chamber in the top of his helmet, or a hollow butt to his weapon, we fail to be convinced of the truth of Mr. Rhoades's thirteenth century local colour. But "Teresa" has a middle and ending better than the beginning, though we marvel at the expedition with which the enraged Count Carlo got his battering rams into position and at work, for the whole tragedy is one of an afternoon. When we turn to the shorter poems we are entertained with finer fare. Mr. Rhoades has natural themes, and he dresses them with words as only a poet can. A wise melancholy is the note he has chosen. He has no high flights, no fervours; but, using a dignified and scholarly utterance, he moves easily along and takes us with him as very glad companions. Of the twenty-two sonnets, most of which are decidedly above the average lately maintained, we quote "Dawn":

"At every tick of time—when eve is grey,
When skies are scorched with noon or blurred with night,
Somewhere, on opening wings of early light,
The young dawn breaketh; without haste or stay
Moves the bright wizard on his lustral way To wind-blown seas, or cities glimmering white.
Hamlet and homestead, or bleak mountain height,
Or misty vale, each moment bringing day.
O midnight watcher, woe-distraught and sick
Of the blind heaven, whose very hopes do lour
Like clouds upon thee palpable and thick,
Thyself thy sole horizon!—in that hour
Be such sweet thought thy pillow; 'twill have power
To cleanse and calm and make thee catholic."

Spretæ Carmina Musæ. By Pakenham Beatty. (Bell.) These are songs of love and death, songs of the sea, songs of the street. Cupid is becomingly bitted, and sorrow is made to heed Mr. Beatty's rein. Throughout this book the quality of restraint is present in a marked degree, showing that the author has at the very beginning one of the poetic talents at his disposal. But other talents have been given to him: imagination, expression, form; and as it is not difficult, in turning over these one hundred and forty handmade paper pages, to find instances of genuine poetry, we wonder whether these are in reality the outpourings of a muse that has failed of due appreciation, or whether Mr. Beatty's title is a reflection of native melancholy. There is no doubt that much of the verse in this book betrays the writer's favourite poetical authors. He sometimes echoes bigger bards, though his subjects and style of thought are freer from this reproach than his methods of expression. In many places it is plain to see that an enthusiasm for Swinburne is a light to rule Mr. Beatty's day. It must not be thought, however, that the debt is a large one; perhaps it is as small as any fervent disciple of a prophet could contract. But Mr. Beatty is catholic. There is one dedication to Browning, another to Richard Hengist Horne (every tender mention of this almost forgotten poet is a service to literature), and a quotation from Paul Verlaine; but the master who has most controlled this author's lyre has nothing uttered for him alone. The dedication to Browning is both wise and musical:

"None love in vain; for God, who will not take His least gift back, takes not this heavenliest one;
None of his faithful will Love's heart forsake,
Though death make dumb the spring and dark the sun.

The dead are always with us everywhere,
Unseen of mortal eyes, yet unremoved,
Those gracious ghosts that make the twilight fair,
The souls that lighted ours, and hearts that loved."

No nightingale sings for the rose alone,
But the least leaf may share his gift of song;
So, while the many mourners make their moan,
I, least of all who loved thee, shall not wrong

Thy fame, when these have left thee with thy peers

Nor of thy spirit be misunderstood
That bring thee my Love's gift of song and tears—
I give my best, and each heart's best is good."

Songs and Sonnets. By Mathilde Blind. (Chatto & Windus.) We turned to this volume with a very lively interest, for Miss Mathilde Blind's name is an earnest of sensible song, musically expressed. The lover of poetry does not hesitate when his bookseller brings to his notice a fresh contribution from such an undoubted source. We are not able to say that all we hoped was answered by the contents of Songs and Sonnets. There are beautiful utterances and measures scholarly treated, but some of the poems are distinctly little in theme, and almost valueless in an intellectual sense. Take for instance "A Parting." The literary machinery of the song is as old as the hills. This is no fault, of course, but it handicaps an author by making freshness of treatment an essential. But the similes are also as old as the hills; and, as Miss Blind has chosen a particularly common metre, there is nothing left to redeem the lyric from insignificance. Nor does "A Parting" stand alone as a failure. A wiser generosity in awarding the right to appear had made Songs and Sonnets a finer book. A section of this book is entitled "Love in Exile." We quote number eight of the series for two reasons. Firstly, it has a loveliness of its own; secondly, it makes a notable contrast to the poem we were depreciating a moment ago. Again the material is of the world-without-end order; but the comparative rareness of the metre, the delicate treatment, the natural magic of the pathos, make it full fifty times worthier than "A Parting."

"I am athirst, but not for wine;
The drink I long for is divine,
Poured only from your eyes in mine.

"I hunger, but the bread I want,
Of which my blood and brain are scant,
Is your sweet speech, for which I pant.

"I am a-cold and lagging lame,
Life creeps along my languid frame,
Your love will fan it into flame."

The especially critical critic will doubtless have two objections to make. To our thinking they should not be insisted on. The "L'Envoi" contains three absolutely exquisite verses.

In the Garden of Dreams. Lyrics and Sonnets. By Louise Chandler Moulton. (Macmillans.) So few lyrics, so many sonnets! A simple application of arithmetic, however, proves that the numbers are nearer together than the mere impression persuaded us. We have read every one of the sixty sonnets, and have found some refreshing indeed; but many—too many—are of a mediocrity that is foreign to the responsibility of those who will pour out the vials of their poetry in this difficult form. Lyres that have very little secrets of song can charm us through an afternoon, if only they will not dare to expose the boundary of their power by strumming us a sonnet. Mrs. Moulton's lyre is not little. It has played for us haunting songs, and we grow fretful, baulked of them. Her sonnets are not remarkable, though thought and expression often go gloriously hand in hand. We could spare plenty that stands between pp. 72 and 144. We love more—although it jars a little by reason of the liberties Mrs. Moulton has allowed herself—such verse as this:

"Round among the quiet graves,
When the sun was low,
Love went grieving,—Love who saves:
Did the sleepers know?"

"At his touch the flowers awoke,
At his tender call
Birds into sweet singing broke,
And it did befall

"From the blooming, bursting sod
All Love's dead arose,
And went flying up to God
By a way Love knows."

The book is beautifully illustrated.

Swallow Flights. By Louise Chandler Moulton. (Macmillans.) Swallow Flights, with the exception of ten additional pieces, is a new edition of poems published sixteen years ago. In the Garden of Dreams is, for the most part, of a sorrowful tone. There are phantoms fitting from page to page; there are regrets in plenty, all very tenderly touched. The old book is not so sad, for it is natural that in our earlier years hope should be a morning glory and a summer in itself. At the very beginning there is the glow of younger days, and the faults of the spring period are also present. Is not the trip of delight almost audible in the following verses?

"If you catch a breath of sweetness,
And follow the odoriferous hint
Through woods where the dead leaves rustle
And the golden mooses glint,

"Along the spicy sea-coast,
Over the desolate down,
You will find the dainty May flowers
When you come to Plymouth town.

"Where the shy spring tends her darlings,
And hides them away from sight,
Pull off the covering leaf sprays
And gather them, pink and white."

Though sorrow peeps now and again from this volume, Mrs. Moulton gives it no long entertainment. We are in sunshine among the flowers; and the atmosphere of warm air and cowslip breath is so cunningly suggested that we more and more regret that in these times Mrs. Moulton has elected to desert the slender lance of a country lyric for the battering-ram of the sonnet. NORMAN GALE.

NOTES AND NEWS.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE, whose activity as an author is only less remarkable than his activity as an Indian administrator and as a member of parliament, has in the press a new book—the second for this year—to be entitled Life in Parliament: a record of the daily experiences of a member of the House of Commons, from 1886 to 1892 inclusive. It will be published in the autumn by Mr. John Murray.

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press an illustrated volume, entitled Memorials of St. James's Palace, by the Rev. James Edgar Sheppard, sub-dean of the Chapel Royal.

THE first publication of the Navy Records Society will be the official documents relating to the fleet commanded by Lord Howard, of Effingham, in 1587-8, edited by Prof. Laughton. Mr. Hannay will edit Lord Hood's letters from the West Indies in 1781-2; and Mr. Clements Markham will undertake the Memoir of Captain Stephen Martin, brother-in-law and flag captain of Sir John Leake during the wars of William III. and Anne.

MR. JOSEPH POLLARD, of Truro, announces for publication, by subscription, a monograph on early Christianity in Cornwall, with legends of the Cornish saints, by Mr. William C. Borlase. This originally appeared some years ago in the Journal of the Royal Institution of Cornwall. It has now been revised and enlarged, and an index has been added. There will also be an etched frontispiece, after an original drawing by Dr. Borlase, as well as other illustrations.

THE unabridged translation of the Neapolitan Pentamerone, by the late Sir Richard Burton, which Messrs. Henry & Co. have in the press, will be issued in a limited edition to subscribers only.

MR. WILLIAM CONNOR SYDNEY has in the press a study of the condition of the English people during the early decades of the present century, in continuation of his two former volumes on the England of the eighteenth century. Like those, the forthcoming book will contain much curious information gleaned from recondite sources.

MESSRS. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS announce for immediate publication Glimpses of Church and Social Life in the Highlands in Olden Times, by Mr. Alexander Macpherson, F.S.A., Scotland. It will be a small quarto volume, with illustrations.

THE concluding volume of the Prose Works of Heinrich Heine, translated by Mr. Charles Godfrey Leland, containing The Salon, is published to-day by Mr. Heinemann. This completes the first series, in eight volumes, comprising the Prose. The second series, of four volumes, will contain the Poetry.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL will publish during this month Our Ocean Railways; or, the Rise, Progress, and Development of Steam Navigation, by Mr. A. F. Macdonald, with maps and illustrations.

THE next volume in the series of "Rulers of India," to be published immediately, is Lord Clive, written by Colonel G. B. Malletson, who possesses an unrivalled knowledge of the military operations of that time.

Mediaeval Music: an historical sketch, by Mr. R. C. Hope, will be published shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock. The work contains a history of early church music, with numerous illustrations.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. will publish in August The Duties of a Citizen, a handbook for teachers, in exact accordance with the new code for evening schools. The work is by Dr. J. E. Parrott, head master under the Liverpool School Board.

THE Leadenhall Press will issue at once Mr. Jerome K. Jerome's "Novel Notes," which have been appearing in the Idler during the last twelve months.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will shortly add to their "Silver Library" cheap editions of Richard Jefferies's Wood Magic, with a frontispiece and vignette by E. V. B.; and of Mr. Andrew Lang's Custom and Myth, with fifteen illustrations.

MR. ARTHUR S. SALMON contributes to the forthcoming number of the Religious Review of Reviews a paper on some English poets who were also clergymen.

A NEW firm of publishers will begin business in the autumn, in Craven-street, Strand, under the style of Messrs. Bliss, Sands & Foster. We understand that all the partners of the new firm were for some time with Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench & Co., before the recent amalgamation; and that, furthermore, Mr. Bliss has been for two and a half years with Mr. Fisher Unwin.

DR. Y. SARRUF, the editor of Al-Muktataf, has just arrived in London, after having made a tour of the principal cities of Europe. From this country he will proceed to Chicago. Dr. Sarruf is also joint editor and proprietor of the daily Al-Mokattam, which is considered to be the leading native newspaper in Egypt, as Al-Muktataf is the leading scientific and literary monthly. This periodical, founded about twenty years ago, was the first to introduce the latest developments of Western thought and achievement to the Arabic-speaking world.

THE modest and retiring nature of the late Mr. H. D. Darbishire, and his signal worth as a scholar, have received due recognition in the obituary notices published in the ACADEMY and elsewhere. Another instance may be added to the brief record of his services to literature. He rendered assistance of the most important and laborious kind to Mr. John O'Neill, in connexion with the philological investigations upon which that gentleman's Night of the Gods is largely based: but he would not allow any acknowledgment to be made.

WE hear that Miss Arabella Kenealy, the author of Dr. Janet of Harley Street, entered the medical profession with the express intention of bringing its resources to bear upon fiction.

THE August number of the New Review contains a contemporary French account of the Battle of the Nile, presumably written by an eye-witness, from which we extract the passage relating to Cassabianca:

"Commodore Cassabianca and his son, only ten years old, who during the action gave proofs of bravery and intelligence far above his years, were not so fortunate. They were in the water, on the wreck of L'Orient's masts, seeking each other, not being able to swim, until three-quarters past ten o'clock, when the ship blew up and put an end to their hopes and fears."

MR. FRANK T. SALVIN, of Shaftesbury-avenue, has sent a catalogue of rare books, such as the modern bibliophile most affects. Here may be found first editions of Dickens and Thackeray, and volumes with illustrations by Rowlandson, Cruikshank, Phiz, and Leech. Still more noticeable are the extra-illustrated works: Hawkins's Life of Edmund Kean, extended to ten folio volumes, by the addition of portraits, views, autograph letters, playbills, &c.; the Works of Sir Walter Scott, and the Life of Dickens, similarly "grangerised." Some might prefer the copy of Adam Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments, presented by Burns to James Riddell, with the inscription—

"Had I another Friend more truly mine,
More lov'd, more trusted, this had ne'er been thine."

or, possibly, a printed school-list of the Charterhouse in 1824, containing the names of Thackeray and Martin Tupper; or, again, a collection of fifty-six autograph letters of Dickens, ranging in date from 1842 to 1869.

WE suppose that no novel of modern times has been more popular than Lorna Doone. Though comparatively unsuccessful when it first appeared, in three volumes, in 1869, it has since had the honour of an edition de luxe, with numerous illustrations; and it has almost done for Exmoor what "The Lady of the Lake" did for the Trossachs: that is to say, create a fictitious topography for the benefit of tourists. The edition now before us, which boasts of being the thirty-eighth, has one special attraction, if otherwise cheap and common. It has for frontispiece an admirable portrait of the author, reproduced by heliogravure—not by photogravure, as stated on the title-page; but we are sure that none will regret more than Mr. Blackmore himself that the work has had to be done in Paris. The portrait is the more welcome, because Mr. Blackmore's face is scarcely known, even in literary circles. He will not mind our saying that he looks, in his old age, like one of his own West country yeomen.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE University of Edinburgh has conferred the honorary degree of LL.D. upon the following:—Prof. A. Anwers, of Berlin; Mr. J. Sutherland Black, assistant editor of the Encyclopædia Britannica; Sir Stuart Knill, Lord Mayor of London; and Dr. Littlejohn, president of the British Institute of Public Health.

LINCOLN College, Oxford—whose statutes are not derived from the last University Commission—proposes to elect to a fellowship without examination, tenable for four years. Candidates must undertake to perform a definite literary or scientific work, to be approved by the college.

MR. A. J. BATHER, of King's College, Cambridge, has been appointed to a studentship in the British School at Athens.

WE may be permitted to draw attention to the fact that, in the recent "Greats" class list at Oxford, Trinity is represented by five names, a larger number than any other college can boast.

DR. JOSEPH OGILVIE has been appointed lecturer on the theory, art, and history of education at Aberdeen, with a stipend of £150 a year. The University Court has also resolved to raise the matriculation fee from £1 to £1 5s., and the fee on taking the degree of M.A., from £3 3s. to £3 5s. It is estimated that the former change will produce an additional sum of £200 a year, which is to be applied "for the social and physical welfare of the students."

MR. G. GREGORY SMITH, formerly of Balliol College, Oxford, and now lecturer in rhetoric and English literature at Edinburgh, is a candidate for the English chair at Aberdeen, vacant by the death of Prof. Minto.

THE results of the LL.A. examination at the University of St. Andrews, which was held in June at forty-five different centres, have just been issued. It appears that there were 775 candidates this year, as compared with 699 in 1892, and 636 in 1891; 276 candidates entered for the first time; and 110 candidates, having passed in the full number of subjects required for the LL.A. diploma, are entitled to receive it. From the commencement of the scheme in 1877, 2905 candidates in all have entered for this examination. In 1895 there will be important changes introduced, making certain subjects obligatory for the diploma.

THE one hundred and first number of the Eagle—a magazine supported by members of St. John's College, Cambridge—contains several articles of interest. First, there is an account, from the college muniments, of the dissolution of the Benedictine nunnery of Higham, near Rochester, the estates of which, originally given by the Lady Margaret, were ultimately acquired by the college through the good offices of Bishop Fisher. Two documents here printed at length are: (1) a service for the commemoration of benefactors (circa 1470), which adds a number of names to the list of prioresses given by Dugdale; and (2) a list of pittances or allowances to the nuns on certain church festivals, also of the fifteenth century. The editor is unable to explain the Norman-French word which he reads as elur or e flur. Next, follow some notes on the early history of rowing—not of rowing on the Cam, but on the Nile by the ancient Egyptians, who are presumed to have taught the art to the Phoenicians, from whom the Greeks in their turn learnt it. Then, we have the text of a letter in the handwriting of Sir Isaac Newton, about the Moon's Theory, which has recently been presented to the college library by the widow of Prof. Adams, to whom it had been given by Sir David Brewster. And, finally, in continuation of former lists, there is printed a list of successive occupants of rooms in the First Court of the college. Among the names are those of Lord Palmerston, Bishop Selwyn, and Dean Ramsay. But by far the most notable is that of Wordsworth, whose garret is now in process of being destroyed, in order to supply better accommodation for the college kitchen.

We may mention here that the last part of Archæologia Aeliana—which has been more than once called in the ACADEMY the best journal published by any local society of antiquaries—contains the report of an Oxford bursar's journey into Northumberland in 1464, the year of the battle of Hexham. It was the bursar of Merton, who went to visit the college estates at Embleton, where the present bishop of Peterborough was some time vicar. He was away altogether for about two months, and his total expenses amounted to £6 7s. 8d. The average rate of travelling, on horse-back, was between twenty and thirty miles a day. We meet with one word that is new to us. At Newburgh, two pence is paid for minshynys, which the editor (Mr. Edward Bateson) explains as a provincial word meaning "a small piece as applied to food." Hungry children, on receiving a small piece, say "what a minchin to give me." Another curious item is half-a-crown pro maledictione, perhaps a form of exorcism. Mr. Bateson found the document, which he here prints in full, among the archives of Merton College, where he was searching for materials for a history of Embleton.

We hear that Dr. Otto Jespersen—author of a remarkable treatise on the Cases in English—has been appointed to the chair of English in Copenhagen, which has been so long held by that veteran scholar, Prof. George Stephens.

THROUGH the generosity of an anonymous benefactor, the library of the late Prof. Zarncke has been presented to Cornell University. The collection consists of about 13,000 volumes, including about 6000 unbound pamphlets, &c. Prof. Zarncke was for many years editor of the Litterarisches Centralblatt, in addition to being professor of the Germanic languages at Leipzig. His library includes not only a large number of works on German, English, Scandinavian, and Romance philology; but also special collections relating to Lessing, Goethe, Schiller, and Christian Reuter (Schellmuffsky), and to the history of universities. Another valuable gift to the library of Cornell has come from Prof. William Fiske, well-known as a resident of Florence, and as the author of some admirable privately-printed bibliographies. He has already sent about 550 volumes and pamphlets relating to Dante, and he promises to send more, collected in London and Paris.

THE old Sorbonne at Paris is now in process of being destroyed, and the faculties have already moved into their new quarters. M. Oct. Gréard has taken the opportunity to publish a memorial volume, Nos Adieux à la Vieille

Sorbonne, illustrated with engravings and plans. He traces the history of the institution from its foundation by Robert Sorbon, in the thirteenth century, as a hall for indigent theological students; its reorganisation by Richelieu; its disappearance under the First Empire, when the buildings became a museum of art and a home for artists; and its restoration in 1821. To a considerable extent, M. Gréard's work is based upon documents that have never before been published.

A GREEK EPIGRAM BY PROF. LUSHINGTON.

TO A LADY WHO ASKED HIM TO WRITE HER EPIGRAPH.

[A CORRESPONDENT, who has taken pains to be well-informed, communicates to us the following Greek epigram, written by the late Prof. E. L. Lushington.]

πᾶς ἐπικηδεῖον τεύξω σοι, πάτνια, θρήνον, ἢ παρέδροι χάριτες ζῶσιν ἀειθάλας;
ἡβῶσαν ψυχὴν τίς δὲν οὐκ ἀγάσαιο νεάνις,

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

IN the Antiquary for August (Elliot Stock) Mr. Hope continues his very useful notes on the Holy Wells of Scotland, without by any means exhausting the subject. As, however, this is, so far as we know, the first attempt to classify the scattered facts as to well-lore, it must be regarded as doing the compiler no little credit. We wonder whether he has examined the late Bishop Forbes's "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," a learned quarto published some twenty years ago. If our memory does not fail us, the Bishop mentions Scottish wells dedicated to Saints Aidan, Mungo, Ninian, and many other Northern worthies of whom little is known beyond vague traditions of their holiness. There are several wells, we believe, under the patronage of "The nine maidens," concerning whom nothing credible has come down to us. Mr. J. Lewis André, in a paper all too short, draws attention to two mutilated fonts, one of which had, when perfect, the labours of the twelve months of the year around its bowl. Mutilated, as it now is, we fear it may soon perish. Will not some one cause what is left to be engraved? The late James Fowler published in the Archæologia (vol. xlv.) all that was known in his time about English representations of this nature, but we do not think that he made any mention of the font at Ingoldsthorpe. Mr. John Ward's account of the college museum at Cheltenham does not give us any ardent desire to inspect the collection. Mr. Peacock has here concluded his paper relating to Gainsborough during the Civil War, 1642-1648.

THE ORIGIN OF THE PETER-GOSPEL.

II.

THUS far I have been examining the deviations from the canonical narrative which illustrate pseudo-Peter's anti-Judaic bias. Once the initial step is taken of exculpating Pilate and his legationaries, all the rest follows inevitably. And if, in addition to the canonical gospels, we accredit him with earlier gospels behind, of such a character as I have suggested, we see that there were loopholes left by which, motivated as he was, he could work to his conclusions.

I come now to the examination of a second and more important class of deviations—more important because no "tendency" motive is discoverable.

1. Pseudo-Peter times Joseph's request for the body soon after the condemnation, before, or at the very beginning of, the crucifixion. I suppose this is because he identifies Joseph's request with the Jews' request to Pilate, made while Christ is still alive, that the bodies may not remain on the cross—a request which pseudo-Peter is unable to reproduce for the reason before mentioned, that Pilate has shuffled off all responsibility. That is to say, pseudo-Peter identifies requests which in the Fourth Gospel are distinguished. But once admit the possibility that these two requests were originally found in different gospels, and pseudo-Peter's relationship to the Fourth Gospel becomes explicable. Now this estimate of John xix. 31-42 is considerably supported by the inconsistency of Mark xv. 42-47 with Matt. xxvii. 57-61. According to one primitive document, it would seem that Joseph took action "because it was the preparation" (i.e., that the Jewish law might not be broken), and soon enough to excite Pilate's wonder. According to the other, because he was actually a disciple, and "when the evening was already come." In this connexion the inconsistency of John xix. 31, 33, with Mark xv. 44, 45, is noteworthy; also Acts xiii. 29, blending the action of the Jews and of Joseph: "They (the Jews) took Him down from the tree (v. r. asked of Pilate that they might take Him down) and they laid Him in a tomb." Thus extenuating circumstances are apparent for pseudo-Peter's departure from the canonical arrangement. Moreover, some interval was necessarily allowed for Pilate's communication with Herod.

2. To take another point: pseudo-Peter throws the three mockeries into one. The actors, as said before, are Herod's men of war. But their outrages are mainly those of Pilate's soldiers. And the challenge addressed to Christ, κρίνε, is contributed by the High Priest's servants. Here, again, pseudo-Peter is identifying "doublets," identifying events which in the canonical gospels are distinguished, for, of the three mockeries, each of the canonical evangelists—the fourth rather doubtfully—records two. Christ may have been mocked three times, but it is easy to conceive that the primitive evangelists would content themselves with recording a single instance. And it is exceedingly likely from the nature of the case—for Christ was deserted by His followers—that there were doubts from the very first as to whether this or that particular outrage took place in the palace of Caiaphas or Herod or Pilate.

A very similar inference is suggested also by pseudo-Peter's treatment of the trial scenes. He throws the three trials of the canonical narrative into one, making Herod and Pilate, as said before, sit together, and putting the members of the Sanhedrim by their side as assessors. I have shown recently from a comparison of three authorities which employ the Peter-Gospel (viz., Pilate-Nicodemus documents, Didascalia, Lactantius) that he must also have blended the religious and political accusations, making the two false witnesses appear before Pilate, and transferring to that occasion the High Priest's adjuration.

But there is another remark to be made with regard to the mockery: pseudo-Peter makes scarcely any break between the Praetorium and Calvary, so producing an impression that Christ was only strip of His garments once, and came to Calvary wearing the purple and the crown of thorns. Moreover, he refers the piercing (υἱ) to the earlier occasion. Now the canonical statement that the soldiers re-clothed Christ in His own garments before leading Him away for crucifixion—Matthew xxvii. 31, Mark xv. 20—is an obvious introduction to the subsequent record of a division of His garments; and if the intervenient section (Simon of Cyrene) be assigned to another source, the reclothing might well be an addition of the redactor's—consequently a detail which pseudo-Peter could ignore.

And it may also be noticed that one of the authorities employed by St. Luke transposes to Calvary the soldiers' mock approach, προσερχόμενοι (cf. γυναικῶν), and also, according to a v. r., which probably belongs to the same authority, the mock salutation, χαῖρε, and the thorn crown. Hence the sequence of events probably appeared to pseudo-Peter to be very doubtful, and this may be the excuse for his startling departure from the canonical narrative in transferring the piercing (ρύσις) from Calvary to the Praetorium. Here, however, the critical significance attaching to pseudo-Peter's action is very slight. For there is an obvious tendency motive to explain. The piercing in John xix. being physical evidence of death, and in Matthew xxviii. 49, v. r. apparently the immediate cause of death, the incident in its canonical setting would in either case be displeasing to pseudo-Peter, who, as we know from external testimony, was a Docetist. The effusion of blood would be avoided for similar reasons to those which dictate pseudo-Isaiah's account of the bloodless parturition. One can only say, therefore, that in substituting a light skin-deep wound in the Praetorium for the deep spear thrust on Calvary, pseudo-Peter need not have been doing so much violence to his authorities as if he had only the canonical gospels and not the documents beneath them to work upon. The important prophecy in Zechariah prevented his omitting the ρύσις entirely.

3. To take another point—the guard set on Friday evening. How comes pseudo-Peter with this impression in the face of Matthew xxvii. 62, where it is expressly stated that the guard was set on the "morrow, which is after the preparation?" Certainly it is an improvement, for according to St. Matthew the sepulchre is already closed, and the Jews merely seal the stone. For aught they know the sepulchre may be empty and the body already stolen. But deliberate improvement is the last resource we must appeal to. Well, in the first place, it may be noticed that the phrase "morrow, which is after the preparation" is slightly ambiguous. Why not understand it in the Jewish sense, after six o'clock on Friday evening? Pseudo-Peter would be especially disposed to do so, having already, as said before, determined in his mind that the subsequent phrase, ὅτι Σάββατον, signified Saturday evening about five; and he would naturally be reluctant to imagine that the same writer implied the same day in both cases. Secondly, let us suppose that pseudo-Peter found the text about Joseph rolling the great stone to the door of the sepulchre in one authority and the guard section in another. He might then interpret "they made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone" as implying also closure. He might partially identify the act of Joseph and the act of the guards, strengthened in doing so by the size of the stone, "one which twenty men could scarcely roll" (Luke xxiii. 53, v. r.). This is what he has done. The guards, not Joseph, place the stone in position, on Friday evening, not Saturday.

4. To take another point. Pseudo-Peter reproduces the penitent thief's first utterance with suggestive variations, omitting a word characteristic of St. Luke (ἀποποιῶν) and making the thief address the rebuke not to his fellow, but to the Jews below. Now let us suppose that the document behind Luke xxiii. read, as pseudo-Peter does, τί ἠδίκησεν, and omitted the introductory clause—"Dost thou not fear God, seeing that we are in the same condemnation?" Here we have an utterance capable of being interpreted either as St. Luke interprets it, or as pseudo-Peter. Moreover, it is widely admitted that St. Luke's Gospel is a redaction of two quite distinct and independent documents, St. Mark and another, and as it is the latter that gives us the penitent thief's utterance, and in the former we are told that the thieves reproached Christ, it seems not unlikely that the contrast between the penitence of the one and the impenitence of the other is due to St. Luke himself.

5. Another point. I have shown at the beginning of this article, from a comparison of authorities which employ the Peter-Gospel—viz., Barnabas and the Edessan writers—that pseudo-Peter must have made Christ remain on earth for fifty days and ascend on the Day of Pentecost (Sunday). But the synoptic gospels agree in making the Passover fall on Thursday; consequently, the Day of Pentecost would be a Saturday. How beautifully this is corroborated by Acts i. 12—originally found, we may believe, at the termination of one of the early Gospels—"Then returned they to Jerusalem [cf. Luke xxiv. 52] from the Mount of Olives, which is distant from Jerusalem a Sabbath day's journey." Pseudo-Peter then adopted the term of fifty days from some gospel behind St. Luke, and his further notion that it was on a Sunday, not a Saturday, that Christ ascended arises from his acceptance of the Johannine date of the Passover.

Enough has now been said to indicate the direction in which the "why and wherefore" of pseudo-Peter's aberrations is to be sought; and similar explanations to those above given will account for his placing the offer of vinegar before the cry, "Eli, Eli," for his making that cry the last, and for his identification of the offer of vinegar on the cross with the previous offer of gall (cf. Matt. xxvii. 34).

We are now in a position to sum the matter up. Pseudo-Peter has shown no sign of any original, independent tradition. His narrative, compared with the canonical, has, as a whole, an obviously secondary character. But occasions arise in which it is either necessary to explain his action by the scheme of gospel formation above proposed, or to exmachinate the rough and ready hypothesis of deliberate falsification and purposeless invention.

But will it work, this proposed scheme? I can only say that in my book, The Formation of the Gospels, published before the news was received of the recovery of the Peter-Gospel, and solely on internal evidence, I proposed an analysis of the Synoptic Gospels exactly on the lines which the Peter-Gospel is now seen to require.

It is more especially to the results of this analysis in the Resurrection chapters, Matt. xxviii., Mark xvi., Luke xxiv., John xx., xxi., that I desire to call attention. I showed, from the principles of analysis adopted, that in one of the primitive documents, the document which related the call of "Levi, son of Alphaeus, 1. Peter's visit to the sepulchre followed immediately on the angel's message, "Tell His disciples and Peter that they depart into Galilee," and that when it is subsequently stated that Peter "went to his own home," it was the Galilaean home that was intended. 2. That the appearance to Peter mentioned in Luke xxiv. 34 and 1 Corinthians, xv. 5, took place not in Jerusalem and on Easter Day, but some time afterwards in Galilee, and that a faint impression of it survived in John xxi. 3. That the other Apostles withdrew to Galilee, too, not in consequence of the injunction, but in the same state of mind as Peter, and re-gathered in Capernaum at the news of Peter's vision. 4. That it was in Galilee that Christ "opened their hearts that they might understand." 5. That the journey to Bethany, mentioned in Luke xxiv. 50, was from Galilee, not Jerusalem, and was undertaken just before Pentecost. (That pseudo-Peter's lost termination took the direction above indicated, I have shown in the Athenaeum article before referred to, by quotation from authorities which employ the Peter-Gospel.) And I summed up the history thus:—

"The women from the sepulchre were disbelieved. Cleophas and his companion were disbelieved too. And then the Apostles separated everyone to his own Galilaean home, wondering at the strange termination of their dream, wondering and despondent. Peter resumed his fishing. Yet the task of establishing faith was his. Suddenly the startling intelligence was bruited abroad that Christ was risen indeed, had appeared to Peter. In Capernaum the Eleven again met together, and Christ showed Himself in their midst. . . . Then with their hearts high, anticipating an immediate restoration of the kingdom to Israel, the Apostles journeyed back to the capital. They felt that again the Master was going before as their guide. Over against Bethany the last manifestation took place. And the Pentecostal gifts came as a proof of Christ's reception into heaven."

F. P. BADHAM.

THE SHELLEY COLLECTION IN THE BODLEIAN.

LADY SHELLEY has given to the Bodleian Library, on conditions, an extensive collection of MSS. relating to the late Percy Bysshe Shelley and his wife Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, consisting of letters written by them or addressed to them, as well as original MSS. of Shelley's poems, and the original Diary kept by Mrs. Shelley, together with a number of copies of the impression of the same privately printed by the late Sir Percy Shelley.

The principal conditions which Lady Shelley desires to be strictly observed are: that all these documents, except MSS. of poems and such letters as have already been printed by Mrs. Shelley in her edition of her husband's prose works or in Prof. Dowden's Life, should until the centenary of Shelley's death in 1922 be kept apart, and not be allowed to be seen by any person except the Curators and Bodley's Librarian, and that no copy of any portion of them should be taken by any one.

After July 8, 1922, permission to inspect these papers may be granted by the Curators, provided that an application is laid before them at their regular meetings and that the applicant is known to them or some of them. Permission to copy is to be the subject of a distinct application, and is not to be conceded unless the Curators are unanimous in approving of it. The same conditions are to apply to the printed volumes above mentioned as to the MSS. matter.

In the event of any change taking place in the constitution of the Bodleian Library, the above conditions are to be specially binding upon the new governing body as upon the present Curators and their successors.

A copy of the conditions on which the gift is made and accepted are to be deposited along with the reserved MSS.

The following MSS., printed books, and portraits were given to the Bodleian Library, Oxford, by Jane, Lady Shelley, on June 13, 1893, being delivered by her personally to the Librarian in person.

1.—VOLUMES GIVEN UNDER CONDITION.

"Title on back 'Percy Bysshe Shelley—Letters.' Contains also many letters by Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley and others, and memoranda by Dr. Richard Garnett. The entire contents have been foliated by the Librarian, in pencil, and he has verified the foliation: they number 563 leaves, not counting the list of contents let into the inside of the front cover.

"Shelley and Mary," 2 vols., 8°, printed 'for private circulation only,' (no place stated, preface dated 'Shelley House, Chelsea Embankment, January 1st, 1882.')

"Vol. 2 contains 2 blank flyleaves + titlepage + pages numbered 467-488, 488 A and B, 489-532, 532 A, a blank page unnumbered, 533-580, 580 A-C, a blank page unnumbered, 581-698, 698 A-E, a blank page unnumbered, 699-704, 704 A-C, a blank page unnumbered, 705-798, 798 A, a blank page unnumbered, 799-802, 802 A, a blank page unnumbered, 803-824, 824 A and B, 825-840, 840 A and B, 841-904, 904 A-C, a blank page unnumbered, 905-908 + 2 blank flyleaves. There are occasional corrections or notes, in the writing of Jane, Lady Shelley.

"The two volumes comprise Shelley and Mary's journal-book, with letters from and to them—all the letters and other documents of a biographical character at present in the hands of Shelley's representatives"—prepared for the press by Lady Shelley, and with a preface by 'Percy F. Shelley' i.e., Sir Percy Florence Shelley.

II.—OTHER VOLUMES.

- "The Witch of Atlas, &c. 156 leaves.
- "Mythological dramas. 36 leaves.
- "Part of the Revolt of Islam, with the preface and part of the dedication to Mary. 31 leaves.
- "Prometheus Unbound. 3 vols. 46 + 43 + 38 leaves.
- "Essay on Christianity, and various poems. 85 leaves.
- "Stanzas written in dejection 'and 'To a faded violet.' 2 leaves. Placed between glass.
- "A Defence of Poetry, pt. 1. 16 leaves.
- "A letter to Lord Ellenborough. [1812.]
- "The necessity of atheism. [1811.]
- "An address to the Irish people. 1812. With Shelley's autograph on title.
- "Proposals for an association. [1812.]
- "On the devil, and devils (27 leaves of proofs with MS. corrections and additions).
- "Sophocles Tragedies septem. 2 vols in 1. Oxon. 1809. The copy found in Shelley's hand at his death.

III.—PORTRAITS.

- "Copy, by Reginald Easton, of the Duc de Montpensier's miniature of Shelley. Framed on a gilt stand in a velvet case.
- "Copy in crayons of Miss Curran's oil-portrait of Shelley."

CORRESPONDENCE.

PROF. SAYCE AND THE "EDINBURGH REVIEW."

Christ's College, Cambridge: July 31, 1893.

In 1891 Prof. Sayce, translating No. 92, l. 16, of the Berlin collection of tablets from Tell-el-Amarna, wrote "Why dost thou not eat his stomach before thy king." Being challenged for this rendering in the Edinburgh Review, he appeals to a familiar Aramaic idiom which occurs in Daniel iii. 8, according to which the sense of the phrase on the tablet is "why dost thou not accuse him." There is no doubt that this is right, and indeed the passage has already been so translated by M. Halévy in Journ. As., ser 8, vol. xviii., p. 176; but in accepting the right translation Prof. Sayce has not withdrawn his old rendering, and leaves the readers of the ACADEMY to believe that the metaphorical phrase which Aramaeans and Assyrians use for "accusing a man," means literally "eating his stomach."

This, I venture to say, is impossible. If karzi in the line of the tablet means "stomach," it is a variant form of Assyrian karsu, Aramaic karsû. But if the phrase means "to accuse," karzi answers to Aramaic garçû, with guttural k and emphatic s. These two explanations are absolutely inconsistent, for they trace the word karzi to two distinct Semitic roots. I conceive, therefore, that Prof. Sayce would have put his present correct view of the passage on a better footing, if he had admitted that in his first translation he made a slip.

I may add that the very irregular spelling of the Amarna tablets makes such slips fatally easy. In No. 102, l. 6, where the spelling is karçi, Prof. Sayce has translated the phrase correctly.

W. ROBERTSON SMITH.

Prof. Robertson Smith has put the case so clearly, that I have only to add that Hebrew lexicographers differ in their explanation of garça; and that, as I was merely concerned to show how ignorant the Edinburgh Reviewer was of either explanation, I did not think it necessary to enter into details.

THE REVENUES OF THE GREAT MOGULS.

Bedford: July 24, 1893.

Mr. Keene has been only too indulgent to my little book on Aurangzib in his notice of it in the ACADEMY of July 22nd, and I hope he will not think me ungrateful if I again cross swords with him on the revenue question. I see he is still unconvinced on two points: (1) the value of the rupee in the seventeenth century, and (2) the large excess of the gross revenue over the recorded returns of the land-tax.

On the first head I confess I do not understand his estimate of the rupee. I have said nothing about livres parisis, but, like him, I have taken the livre tournois as the basis of the French travellers' exchanges, though it is not essential to my proof. I find the livre tournois of 1643-61 (the period of the travellers Bernier, Tavernier, and Thevenot) estimated at 1.95 fr., or about 1s. 6d. in Bailly's Histoire financière de la France; and all the French travellers put the rupee at thirty sols or a livre and a half, i.e., 2s. 3d., and the contemporary English translator of Tavernier renders 30 sols by 2s. 3d. But apart from any dispute about the value of the livre (and I really do not see how French travellers could be expected to "say what the écu" and livre, "was worth in French money," as Mr. Keene would have them do), we have what I must consider the irrefragable evidence of English travellers. Mr. Keene mentions "French and Italian travellers"; but he seems to have forgotten that at least three English travellers (to cite no more) have recorded the value of the rupee in English money during the same period as their French contemporaries. Sir Thomas Roe in 1615 valued the rupee at 2s. 2d.; Dr. John Fryer in 1673 found it equal to 2s. 3d.; and the Rev. James Ovington in 1689 also made it 2s. 3d. Is it conceivable that English travellers throughout the seventeenth century should have been paying 2s. 3d. for their rupees, while during the same period and at the same places French travellers got their rupees as cheap as 1s. 8d., according to Mr. Keene's present valuation, or even 1s. 3d., according to the valuation he adopted in his Sketch of the History of Hindustan (p. 239)? At this rate, a composite firm of English and French travellers might have made a fortune in the simplest manner: the Frenchman would buy his rupees at the French exchange of 1s. 8d.; the Englishman would sell them again at the English exchange of 2s. 3d.; and the partners would net 7d. profit per rupee! Unless Mr. Keene is prepared to throw over the evidence of all English travellers in India in the seventeenth century, he must admit that the rupee was worth about 2s. 3d. of our money of the time. And if so, the further conclusion is reached, that the livre tournois, which was admittedly two-thirds of the rupee, was worth about 1s. 6d. The evidence seems to me to be as conclusive as possible.

As to the second point, I admit that the problem is by no means so easy as the valuation of the rupee. A series of returns of the revenue of the Mogul Emperors has come down to us, showing a gradual increase from about nineteen millions of pounds (reducing rupees to pounds at the value of 2s. 3d.) at the death of Akbar, to about forty millions when Aurangzib was in the midst of his Deccan campaigns. I have given twelve of these returns in my Aurangzib; and their general consistency with the history of the empire, and with each other, makes them exceedingly difficult to reject. Indeed I do not gather that Mr. Keene controverts their authority, though he would of course reduce their amount in proportion to his valuation of the rupee. The question is, Do these returns represent the total gross revenue, or do they merely stand for the land-tax, which was the principal and almost the only general imperial tax levied over the whole land? Other taxes were local or temporary, and were more than once revised or repealed; but the land-tax was the great source of regular revenue, and its due apportionment and assessment was a leading object of Mogul administration. The native returns do not specify whether the revenue they record was confined to the land-tax or included all sources; but the native returns were drawn up for the eye of the native officials, who would naturally understand the fiscal system of the time, and no explanations would be necessary. Bernier, however, in giving his estimate of the revenue at about 25½ millions in circa 1660, distinctly states that it represents only the revenue derived from land, and Manucci (or his editor Catrou) says the same of his estimate of 43½ millions in 1697. If these two returns relate only to the land revenue, the others must also be restricted to the same source of revenue, or else the consistency of the whole series of returns would be destroyed.

If, then, the revenue from the land-tax (and from tribute when this took the place of land-tax) alone amounted to about nineteen millions in 1600, and about forty millions in 1700, what was the amount of the gross revenue from all sources? It must be remembered that there was a multitude of minor taxes, before Aurangzib reimposed the jizya or poll-tax on infidels, and that the Emperor derived enormous sums from the annual presents of the "Omrahs" and Mansabdars, from confiscations, royalties on diamond mines, port dues, &c. These must have amounted to a very considerable sum. Manucci states plainly that this fluctuating revenue or "casuel" amounted in his time to at least as much as the regular land revenue: "Tout ce casuel de l'Empire égale, à peu près, ou surpasse même les immenses richesses que l'Empereur perçoit des seuls fonds de terre de son Domaine." Mr. Keene is quite right in saying that I regard Catrou's translation or paraphrase of Manucci's MS. with suspicion; but I cannot put aside a definite detailed list of the revenue returns of each province as an editorial gloss. Catrou could scarcely have invented these figures, and it would never have occurred to him to add that they were limited to the land-tax, and that the "casuel" doubled the total. Manucci himself must be responsible for these very precise statements, and I see no ground for disbelieving him on this head.

Manucci's statement that the gross revenue was double the land-tax is, moreover, confirmed by Gemelli Careri's estimate of the former at ninety millions (eighty crores of rupees) in 1695, which is a little more than double the land revenue recorded by Manucci in 1697. And on the same principle, William Hawkins's estimate of Jahangir's revenue in 1609-11 at fifty crores (£56,000,000), though probably a rough guess, is explained; for we know that Jahangir's land-tax amounted to nearly twenty millions, and the fifty-six millions must therefore include the other sources of income. These two separate estimates of fifty-six and ninety millions confirm Manucci's statement that the gross revenue was at least double the amount derived from the land-tax; and it was after a careful consideration of the evidence that I wrote in Aurangzib:

"From the three statements of Hawkins, Catrou, and Careri we may conclude that the gross revenue from all sources was equal to at least double the land revenue of the Great Mogul, and to obtain the total income we must double the sums given in the returns quoted above. In other words, the gross revenue of the Mogul Empire may be taken at fully £36,000,000 in 1594, and gradually rose to £90,000,000 in 1695."

STANLEY LANE-POOLE.

RACIAL DWARFS IN THE ATLAS AND THE PYRENEES.

London: July 29, 1893.

A dwarf is a very little thing to get into a rage about. It was, therefore, somewhat of a surprise to me to learn from the Spectator that, during the discussion on my paper on "Dwarfs and Dwarf Worship" in September, 1891, there were persons in London who could not hear the subject of dwarfs mentioned without flying into a rage. Also, in January last, referring to the substantial support which recent discoveries in the Atlas had given to my views, the Spectator said that my theory had been "met with an acrimony of dissent which could not have been stronger if it had been in favour of unlimited dynamite."

Of this "acrimony of dissent"—which found vent in epithets not generally used in such discussions, such as "Gulliver," "Munchausen," &c.—we are reminded, at this late day, by Mr. Stuart Glennie's letter to the ACADEMY, with its significant heading, "Mr. Haliburton's Dwarfs." In it he conveniently ignored the fact that the question as to the existence of dwarf tribes in the Atlas had been practically settled by the discovery of rebel pygmies in the mountains near Morocco city by members of the Scotch mission, an account of which appeared in the Morocco Times of January 26, 1893, describing the little men and women that frequented the sacred waters near the tomb of Mulai Ibrahim in the Atlas. Mr. Harris, who had heard of these dwarf tribes from the mission, inquired at Amzmiz—a town at the foot of the Atlas, on the road to Mogador, and only two days from Morocco city, and a place well known to him, and visited by scores of Europeans every year—and was told by everyone, from the governor downwards, that there were such dwarfs in that district who would not recognise the Sultan or pay taxes; and he afterwards met fourteen of them in all, who had a reddish complexion, and were from four feet to four feet six inches in height. His letter describing them appeared in the London Times of January 10. The only question now raised is as to how they became so small. The highest living authority on such subjects, Schweinfürth Pasha, whom I met in Egypt last spring, told me that he had no doubt that they were ordinary African "racial" dwarfs.

The discussion as to them in 1891 probably arose from the fact (no doubt a singular one) that the editor of the Morocco Times, who was then residing in London, had never heard of such dwarfs, though he had lived at Tangier for six years. His scepticism was confirmed by the statement made to him by a merchant, who had resided in Morocco city for a quarter of a century, that he, too, had never heard of these dwarfs. Yet this "old resident" was, to his surprise, told by members of the Scotch mission that, on inquiry, they had learned that dwarf tribes are to be found not far from the city. He afterwards mentioned the fact to Mr. Harris. It is, of course, very surprising that I was the first European that had heard of these dwarfs; but no one but myself had ever asked about them, and the natives never thought of volunteering, unasked, to give any information as to them.

The lesson which this Amzmiz incident teaches us is that it is safer to trust to inquiries on the spot, or to the statements of natives of the locality in question, than to rely on the infallibility of competent authorities who have never specially looked into the matter.

As respects the existence of racial dwarfs in the Val de Ribas, in the province of Gerona, Spain, where Catalan is spoken, a minute description of them was published in Kosmos some years ago. I wished to verify it, if possible; but I inquired in Spain—not in France, as Mr. Glennie has done. There is no English consul in France nearer to the Val de Ribas than the one at Bordeaux. I made inquiries in Madrid among scientific bodies there, and wrote to Mr. MacPherson, H.B.M. Consul at Barcelona, which is only a few hours by rail from the place in question. I did not think of asking him if he knew anything about these dwarfs in the Pyrenees, as I assumed that he had never heard or thought of them; but I asked him to make careful inquiries as to their existence. After a month or two he wrote to me that after very careful inquiries he was certain that there were such racial dwarfs, especially in the Collado de Tosas; and his full description of them fully confirmed that which had appeared in Kosmos, and also agreed with the account of similar dwarfs, with "mahogany coloured" woolly hair, which an Austrian merchant, who had seen them in the marketplace at Salamanca, had given me. Mr. MacPherson said that he found that the dwarfs were often confounded with Cretins, but that he had fully satisfied himself that there were both Cretins and dwarfs in the district in question.

Mr. Stuart Glennie has supplemented his letter by one to Nature of July 27, stating that he wrote to Mr. MacPherson, but received no reply. He probably wrote to him in substance what he has written to the ACADEMY: that he and his French friends (none of whom probably have ever been in the Val de Ribas or can speak Catalan) might, could, would, and should have heard of these dwarfs if they really existed there. It is to be regretted that ignorance as to the existence of these dwarfs on the part of his informants, and Mr. MacPherson's avoidance of a correspondence with him, deterred him, while in the South of France, from making the easy journey he speaks of. A few hours in the Collado de Tosas would have been more useful than weeks spent with his French friends. We must hope that he will bear in mind hereafter the lesson taught by the unexpected discovery at Amzmiz; and that he will also remember that neither Cretinism nor any other disease can turn ordinary Europeans into pygmies with broad, flat noses, a copper-coloured complexion, and mahogany coloured wool, peculiarities which can only be racial and the result of heredity.

When the argument, or rather retort, was used two years ago, "why did you not yourself visit the country of the dwarfs?" I did not reply; but now that Mr. Glennie has revived it, I may point to it as a sample of the style of argument adopted by my critics. A year ago only I recovered my health, and partly my strength; but for ten years previously I had been an invalid, who could not "rough it" in any way, or stand the fatigue of long journeys even by rail. But under the circumstances I did as much as Mr. Glennie perhaps would have done: I offered £100 to an explorer if he would visit Pount in the Dra Valley, and I also offered to pay his expenses if he would visit the Val de Ribas. I much regret that his engagements prevented him from accepting my offers.

If Mr. Glennie can give us any new information on this subject, by all means let him do so; but it is full time that his "acrimony of dissent," so unusual in such discussions, should be dropped.

A MANUAL OF CHINESE QUOTATIONS.

A Manual of Chinese Quotations: being a translation of the Ch'eng Yü K'ao; with the Chinese Text, Notes, Explanations, and an Index for Easy Reference. By J. H. Stewart Lockhart, Registrar-General, Chairman of the Board of Examiners in Chinese, Hong Kong. (Hong Kong: Kelly & Walsh, Limited; and at Shanghai, Yokohama, and Singapore.)

In this handsome volume, Mr. Lockhart has rendered a service to foreign students of Chinese, and also, as he hopes, to Chinese students of English, a class of learners who will, no doubt, be multiplying from year to year. It is a translation of a work which has been very popular in China for between four and five centuries. The author of it was Ch'ü Chün, styled Chung-shün, and honoured after his death with the title of Wän Chwang, "the Cultured and Serious." He was a native of Ch'ung-Shan, in the island of Nai-Nan, the chief district of the one insular department belonging to the province of Canton. Born there, and soon losing his father, he had a hard struggle with poverty during his early years; but by his talents and perseverance he rose to high distinction as a scholar, filled some of the highest offices of the empire, and died in 1495 at the age of seventy-six.

We do not know what other works he published, nor under what title this, his most important contribution to literature, appeared. Mr. Lockhart calls it Ch'eng Yü K'ao, which he translates by "Quotations Examined," calling also his whole work "A Manual of Quotations." But a better translation of Ch'eng Yü would have been "Established Phraseologies." Dr. Williams, in his latest dictionary, under Yü defines the combination by "proverbs, sayings, trite expressions"; and all the collections of proverbs and pithy phrases in Chinese which have been made since Prémare's Collectio Proverborum, by Sir J. F. Davis, Doolittle, Scarborough, and others, contain but so many instances of Ch'eng Yü. In the last book of the well-known and valuable work of Chao Yi of the present century, the first essay is called "223 instances of Ch'eng Yü," few, if any, of which are found in the manual under our notice. The compilation of Wän-Chwang, in fact, is a cyclopaedia of knowledge for the young, arranged in thirty-three categories, beginning with "Ouranology" and ending with "Diseases and Death." The copy of it which the writer has used for about forty years, and still occasionally consults, is called "An enlarged edition of Lessons for the Young, tracing old matters to their origin, and explaining them exactly." The necessity for such Manuals in China, and the advantage of a translation of one of the best of them, are set forth by Mr. Lockhart in his brief introduction.

"One of the chief characteristics of the written language of China," he says, keeping to his own translation of Ch'eng Yü, "is its love of quotation. The more frequently and aptly a Chinese writer employs literary allusions, the more is his style admired. Among the Chinese it might almost be said that style is quotation. With them to quote is one of the first canons of literary art; and a Chinese who cannot introduce even into his ordinary compositions phrases borrowed from the records of the past, might as well try to lay claim to literary attainments as a European unable to spell correctly or write grammatically."

This being the case, and the stores of Chinese literature being so vast, we see at once how the frequent use of old and established phraseologies must be one of the greatest stumbling-blocks to the foreign student, and how, as Mr. Lockhart also says, "Chinese themselves are often nonplussed by some ingenious parallel, or recondite allusion, which they are unable to explain."

Enough has been said to show the correctness of the opening remark in this notice, that the author has done a good work in the preparation and publication of this volume. The writer hopes that a second edition will soon be called for, and that Mr. Lockhart will then be encouraged to give "chapter and verse" for each phraseology, and also to introduce more of the commentary in the various editions of the original work. With Mayer's "Chinese Reader's Manual" and that before us, and with the current versions of the Chinese classics and many other books, the acquisition of a scholarly acquaintance with Chinese literature is greatly facilitated.

The volume, we may say finally, is admirably printed. The only error in the Chinese text which has attracted the writer's notice is the third character in the first column of page 159; but the error is only an inadvertence. The right rendering of the proper character is given in the translation. The difficulty of translating such a book, moreover, was very great, but Mr. Lockhart has succeeded à merveille. J. L.

CURRENT SCIENTIFIC LITERATURE.

A Dictionary of Birds. By Alfred Newton. Part I. (A. & C. Black.) At last we have the first volume of Prof. Alfred Newton's promised work on ornithology, based upon the admirable series of articles which he contributed to the ninth edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. It is characteristic of the author that he should have deliberately preserved the alphabetical order, in preference to the taxonomic, because he entertains grave doubts of the validity of any systematic arrangement as yet put forth. The result is undoubtedly more interesting to the general reader, and at the same time better fitted to exhibit the author's peculiar talent of exposition, which revels in the concrete—in recording facts, and in tracing the history of blunders. For the anatomical articles he has enlisted the services of Dr. Hans Gadow; while Mr. Richard Lydekker deals with some palaeontological subjects, and Prof. C. S. Roy writes specially upon Flight. The volume is abundantly illustrated with woodcuts, borrowed from various quarters, and has also a map showing the six zoo-geographical regions of the world. We are surprised to find that Prof. Newton regards the question of the flamingo's attitude on the nest as not yet absolutely settled, despite the evidence of Mr. Abel Chapman in Wild Spain. And we must demur to his implication, under Egret, that the "plume" of our military busby is always of horse hair. As a matter of fact, officers in both the horse artillery and the hussars wear a real plume of white heron's feathers.

The Lepidoptera of the British Islands. By Charles G. Barrett. Vol. I. Rhopalocera (Reeve). The special character of this book is that it furnishes not only descriptions of the insects, their larvae and pupae, but also abundant details about their habits and ways, drawn from personal experience and the most reliable records. All the doubtful and extinct British butterflies have their place; and much pains has evidently been devoted to tracing the history of exceptional appearances. Another point that will strike the old-fashioned entomologist is the large amount of space devoted to describing well ascertained varieties, for which the author's position as one of the editors of the Entomologist's Monthly Magazine has given him special opportunities. There are no plates; but otherwise the book must prove very useful to the young collector, and further contains a good deal of reading that will be instructive to all interested in natural history.

Johnson's Gardener's Dictionary. New Edition, Part IV. (Bell.) We have received Part IV. of the new edition of this Dictionary (Fuonia—Indigofera). The book continues to furnish a full, yet handy, account of all which interests the gardener—his flowers, his tools, his materials, his methods, and his enemies. Wise advice, based on common sense, is given in the articles on Flower-pots, Greenhouses, and Hot-beds. The long account of the Grape-vine, with its note on the Phylloxera vastatrix, will be read with interest; and, indeed, the description and illustration of the insects with which a gardener has to reckon is one of the strong points of the Dictionary. That a decoction of elder-leaves will kill off ants in the nest is well worth knowing. By a curious slip, "sight" is printed for "site" on p. 507 (article Ice).

THE first and second Heft of Vol. VI. of Cohn's Beiträge zur Biologie der Pflanzen are full of important papers. Dr. A. Wieler discusses in great detail the phenomena connected with the bleeding of plants, which he regards as a function of special cells, manifested where there is an unequal osmotic pressure on the opposite sides. The escape of fluid from the digestive glands of insectivorous plants is dependent on exosmose. Dr. G. Stock investigates the mode of formation and distribution of protein-crystals in flowering plants. The localities in which they are found may be ranged under four heads—the nucleus, the chromatophores, the cytoplasm, and the cell-sap. Herr T. Rosen has carried on his investigations on the nucleus and the mode of formation of the membrane in Fungi and in the Myxomycetes. He states that, with very few exceptions, the mode of division of the nucleus in these orders is a simplification of that which takes place in the higher plants; in no case observed did it partake altogether of the character of indirect division. Dr. Schottländer adds an important contribution to our knowledge of the difference in the staining reactions of male, female, and vegetative cells. In the examples observed by him—plants belonging to various sections of Cryptogams—the nucleole of the vegetative nuclei consists of a red-staining substance. The ovum-nucleus contains no blue-staining substance, which, on the other hand, forms at all events the greater part of the constituents of the spermatozoid. This difference in the staining reactions of the male and female nuclei is also accompanied by differences in their finer structure.

WE have received the second volume of Mr. George Massee's British Fungus-Flora, the first volume of which has been already noticed in the ACADEMY.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A BILINGUAL VANNIC AND ASSYRIAN INSCRIPTION.

Queen's College, Oxford: July 26, 1893.

I have a discovery to announce of considerable philological importance. It is nothing less than that of a bilingual Vannic and Assyrian inscription. The fortunate discoverer is M. de Morgan, the Director of the Egyptian Service of Antiquities, who obtained squeezes of the two texts at the risk of his life. These have just been published by the Rev. Fr. Scheil in the Recueil de Travaux relatifs à la Philologie et à l'Archéologie égyptiennes et assyriennes, xiv. 3, 4. The fact that they are translations one of the other has, however, escaped his notice.

The inscriptions are found on the two faces of a blue stone column in the pass of Kel-i-shin Sidek. The Vannic text is a duplicate of one on another stone column in the pass of Kel-i-shin Ushnei, which I have published in my Memoir on the Cuneiform Inscriptions of Van, No. lvi. As M. de Morgan states that the latter stone is now destroyed, the cast which was made of it for me, and which I have sent to the Ashmolean Museum, acquires an additional value.

Unfortunately, all three texts are shockingly mutilated, which accounts for the fact that Dr. Scheil did not notice that the Assyrian and Vannic versions correspond line by line with one another. Nevertheless, the Assyrian version throws a good deal of light on the Vannic vocabulary and grammar. It shows that I was right in translating the Vannic alusi by "inhabitant," as is already observed by Dr. Scheil; the Assyrian equivalent being sa, "belonging to." On the other hand, the particle iu signifies "when," instead of "thus"; and the suffix -kai, which I supposed to mean "to the race of," really signifies "before," "to the presence of." As the verb nunabi turns out to be the equivalent of the Assyrian allik "I went," the mysterious kaiuke in SAYCE xxx. 13 and l. 23 must signify "against," kai being simply "the face." Light is thus cast on the suffix -(u)ki. Khaubi, "I took" or "conquered" is represented in the Assyrian text by the ideograph GURRU, which has the same sense.

The inscriptions were erected by Menuas, who ruled over the Vannic Kingdom in the eighth century B.C. The Assyrian version shows that the city called by the Assyrians Mutsatsir was close to the pass of Kel-i-shin Sidek. In the Vannic version it is called the City of Ardinis, "the Sun-god"; and I conclude, therefore, that Mutsatsir was a name of purely Assyrian origin, signifying "the place from which the serpent issues." The seal of the last king of Mutsa-tsir contains a reference to the tsir or "serpent" (SAYCE lvii.). I should add that the Vannic version seems to allude to an early king of Van otherwise unknown, called (Sar?) durazaus.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE subscriptions received up to the present for the proposed memorial to the late Sir Richard Owen amount altogether to only about £1000. The committee still hope to obtain at least twice that sum.

MR. H. CHICHESTER HART is about to publish a Flora of Donegal.

THE anniversary meeting of the Royal Botanic Society will be held in the Gardens, Regent's Park, on Thursday next, August 10, at 1 p.m.

THE French Association for the Advancement of Science will hold its annual meeting from August 3 to 13, at Besancon, under the presidency of Dr. Bouchard. The special subjects for discussion in different sections are:—the mechanical traction of tramways, the local records from which a forecast of the weather at a given place can be made, and the administrative measures necessary to prevent the use of unfit articles of food.

DURING part of the last two months, Dr. H. R. Mill, librarian to the Royal Geographical Society, has been engaged in making a bathymetrical survey of the larger lakes of Cumberland and Lancashire, with the help of a grant from the council. Soundings were taken at close intervals along a series of lines crossing each lake at right angles to its axis, and never more than half a mile apart. On Derwentwater over eight hundred soundings were required to define the contour lines of each of 25 feet of depth. The greatest depth found here was 72 feet, but the surface of the lake was much below its normal level. Bassenthwaite Lake, though simpler in configuration, has about the same maximum depth. Ullswater, the largest lake in England except Windermere, was found to have a maximum depth of 208 feet. This lake was remarkable on account of its division into a series of deep basins, separated from each other by wide bars, from the most pronounced of which a rocky islet rises, showing the characteristic marks of ice-erosion. Conistone Lake is simpler, being one straight deep trough, the deepest part of which is at least 184 feet. Wastwater is similar in configuration, though of much greater depth; an area within it one mile long by a quarter of a mile wide, being everywhere from 250 to 258 feet deep, and therefore practically flat. Samples of the deposit from different parts of each lake were secured, and will be examined by a specialist. Temperature observations were also made, and a number of interesting facts were discovered relating to the penetration of solar heat in the deep water. It is hoped that a similar survey of Windermere may be made during September.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

WE have received from the Government of India Part I. of Dr. A. F. Rudolf Hoernle's critical edition of the Bower Manuscript. As has already been stated in the ACADEMY, this MS. consists of a collection of strips of birch-bark, which were brought from Central Asia by Captain Bower about three years ago. Prof. Bühler was, we believe, the first to decipher their writing, and to demonstrate its great palaeographical importance. It is a peculiar kind of Nagari, of the North-Western type, which cannot be later than the sixth century A.D., and may be as early as the fourth. The MS. is, therefore, probably two hundred years older than any Sanskrit MS. hitherto known, though only this very year a paper MS. of equal antiquity has also been brought to Calcutta from Central Asia. The contents, it must be confessed, are disappointing. They consist chiefly of charms and medical nostrums, of a Buddhistic character. Dr. Hoernle has already published several preliminary reports on the MS. in the Journal of the Bengal Asiatic Society, and in the Indian Antiquary, which were models of palaeographical research. But scholars have been looking forward to the appearance of his critical edition, with the facsimiles supplied by the munificence of the Bengal Government. This first part deals with only five leaves, out of a total of fifty-six. Each of these is beautifully reproduced, by the photo-etching process. Dr. Hoernle has added a Nagari transcript, a romanised trans-literation with critical comment, and an English translation with explanatory notes. There is also a short preface, in which Dr. Hoernle acknowledges his obligation to native scholars and native texts. For it happens that this instalment of the MS. is devoted to medical prescriptions—a subject that has not been much studied by European Sanskritists, though it has an immense literature of its own. The following is a favourable specimen of the contents. It is from a passage singing the praises of garlic.

"Hear from me with an attentive mind, O Susruta, as I set forth briefly its virtues, when applied as an alterative tonic. It cures skin diseases, loss of appetite, abdominal tumours, cough, leanness, white leprosy, and weak digestion. It removes rheumatism, menorrhagia, abdominal pains, consumption, morbid affections of the bowels, enlargement of the spleen, and hæmorrhoids. Venerable sir, with a voice beautiful like that of a tabor or flute, with a complexion clear as that of molten fine gold, strong in memory and mind, with a well-knit body, free from all wrinkles etc., with all the senses steady, collected, and constantly increasing in vigour, you shall live for a hundred years, with a well-regulated digestion and inexhaustible virility." It certainly seems that the deserts of Central Asia have preserved for us a less interesting literature than the tombs of Egypt.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Joseph Halévy read a paper upon the Rape of Proserpine in Babylonian mythology. Hitherto, this legend has been considered exclusively Greek, or perhaps as derived from the Egyptian myth of Isis and Osiris. But M. Halévy now claims to have discovered it on a Babylonian tablet of the fifteenth century B.C., which was among those found at Tel el-Amarna. Nergal, the Babylonian Pluto or Hades, desires to wed Eris-Kigal (= "the desire of Hades"), who is daughter of Anu, the Babylonian Jupiter. On the refusal of the father, Nergal orders Namtar, who plays the part of Hermes as conductor of the dead, to bring her by force to his palace. Eris-Kigal yields to threats, and consents to become the wife of Nergal, on condition of sharing his authority. "I wish," she says, "to share the power that you exercise: you shall be the lord, and I will be the lady." The text then goes on: "Nergal approves of this, and, instead of being angry, embraces her and dries her tears. 'All that thou desirest from this moment, that I will grant to thee.'"

DR. W. MUSS-ARNOLT—formerly of Johns Hopkins University, but now of Ann Arbor, Michigan—has sent us reprints of two very learned papers. One, from the Transactions of the American Philological Association, deals exhaustively with Semitic loan-words in Greek and Latin, mainly relying upon the labours of Lagarde. Altogether, about four hundred words are discussed; but for more than half of these a Semitic origin is denied. After a general introduction, the words are classified in twenty-four categories, according to their meanings; while reference is made easy by an index at the end. The paper is so condensed and so crowded with references that it is impossible to quote from it. We notice, however, that Lagarde is cited as supporting a Semitic origin for the Greek olvos. The other paper is on the names of the Assyro-Babylonian months and their regents, which seems to have appeared in two forms: in the Journal of Biblical Literature, and as a popular pamphlet "with special reference to the Old Testament." The author claims to have proved, as against Cassel and Meissner, that the names of the Babylonian months adopted by the Hebrews are almost without exception of Semitic origin; that the series to which the list of months belongs can be traced back to the time of Hammurabi; and that the names are to be found in some of the oldest contract tablets.

In a recent number of the Revue Critique, M. Henri Cordier reviews a number of books on Chinese, beginning with the first volume of Prof. Legge's new edition of his "Chinese Classics," now being published by the Clarendon Press. In reference to Prof. Terrien de Lacouperie's Catalogue of Chinese Coins in the British Museum, he takes the opportunity to say:

"M. T. de L. est un travailleur ardent, aux idées ingénieuses, peut-être parfois paradoxales—j'avoue que lorsqu'il s'agit de relier l'Assyrie à la Chine, je suis entièrement incompetent—mais il ne reste pas moins un des chercheurs les plus originaux, si non le plus original, de l'école sinologique actuelle; et il a cet immense mérite d'avoir remué une quantité d'idées nouvelles, et accumulé nombre de renseignements et de matériaux qui peuvent être consultés avec profit. Mole sua stat."

A NEW MAP OF ANCIENT ROME.

Forma Urbis Romae, consilio et auctoritate Regiae Academiae Linceorum formam dimensus est et ad modulum 1: 1000 delineavit Rodolphus Lanciani Romanus. Fasciculus primus. (Mediolani: apud Ulricum Hoepli.)

THE work to which we wish to draw attention marks an important stage in the history of Roman topography, since it presents the results of all the labour expended on this subject by archaeologists during the last half century. On the first revival of classical studies in the dawn of the Renaissance, the study of archaeology sprung up almost of itself in Rome; and already in the fourteenth century the works of Livy were leading, and Cola di Rienzo in his investigation of the Roman monuments, and of the inscriptions which tell their story and explain their meaning. Later, when humanism was in its zenith, the topography of Rome made a sudden stride. Leonardo Bufalini conceived the grand idea of a topographical map of ancient Rome and of her monuments, and in 1551, after twenty years of labour, he published a wood engraving of it. It is a document of which the importance may in a certain sense be said not to have been surpassed by any later publications, and which serves even to-day to acquaint us with the large number of monuments still existing towards the middle of the fifteenth century that have now disappeared, as also with the better state of preservation of those that still exist.

After Bufalini's, three other general maps of the city have appeared: that by Nolli, engraved in 1773; another, which Luigi Canina inserted in the second volume of his Edificii di Roma antica, published in 1848; and finally the Forma Urbis Romae, given to the light by Prof. Jordan in 1875. Although this latter has doubtless many merits, still Canina's remains the most remarkable of the three. Even his map has many defects, for most of which, however, we cannot hold him responsible, since the materials at his disposal were very different from those which a modern archaeologist is able to utilise. Moreover, his map includes only the central part of Rome, leaving out most important portions, such as the Regio Viae Novae, those ad Spem Veterem and ad Tres Fontanas, as well as the zones within the walls of the Appian, the Latin, the Asinaria, the Praenestina, the Labican, and the Flaminian Ways.

Since Canina's days, archaeological studies have made such progress that the topography of ancient Rome rests almost entirely on new foundations. The great impulse given to excavations, the labours of Italian archaeologists and of such men as Ulrichs, Jordan, Richter, and Middleton, the epoch-making publication of the Inscriptiones Christianae of De Rossi and of the sixth volume of the Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, and the innumerable series of special studies scattered throughout the archaeological periodicals of Italy, Germany, and France—all this has actually transformed our conceptions of the ancient topography of Rome. Nevertheless, the absence of a complete and recent topographical map has hitherto made it impossible for us to form a clear idea of this transformation. As far back as 1876, Mommsen recommended to the Royal Academy of the Lincei in Rome the publication of such a map, and the Academy showed itself favourable to the undertaking, which was assumed by one of its members, most competent in such matters, Prof. Lanciani, who had been working at it ever since 1867. The preparation for this work has been long and laborious. When the Academy of the Lincei decided in 1876 that the work should be undertaken, the excavations going on just then in Rome began to yield such a rich supply of new discoveries that it seemed impossible to print the work already prepared; it was thought better to arrange all the newly discovered materials, and to wait till the excavations had reached such a stage of development as would furnish sufficient certainty in presenting the results in a topographical map destined to possess a permanent value.

Of this map we have now the first instalment before us. It is drawn in the proportion of one to a thousand, and its large dimensions easily allow of the introduction of very minute particulars. The map embraces the age of the Kings and the Republic, as also of Imperial and Christian Rome down to the end of the sixth century. We think it very praiseworthy that the map should have been brought down to so late a date. It will greatly facilitate the study of mediaeval Roman topography, and the preparation, which would be highly desirable, of a map for the Middle Ages. The various ages of the monuments are distinguished in Prof. Lanciani's map by different colours; and besides the monuments still existing, those also are indicated which have been discovered and destroyed in the last forty years, as well as those of earlier periods, of which no traces remain, but of which we nevertheless possess trustworthy records. The discoveries of artistic objects and of inscriptions useful for the study of topography are also noted in the map; but, with laudable prudence, no attempt has been made to reconstruct the monuments, even where the doing so might seem justifiable. The example of his predecessors, especially of Canina, seems to have inspired Prof. Lanciani with a wise caution which is beyond all praise. One of the greatest dangers which besets archaeologists, and against which they are not always sufficiently on their guard, is that of giving way too easily to the temptation of imaginary reconstruction.

The entire work will consist of forty-six large sheets; but they will not be published in regular order, as Prof. Lanciani prefers to begin with the publication of those representing zones already completely excavated, reserving to the last moment those in which further discoveries may still be hoped for. The six sheets published in this first instalment include the Salaria and Pincian Gates, with the surrounding localities, the Quirinal Hill and part of the Viminal, and the Baths of Diocletian. It is an important part, but certainly not the most important. It would, therefore, be premature at present to give a critical notice of this work; nor does it seem to us that it will be possible to do so before the publication of the sheets representing those zones in which the life of Rome was chiefly developed, and where it left the deepest traces. We therefore shall look for the rest with the greatest interest, especially the part dealing with the Palatine, the Forum, and the Aventine, where the work of excavation has yielded such fruitful results. We can, however, already assert that the publication undertaken by Prof. Lanciani, under the auspices of the Academy of the Lincei, is worthy of its important subject, and exhibits great industry and depth of learning. We are glad to hear that the Professor will add to the maps a book of letterpress, of which the materials are already almost prepared, and in which the history of Roman excavations will be treated, with a minute description of such of them as have not yet been described by others.

The engraving of the maps has been very carefully executed, in spite of the many difficulties which a work of this nature presents. It is only to be regretted that the paper used for the maps is not better. This is a defect seldom found in the larger Italian publications, though it also occurs in the first volume of the Monumenti Antichi, published likewise by the Academy of the Lincei. And although it is a purely material defect, it appears to us a very serious one in a work which, from its great scientific value, is destined to last long and to be constantly consulted.

UGO BALZANI.

SOME RECENT DISCOVERIES IN INDIA.

Christ Church Lodge, Western-road, Cheltenham.

THE pressure of res angusta has caused the Government of India to decree that the archaeological survey of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh shall come to an untimely end on October 1, 1895. Perhaps this stern decree may yet be modified; but, however that may be, Dr. Führer is making the best possible use of the allotted time. His printed Progress Report, recently issued by the local government, proves the doing of much good work, and promises the speedy performance of much work equally good.

Mr. E. W. Smith, the architectural draughtsman attached to the Survey, has been busily engaged on detailed drawings of Akbar's city of Fathpur Sikri, which the Lieutenant-Governor hopes to publish in one or more volumes on the early architecture of the Moghuls. Such volumes are badly wanted.

A monograph on the excavations at the Kankali Tilā at Mathurā is ready for the press, and promises to be of the highest interest and value. The book will, Dr. Führer tells me, be printed in royal quarto, and illustrated with about 110 plates. Having already once appealed unsuccessfully to readers of the ACADEMY for help in prosecuting the researches at Mathurā, which are throwing so much light on the development of Hinduism, Buddhism, and Jainism, I fear there is little use in making a second appeal. But "hope springs eternal in the human breast," and I venture to quote a few words from Dr. Führer's letter, dated June 6.

"I should very much like," he writes, "to take up the Kesava mound at Mathurā, if sufficient funds could be obtained. Do you think that an appeal in the ACADEMY would be of some help? I am convinced that the Kesava mound hides Vaishnava relics of more ancient date than those found in the Kankali Tilā."

If anybody will help, he may be assured that his money will be well spent.

The partial exploration of the ruined city of Rāmāgar, in the Bareilly district, has yielded some surprising results. Sir Alexander Cunningham long ago correctly identified the ruins at Rāmāgar with the city of Ahichchhatra, the Āśvādēpa of Ptolemy. Dr. Führer has now found inscriptions which show that the correct Sanskrit form of the name is Adhichchhatra. He has also made the extremely important discovery of "a large two-storied Saiva temple, built of carved brick, and dating from the first century B.C." This is very much the earliest brick temple known to exist in Northern India, and its discovery is

"a link in the chain of evidence which enables us to trace the existence, nay, the prevalence, of Vaishnavism and Saivism, not only during the second and first centuries A.C., but during much earlier times, and to give a firm support to the view now held by a number of Orientalists, according to which Vaishnavism and Saivism are older than Buddhism or Jainism."

The coins found in this temple are considered to range in date from about 178 to 66 B.C.

In the same city Dr. Führer exposed a Jain temple of the early Indo-Scythic period, with statues dated from 96 to 152 A.D., and a Buddhist monastery called Mihiravihāra, dating from the middle of the first century A.D.

Mr. Rodgers lately sent to Mr. Theobald, through me, a unique specimen, obtained at Sahāranpur, of a new type of the copper coinage of Kumāra Gupta I., which has hitherto been known only from the unique coin of the Standing King type in the Bodleian cabinet.

"I have not exhausted my budget of novelties, but must not further trespass on the ACADEMY's limited space. V. A. SMITH.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

VISCOUNT COBHAM and Sir Charles Tennant have been appointed trustees of the National Portrait Gallery, to fill vacancies caused by the death of the Earl of Derby and the resignation of the Marquis of Bath.

MR. HENRY TATE, the donor of the new National Gallery of British Art, has presented to the Walker Art Gallery at Liverpool one of Mr. Henry Moore's masterpieces, "Launching the Lifeboat."

THIS same week, another valuable present to the Liverpool gallery is announced. Mr. H. Yates Thompson has given Delaroché's historical picture of "Napoleon crossing the St. Bernard," which was painted for Lord Onslow in 1848, and was recently sold at Christie's among the Onslow heirlooms.

THERE is now on view, in the map-room of the Royal Geographical Society, a most interesting series of photographs of Alpine scenery in mid-winter, taken by Mr. Clinton T. Dent.

MR. WARWICK WROTH contributes to the last part of the Numismatic Chronicle, in continuation of former papers, an account of the Greek coins acquired by the British Museum during 1892. The total number was 457, of which ten are gold and electrum, and ninety-nine silver. We may specially mention two bronze colonial coins of Lystra in Lycæonia, one of which, bearing the head of Augustus, was procured by Prof. W. M. Ramsay and Mr. Hogarth. There are also portrait staters of Demetrius Poliorcetes (gold) and of Pharnabazus (silver); a cistophorus of Pergamus, struck with the letter Q, when the province of Asia was under a quaestor instead of a proconsul; and an Alexandrine tetradrachm struck at Rhodes, but counter-marked with a labyrinth for circulation at Cnossus in Crete. Here we seem to see the origin of "surcharging" on postage-stamps, to which the British Colonies have always been particularly addicted.

THE annual report of the Indian surveys for 1891-92 contains some matter of archaeological interest, in an appendix by Colonel Holdich on the history and ethnography of Makran, or Southern Baluchistan. From Mr. Theodore Bent's researches in the Persian Gulf, and his identification of the Bahrain Islands with the early home of the Phoenicians, Colonel Holdich is inclined to seek a Phoenician origin for the remarkable dams, or rough stone-built tombs, which exist in many parts of the country. He also states that the ghorbastars, or great stone embankments, show the same skill in un-cemented masonry as the walls of Zimbabwe; while around the cities of Tiz and Pasni are to be found the same extraordinary wealth of relics in celadon, china, and Persian pottery as are described by Mr. Bent among the African ruins. But we must decline to follow Colonel Holdich when he looks for the etymology of the name Baluchistan in Baal, the Phoenician sun-god.

IN the last number of L'Anthropologie, there is an illustrated paper by M. Salomon Reinach upon some prehistoric objects recently discovered in the valley of the Danube and now preserved in the Vienna Museum. The most important is a bronze situla or bucket, with a band of figures wrought in relief. It is of the same type as others that have been found in Northern Italy and in the Alps. Some have attributed them to the Etruscans; but M. Reinach inclines to the theory that they are Celtic, of the fourth or fifth century B.C., being intermediate between the era of Halstatt and that of La Tène. The scenes represented in the relief are a banquet, a boxing-match, and chariot races. The other objects discussed are some urns or vases, ornamented with rude figures and decorative patterns of the type known as "late Celtic," hitherto found only in the neighbourhood of the Baltic.

AMONG the latest discoveries at Rome is a small bronze tablet, found on the property of Signor Martinetti, bearing an inscription in silver letters, with a palm on one side and a crown of laurels on the other. The inscription, which appears to be of the second century A.D., runs as follows: "Genio Gaii Geruloni Januarii Fortunatus decuriae Gerulorum servus."

WE quote the following from the Sophia correspondent of the Times:-

"The excavations undertaken at Hissarlik by Dr. Dörpfeld, the director of the German Archaeological School at Athens, have been attended by very satisfactory results. According to the theory of the late Dr. Schliemann, six super-imposed cities lie buried beneath the artificial mound at that place, the so-called second city being identical with the Homeric Troy. The recent researches, however, lead to the conclusion that what is known as the sixth city should be identified with the city described by the poet. Not only have specimens of pottery been discovered exactly resembling and apparently synchronous with those found at Mycenæ, but courses of beautifully-fitted masonry have been laid bare which seem entirely to justify the epithets employed by Homer. Additional evidence is furnished by the gray coloured pottery found in adjacent tumuli. The excavations have been carried out at the expense of Dr. Schliemann's widow."

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

FROM Messrs. Augener & Co.:

Of pianoforte music we would mention Perles Musicales: recueil de morceaux de salon, which include a clever and effective transposition, by G. Jensen, of a Gavotte from Leclair's violin Sonata, entitled "Le Tombeau"; a graceful and well-written Waltz, by Max Pauer; a melodious, Mendelssohnian Etude, by A. Loeschhorn; also some light, attractive pieces by A. Strelitz, and L. Schytte's characteristic "Passant les Steppes."

E. Pauer's Library of Pianoforte Music (Junior Grade and Senior Grade) is a useful collection of studies, and of classical and drawing-room pieces, with all necessary fingering. M. Max Pauer's excellent arrangements in pianoforte duet form of several of Haydn's London Symphonies remind one of a musical mine which has not, as yet, been thoroughly explored.

Carl Reinecke's volumes of his Musical Kindergarten will be welcomed by all teachers, and enjoyed by all young pupils.

Of songs—a set of six (Vocal Album), by Hamish MacCunn, are pleasing, but noticeable for their harmonic skill rather than for their melodic invention; the best, in our opinion, are "Doubting" and "Dreamland." Miss Edith Swepstone's setting of three Lyrics by Mr. William Black show taste, but they are not specially characteristic. M. E. Kreuz's five songs are carefully written and expressive, but in none of them is any real climax reached. Mr. A. Moffat's two-part songs for female voices are bright and taking. We do not, however, like the consecutive octaves on page 25. M. F. J. Simpson's "A Message to Phyllis" is a quaint song, with an effective accompaniment. Three songs by Isabel Hearn: "Love is ours," "Bird raptures," and "The Secret," are fresh and clever. If the composer has only the power of self-criticism, she will accomplish great things.

Drei Charakterstücke, for orchestra. By G. Jensen (Op. 53). No. 1 is a pleasing Alla Marcia; No. 2, a soothing Canzona; and No. 3, a graceful Minuetto. The music, of a Schubert-Schumann cast, is well put together, and pleasantly scored.

AGENCIES.

LITERATURE.

Memoirs of Philip Dormer, Fourth Earl of Chesterfield. By W. Ernst. (Sonnen-schein.)

THE writer who undertakes the task of depicting the life of a politician like Chesterfield should be himself possessed of appreciation for statesmanship and humour, but even microscopic observation could not detect many traces of these qualities throughout Mr. Ernst's pages. Too often we are reminded of Dr. Johnson's sarcasm, on the deadening effect produced on the mind of a compiler living a century and a half ago when he took his pen in hand. Possibly this result is due in some degree to the form in which the biographer has cast his book. It is chiefly composed of extracts from Lord Chesterfield's letters, and a biography constructed in that manner never fails to produce a feeling of depression.

Most of these letters have long been familiar to the ordinary reader in the collections of Lord Mahon or Dr. Bradshaw; but several are now published for the first time from the enormous mass of communications acquired a few years since by the trustees of the British Museum and known to every student of its manuscript treasures as the "Newcastle papers." These are often of great historical interest; and among the most valuable are those which set out the various steps which Chesterfield took in 1757 to effect the political union of the borough-mongering old Duke of Newcastle and the haughty Pitt, with his supreme indifference for individual members or constituencies. A very curious epistle, now printed at full length, was addressed by Chesterfield to Dr. Squire, in answer to the request that he would obtain from the old Duke a promise for the first or second bishopric that might become vacant; and as the original is now preserved among the Newcastle documents, it must have been forwarded by the crafty divine to this ducal dispenser of episcopal patronage. The communication is dated in October, 1758; and although Squire did not obtain his desires at the moment, he was advanced two years later to a deanery, and in 1761 was exalted to a Welsh bishopric. Glimpses like these of the applications hidden among the manuscripts of the British Museum whet the appetite for further revelations, and we remember with pleasure that Dr. Bradshaw has promised to supply the curious world with a reprint of the whole of the Chesterfield letters now buried in Bloomsbury. May the appearance of the complete collection not be long delayed!

The only other novel pieces of information embodied in Mr. Ernst's volume are taken from the Dublin Journal of George Faulkner, who, during Lord Chesterfield's vice-royalty, was often admitted to the confidence of the Castle. They contain some particulars of the earl's social life in the Irish capital, and for that reason are worthy of resurrection from the files of that newspaper.

Mr. Ernst is unfortunate in his opening sentences. He informs us that the family of Stanhope is "not only of great antiquity, but also of considerable distinction in English history," and then proceeds to point the moral of its grandeur with a passage from "Camden in his account of Nottinghamshire." The chief instance of the family's fame which is supplied in this extract refers to "James Stanhope, principal secretary of state"; and as he died about a century after the decease of Camden, it is clear that the words of the quotation were not written by that painstaking antiquary, but by his editor in a later age. This stumble at the start does not inspire us with confidence. In the spelling of the Cornish borough (p. 23) which Lord Stanhope represented in the parliament of 1715, and of the name of the family (p. 463) which controlled, at a later date, the choice of its members, Mr. Ernst has slightly deviated from accuracy; but he has erred in either instance with numerous other chroniclers. The curious anecdote from Maty (p. 83) of the manner in which Lord Chesterfield obtained a vote in the House of Lords from a peer enamoured of a reputation for medical skill—he used to say that he had "literally bled for the good of his country"—is annotated with a manuscript comment of Horace Walpole, that the anonymous "Lord R—" was Lord Raymond. This assertion is, we think, a lapse on the part of Walpole's memory. We have always understood that the peer in question was the last Lord Radnor of the first creation.

Some points in the life of Lord Chesterfield are treated by the latest biographer with freshness, and inspire us with the belief that, had the scheme of the work been of a different character, the result would have been received with greater praise. It has long been accepted without reserve that his marriage to the illegitimate daughter of the first George was not attended by domestic happiness, and it has been asserted of late years that her name "does not occur half a dozen times in his correspondence." This emphatic assertion has now been put to the test, with the result that she is found to be mentioned "some twenty-seven times." It is moreover certain, from the references to her in Faulkner's Journal, that she accompanied her husband to Dublin, and, to enhance his popularity with his vice-regal subjects, set an example in her attire of encouragement of Irish industries, an example which has often since then been imitated by ladies allied to politicians. A second question which our author discusses with much judgment is the statement that Lord Chesterfield endeavoured to advance himself in the political world by the influence of Lady Suffolk. We think that he has gone far towards proving his case, although he has not altogether succeeded in dispelling the impression that the Queen's dislike of him was due to her jealousy of his relations with her husband's mistress. Lord Chesterfield's sincerity of action was always a matter of doubt with his contemporaries, and his manner in conversation was so steeped in artificiality as to justify the existing suspicions. Still, he had numerous friends, and the pleasantest portions of this volume are concerned with their lives. The earliest and dearest was the ill-fated Earl of Scarborough, and the character which Chesterfield drew of him stands out in our memory as the most pathetic passage he ever wrote. Another intimate friend who died young was Hammond the poet, and on his death Lord Chesterfield composed a commendatory preface for his famous "Love Elegies." The interests of his brothers he was always ready to further, and with John he had "always lived in the closest friendship." When Sir William Stanhope found himself compelled to part from the young wife whom he had thoughtlessly married when he was more than sixty years old, it was Lord Chesterfield who acted as the negotiator between them. To Dayrolles he was ever ready to give assistance, both professionally and pecuniarily; and there are many other instances to be found in Mr. Ernst's volume showing Chesterfield's devotion to the interests of his relatives and friends. The most striking illustration of his innate kindness of heart occurs in the case of his body-servant White, who lived with him for more than half a century. The more glimpses we obtain of his inner life, the more profoundly are we convinced that Chesterfield was a conspicuous instance of a man who masked to the world at large a warm heart under a chilling and artificial exterior of countenance and conversation.

THE NEW ALDINE BURNS.

The Poetical Works of Robert Burns. Edited, with a Memoir, by George A. Aitken. In 3 vols. (Bell.)

THESE three cheap volumes, although they cannot compare as regards type and paper with the original Aldine Burns, make a very handy edition. Mr. Aitken is a careful and not unduly sympathetic editor and annotator. He has no startling discoveries to relate, no remarkable additions to make to the already known works of Burns. He gives two poems, and certain lines by way of supplement to tolerably familiar pieces, which previous editors have, for various reasons, not thought it desirable to include in their collections. The quality of these may be judged from the first—the Epitaph on Robert Muir (called "William" in the Preface)—which formed "a suppressed portion of Burns's letter to Mrs. Dunlop of December 13, 1789":

"What Man could esteem, or what Woman could love,
Was he who lives under this sod;
If such Thou refusest admission above,
Then whom wilt Thou favour, good God?"

It is difficult to see why these lines should have been "suppressed"; they merely represent Burns in one of those moods of kindly camaraderie, in which he was prone to represent his geese as swans. Mr. Aitken further says with spinsterish wisdom:

"I have also followed the example of the library edition published by Messrs. Gibbie & Company, of Philadelphia, in 1886, in giving the greater part of the important poem, 'The Court of Equity,' suppressing only the lines referring to personal scandals."

At this time of day surely Mr. Aitken might have given the whole of "The Court of Equity." The satirical pith of it, as of "Holy Willie's Prayer," lies in the "personal scandals." At all events, and notwithstanding the sheltering example of Messrs. Gibbie & Co., of Philadelphia, Mr. Aitken should either have given the whole of "The Court of Equity" or allowed it to remain in retirement. Mr. Aitken is also reasonably accurate in his annotations, especially when—as, indeed, is his judicious rule—he accepts and condenses what the late Mr. Scott Douglas wrote before him. He makes a serious blunder, however, in connexion with "The Jolly Beggars." He says, "it was first published in an imperfect form in 1799, and the complete poem was printed in 1801." "The Jolly Beggars" was first published in Stewart and Meikle's Tracts in 1799, in what Mr. Aitken calls "an imperfect form"—that is to say, without the recitativo and song of "Merry Andrew." But it was republished in the same imperfect form in 1801. It was not till 1802 that, the missing portion having been supplied by Burns's friend Richmond, the poem was given to the public in a "perfect form." Mr. Aitken's note to the "Jolly Beggars" is also of interest, as indicating the easy fashion in which he deals with poor Scott Douglas. He says: "One night Burns, accompanied by James Smith and Richmond, ventured into a noisy assemblage of beggars who were making merry in an ale house," &c. Compare this with Scott Douglas's "One night, after a meeting held at John Dow's, the poet, in the company of James Smith and Richmond, ventured into a very noisy assemblage of vagrants who were making merry in a hedge alehouse," &c. Again, Scott Douglas says: "After witnessing a little of the rough jollity there, the young men left"; and so Mr. Aitken has no difficulty in recording—"After witnessing some of the jollity there, the three young men left." After this, need I say more than ex uno?

As a biographer and critic of Burns, Mr. Aitken may be best described as the embodiment of "prudent, cautious self-control," and commonplace. How very cautious Mr. Aitken is may be gathered from the remark, "Of Burns's position as a poet it is difficult for anyone to speak who was born in England, even though he comes of an Ayrshire stock." How comes it that Mr. Aitken feels a difficulty which does not appear to have been felt by—to take two recent examples only—the late Mr. Matthew Arnold, although he was born in England, and had not the inestimable advantage of coming of an Ayrshire stock; or by the living M. Angellier, who, so far as appears at all events, is not a native of England, and has no Ayrshire blood in his veins? Mr. Aitken's caution, however, cuts both ways. How comes it that while the unfortunate fact of Mr. Aitken's having been born in England disqualifies him from judging Burns's position as a poet, it does not disqualify him from estimating Burns's conduct and character as a man. A man's works may be seen and read of all; a man's life is "greatly dark" to every other man. Yet Mr. Aitken has no hesitation in ignoring recent investigations into the closing years of Burns's life. He declares, apparently on the authority of Currie—whom Scott Douglas has fatally discredited by showing him to have falsified dates—that "it is certain that he [Burns] sought refuge from himself in the society of those unworthy of him." He repeats the story—although it has recently been riddled with scepticism, and although it was not included by Currie in the original edition of his biography—that in the end of January, 1796, Burns "dined at a tavern, returning home about three o'clock"—by the way, was that in the morning or in the afternoon?—"benumbed and intoxicated." The unfortunate fact of Mr. Aitken's having been born in England may account for his saying, "Few now realise how low was the standard of morals in the agricultural districts of Scotland, and how common an incident was the public repentance in the Kirk." Mr. Aitken, of course, means "the kirk," the ecclesiastical edifice; "the Kirk" is the Church of Scotland. But being of Ayrshire stock, he ought not to have made the preposterous assertion that "the 'Cottar's Saturday Night' and 'The Jolly Beggars' were but opposite aspects of the life of the day." It would be equally accurate to say that a gipsy encampment in the New Forest and a garden-party at Sir William Harcourt's country seat of Malwood are but opposite aspects of the life of the present day. But Mr. Aitken surely abandons his usual prudence, when he says of Burns that he "has himself denounced the wretch who can betray unsuspecting innocence; but he has boasted of being an 'old hawk' at the sport." The worst enemy of Burns has not yet depicted him in the character of the betrayer of unsuspecting innocence, even although it may be allowed that the poet did descend to the low "standard of morals in the agricultural districts of Scotland." But it appears that Burns aggravated his offence by boasting that he was an "old hawk" at the sport—of "betraying unsuspecting innocence." Mr. R. L. Stevenson has made capital of the "old hawk" before Mr. Aitken. To Mr. R. L. Stevenson therefore let us go. He quotes, as also does Mr. Aitken, Burns's letter relating to a lady who had "seen the politest quarters in Europe," in which he says

"I am an old hawk at the sport, and wrote her such a cool, deliberate, prudent reply, as brought my bird from her aerial towerings, pop, down at my foot, like Corporal Trim's hat."

Mr. Stevenson's comment on this letter is

"There is little question that to this lady he must have repeated his addresses, and that he was by her (Miss Chalmers) eventually, though not at all unkindly, rejected."

Plainly, therefore, the "sport" in which the "old hawk" was engaged was that of paying his addresses—addresses which he afterwards "repeated"—to Miss Peggy Chalmers, with a view to matrimony. Had they been paid with a view to anything less than matrimony, it is not easily conceivable that they would have been "not at all unkindly rejected." But, as Mr. Aitken now puts it, "the 'old hawk' was really engaged in the 'sport' of 'betraying unsuspecting innocence' in the person (according to Mr. Stevenson) of Miss Chalmers. Mr. Aitken will at once see that it is only due to the memory of Burns, and to the many that cherish that memory—not to speak of the relatives and connexions of the lady who became Mrs. Lewis Hay—to explain precisely what he here means.

Explicit unambiguous utterance from Mr. Aitken is also required on another point in his memoir. He devotes a considerable amount of space to the Highland Mary episode in Burns's life. A general belief prevails in Scotland that Mary Campbell, to whom Burns turned after what he regarded as his desertion by Jean Armour, was, as Prof. Nichol has very felicitously put it, the white rose among the passion-flowers, that the connexion between the two was not what Gilbert Burns has curiously termed "sexual." This view is supported by every word in prose or verse that Burns has himself written on his association with Mary Campbell. Mr. Aitken will not deny that the tendency of what he says in the text of his biography and in a mysterious footnote, in which he raises the apparently irrelevant question whether there may not have been two girls of the name of Mary Campbell living in the same Ayrshire parish at the same time, is to shake the white rose theory. He italicises such an apparently innocent phrase in Burns's note to "My Highland Lassie" as "a pretty long track of ardent reciprocal attachment," without by the way mentioning that the italics are his. He says: "We find that her (Mary Campbell's) father would not allow Burns's name to be mentioned in his presence," without indicating whether this statement is more authoritative than the equally familiar one that Mary's mother spoke kindly of Burns and sang certain of his songs. Mr. Aitken must see that it is but fair to the memory of a poor girl who seems to have no relatives or friends left to defend her character, who never asserted herself egotistically to the prejudice of other women during her life, and who, as is shown by the absolutely verified fact of her exchange of Bibles with Burns, was imbued with religion—superstition if you will—to come out of the fog of suggestion into the open day of positive assertion, and, if necessary, of direct accusation. In plain words, was Mary Campbell an impure woman before she met Burns, or was Burns's connexion with her an impure one? Mr. Aitken is quite entitled to disturb or overthrow any tradition, however venerable, if it is based on falsehood or error. But let him produce all his facts.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

(Second Notice.)

LEAVING the Marshal at Gembloux for the moment, we pass to the leaders of the allied armies. Bülow by this time had joined his veteran chief; and Blücher's army, about 90,000 strong, was concentrated near and around Wavre, prepared to march on the 18th to Waterloo. The Duke meanwhile had assembled some 70,000 men near Waterloo to oppose Napoleon—he might have added 17,000 more, left "in the air" at Hal, a most grave error; and the two commanders hoped to effect their junction on the 18th, and to overpower Napoleon with their united forces. I am surprised that Mr. Ropes accepts the view that Wellington received no positive pledge of assistance from Blücher until the dawn of the 18th. This is scarcely consistent with the text of the despatch; it is hardly to be reconciled with the Duke's letter to the Duc de Berri, written at 3 a.m. on the morning of Waterloo; and it is almost impossible to conceive that the British general would risk a great battle, as affairs stood, had he not been assured on the 17th of the support of his colleague. It is, too, I believe, a mere myth that Wellington rode to Wavre on the night of the 17th, and had a conference with the Prussian marshal: the story is of the "cock and bull" quality. There is, however, undoubted evidence, if the document is of a genuine kind, that Blücher was hesitating, on the morning of the 18th, to advance early and in force towards Wellington; if this be so, the strategy of the Allies was even worse than has usually been supposed. Giving them, however, all that can be said in their favour, their arrangements for the 18th—the natural result of the false double retreat on Wavre and Waterloo—cannot be justified, whatever may be urged. Both Wellington and Blücher believed that Napoleon had five-sixths of his army in front of Waterloo; they calculated, therefore, that the Duke would be able, with an army very much weaker in guns, and containing hardly 40,000 good troops, to withstand 90,000 or 100,000 Frenchmen, in Napoleon's hands, until Blücher should arrive from Wavre; and this was a radically untrue assumption. Again, the allied generals were not aware that Grouchy had 34,000 men, and was given the task of leading a restraining wing in order to hold the Prussians in check. This was a supposition they ought to have made; and that they did not make it would have been disastrous had Grouchy been a capable chief. In fact, the dispositions of the Allies made the defeat of Wellington probable in the extreme: this, too, though their collective forces were nearly twofold that of their enemy; and, in view of the facts, they should have fallen back on Brussels, as Napoleon, we repeat, has made perfectly clear. Talk about their boldness and constancy is beside the question: war is a terrible game of comparative strength, and it is bad generalship to run enormous risks when safety and success can be made otherwise certain.

Napoleon, meanwhile, had been preparing a grand and decisive attack on Wellington. He possibly thought that the mass of Blücher's forces was still retiring on his base towards the Rhine; but he sent cavalry in the direction of Wavre; he learned that a Prussian column was near that place; and it is wholly untrue that he neglected his right. I cannot agree with Mr. Ropes that he gave no positive orders to Grouchy on the night of the 17th. Thiers asserts that he did; the Memoirs of Marbot are almost conclusive on the subject; and Grouchy's denial is not worth notice: the Marshal is not a truthful witness. It is, besides, impossible to suppose that a chief like Napoleon could have been capable of this omission; and I am convinced he never made it. Mr. Ropes has described, on the whole, very well the great and decisive day of Waterloo. He has done justice to the excellence of the Emperor's plan of attack, and to the defensive skill and resource of Wellington. He indicates how vicious was the disposition of D'Erlon's corps for the first grand onslaught; how Reille's troops were thoughtlessly wasted; and, in short, how bad were the French tactics from the first until the last moment. He has placed the fall of La Haye Sainte at the proper time; and he correctly remarks that, after this event, it would have gone hard with the Duke's army but for the arrival of Bülow on Napoleon's right flank. He justly censures the reckless conduct of Ney in "massacring" the cavalry of his master, unsupported by infantry as they were; and he accurately shows that after five p.m. Napoleon was fighting two battles, and was unable to command the whole field of action. He insists that the attack of the Imperial Guard was made in one and not in two columns, in this differing from many writers; and he shows that, while D'Erlon did much on the right, Reille was comparatively useless on the left, and that Ney was to blame in the conduct of the attack. Finally he gives due weight to the last advance of the Prussians, and on the whole his narrative is clear and impartial. One fact, however, he hardly dwells on: Napoleon did not display, on his last field, the energy and skill of Jena and Austerlitz; but there can hardly be a doubt that this was because he was ill again on the 18th of June, as is attested by many witnesses on the spot.

The rout of Waterloo was due to the fact that Blücher joined Wellington on the field at last, and that from 43,000 to 45,000 Prussians were thrown on the Emperor's flank and rear. Grouchy was employed by Napoleon to prevent this junction: as we have seen, he could have fulfilled his mission; but he failed in this, and he is mainly responsible. Mr. Ropes follows the operations of the Marshal skilfully, and thoroughly disposes, one by one, of the excuses made for this worthless soldier by Napoleon's detractors and by flatterers of the Allies. Had Grouchy hastened up from Gembloux at daybreak on the 18th, and crossed the Dyle by the bridges of Moustiers and Ottignies, he would have been nearer Napoleon than Blücher was, and would have placed his army on the Prussian flank, and in that menacing position would have stopped Blücher, though he had but 34,000 against 90,000 men. The arguments of Charras on this subject, drawn from the inferiority of Grouchy's forces, are contradicted by the experience of war, as Mr. Ropes contends with effect: the question was not of defeating Blücher, but simply of holding him some hours in check. When it is said again—with extreme want of insight—that because Grouchy was directed on Wavre, as we may perhaps infer from a letter of Soult, he is not to blame for not detaining Blücher, this assumes that Napoleon would approve of Grouchy marching, as he did, at a snail's pace—a supposition utterly absurd; it ignores the fact that in the letter referred to the Emperor ordered Grouchy to draw near the main army; above all, it disregards the undoubted circumstance that Napoleon expected Grouchy to reach him, as we know distinctly from Marbot's Memoirs. It was due, in truth, partly to the direction of his march—he did not attempt to cross the Dyle—but principally to its lateness and slowness: he did not leave Gembloux until 8 or 9 a.m., and he crowded his troops in one huge column—that Grouchy failed to arrest Blücher; and no real apology can be made for him. One new incident of much importance Mr. Ropes has, I conceive, ascertained: Grouchy was nearer Waterloo when he heard its thunders than previous commentators have supposed; and this, of course, makes the case of the Marshal worse. Mr. Ropes thinks that even at this time, between 11.30 a.m. and 12 noon, Grouchy might have stopped the mass of the Prussians had he marched from Walhain across the Dyle; the opinion may be, perhaps, too sanguine, but it was that of the brilliant and able Gerard, who maintained it to the last day of his life. I am surprised that Mr. Ropes has not examined Napoleon's judgment on this question. The Emperor has insisted that, if Grouchy had simply marched in due time on Wavre, without crossing the Dyle at all, he would have held the army of Blücher in check; and there is much to be urged for this conclusion. A candid review of the facts proves that, had Grouchy acted with insight and vigour, the Prussians could not have reached Waterloo; the Emperor would not have been defeated, and, humanly speaking, must have won the battle.

Mr. Ropes does not indicate with sufficient breadth of view the general judgment to be formed on the campaign. Blücher and Wellington, as soldiers, showed great qualities; they deserved their triumph for their boldness and constancy. But, as strategists, their operations were bad; and they escaped disaster only through a set of accidents, immense as was their superiority in force. On the other hand, Napoleon made a single mistake: he supposed after Ligny that Blücher was seeking his base; he lost a great opportunity on the 17th; he was not himself on the field of Waterloo; but this slackness was due to a peculiar malady which made him inert and lethargic at times. His superiority as a great commander was plainly manifest: apart from the chance he missed on the 17th, his combinations should have assured him success, complete and decisive, on the 16th; and though his chances on the 18th were less, he evidently ought to have gained Waterloo. His instruments, however, broke in his hands: Ney and D'Erlon failed him on the 16th; Grouchy, on the 18th, was worse than useless; and his lieutenants caused the issue of the campaign. As the facts become more fully revealed, and impartial history pronounces on them, we see that the words of the great exile at St. Helena were essentially true: "I would have crushed the enemy on the 16th had my left been properly handled; and I would have crushed him on the 18th had my right not failed me." I have outrun my limits, or I would have commented on Mr. Ropes's judicious remarks on the Emperor's narratives of the campaign. These contain errors of detail, and are not always fair; but they have not been sufficiently studied, and their general point of view is, for the most part, correct.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

Reports of State Trials. New Series. Vol. IV. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

THE last volume of the new State Trials series differs as little from the three that have gone before as it probably will from all the remaining volumes that must come after, till the series itself is inevitably swallowed up in the abyss of the Parnell Commission. Since the last volume appeared, a change has taken place in the editorship. Master Macdonell has resigned that task; and it has been confided to the competent hands of Mr. Wallis, Reader in Constitutional Law to the Council of Legal Education. So far as careful collation of authorities and explanatory notes of considerable range are concerned, the new editor's work is as good as that of the old. Unfortunately, faults, for which the editor is but little responsible—perhaps not at all—are still to be found. Typographically, the book is rather unsightly, and the press seems to have been ill corrected. "If Brougham only knew a little law, he would know a little of everything" may have been a true enough sarcasm; but, at least, Brougham knew better than to have said "Dolus versatur in generalibus" twice in one speech, as this volume makes him do; and the stigma is all the more gratuitous for the fact that in the report in Vol. VI. of Clark and Finely's Reports, on which the report in this volume is founded, he did not enrich the Latin tongue with this novel locution. Any one who runs his eye over these pages will see many places in which misprints remain uncorrected; and the conclusion to which the reader is forced to come is this, that Her Majesty's Stationery Office should consider whether, if this kind of thing is worth publishing at all, it is not worth spending a little more money on.

The reports cover four years, 1839 to 1843, and accordingly plunge us into the thick of the Chartist trials. There is the trial of Frost for his pitiful insurrection at Newport, of Feargus O'Connor for seditious harangues in Lancashire, and of Cooper for provoking riot in the Potteries. These trials, it must be owned, are but dull reading. No form of narrative is so uninviting as question and answer, and yet for the most part this is the form in which, with painful fidelity, the facts are here presented. Told continuously and with compression, something of a story might have been extracted from the evidence of the Newport rising; set out as it is, we find in it little but an exercise in examination and in cross-examination, not more edifying than is to be heard any morning at Bow Street or the Old Bailey. Counsel too, and even (salva reverentia) judges, get more space for their speeches than their eloquence is adequate to fill; and it may well be doubted if the needs, either of lawyers or of laymen, require quite so copious a record of these trials.

The Chartist cases illustrate the perverse vagaries of fanaticism; the two Auchterarder cases, those of misguided ecclesiastical zeal; and the cases of Oxford and Macnaughton carry us a step further to the legal tests of insanity. To modern medicine these tests no doubt are not very satisfactory. To bring the matter to so rough a test as the prisoner's knowledge of right and wrong, without inquiring into hereditary tendencies or mental abnormality, must necessarily seem unscientific to those who instinctively confound predisposition with innocence, and reduce guilt to a kind of moral sickness. Yet after all, as Lord Denman said to the jury which tried Oxford,

"Every case must stand on its own circumstances. . . . With regard to the medical evidence, the professional skill of those gentlemen may enable them perhaps to judge in a great many matters with greater accuracy than other persons, but in this case your common sense must be the arbiter of the circumstances. . . . There may be cases in which medical evidence as to physical symptoms is of the utmost consequence; but, as for moral insanity, I for my own part do not consider that a medical man is better able to judge than a person acquainted with the ordinary affairs of life, and bringing to the subject a wide experience."

This is, perhaps, a more exclusively legal point of view than courts are disposed to adhere to now; but the difference is in the spirit rather than in the letter. The question is, whether at the time of doing the fatal act the accused knew the difference between right and wrong with respect to the very act with which he is charged. "If," say the judges advising the House of Lords after Macnaughton's case,

"if the accused was conscious that the act was one which he ought not to do, and if that act was at the same time contrary to the law of the land, it is punishable; and the usual course therefore has been to leave the question to the jury, whether the party accused had a sufficient degree of reason to know that he was doing an act that was wrong; and this course we think is correct, accompanied with such observations and explanations as the circumstances of each particular case may require."

The persons who figure most in these pages are: as counsel, Campbell, Pollock, Wilde, and Kelly; as judges, Lord Denman, Chief Justice Tindal, and Lord Brougham. The judgment of the last in the Auchterarder case is truly amazing. Brougham, in this highly difficult and highly impersonal dispute, showed himself as cocksure as Macaulay and as egotistical as Erskine. He was rhetorical when he should have been judicial; substituted anecdote and anathema for argument; and the justness of his conclusion was due more to good hap than good sense. The contemporary eloquence of the profession strikes one now as having been of a somewhat turgid character. Counsel and judges alike show a disposition to perorate with an appeal to the Creator; and whether the speaker be Campbell enlarging on the dignity of his office, or Pollock bewailing the tenderness of his heart, or Wilde rebuking the extravagance of Kelly, or Kelly denouncing the blood-thirstiness of Wilde—all these eminent gentlemen seem to be involved in their English, and long-winded in their oratory. This much, however, must be said: they spoke under the ordeal of a shorthand report, and are edited with a care too faithful for any hope of a locus poenitentiae in the way of emendation. Yet to their credit be it remembered that, unlike the modern advocate, they adorned their harangues with other figures of speech than the anacoluthon; and, in spite of the difficulty of speaking extempore, as most forensic speakers must, they produced connected sentences, consecutive argument, and even cogent thought.

Literature figures in State Trials principally in the unattractive form of blasphemous libels. In this volume, the literary cases are Hetherington's and Moxon's. Hetherington was prosecuted for an attack on the Bible contained in some of Haslam's Letters to the Clergy; Moxon for the publication of Shelley's Queen Mab. Both prosecutions were very ill-advised: in the first, the defendant received four months' imprisonment; in the latter, though found guilty, he was never called up for judgment. Certainly, as imbedded in an indictment, Shelley's poetry loses a good deal of its charm. The defendant was charged with having—

"published a scandalous, impious, blasphemous, profane, and malicious libel, of and concerning the Christian religion . . . according to the tenor and effect following, that is to say, 'They have three words, well tyrants know their use, well pay them for the loan with usury torn from a bleeding world, God, Hell, and Heaven' (meaning thereby that God, Hell, and Heaven were merely words); 'a vengeful, pitiless, and almighty fiend (meaning Almighty God), whose mercy is a nickname for the rage of tameless tigers hungering for blood,' and so forth."

But, except that Serjeant Talfourd seized the opportunity to deliver an eloquent harangue, explaining to the jury that he felt he was "moving tremulously among sacred things," it is difficult to see what good cause was served by proceeding against Moxon. Hetherington, angered at having been selected for prosecution himself, was the real prosecutor. He was resolved that he would not be the only person made to smart for saying disrespectful things about religion. In effect, whatever his motive, the course he took was simply vexatious; but, even without this somewhat unforeseen consequence of putting him on his trial, nothing was to be gained by giving publicity to the coarse abuse of sacred things contained in his publication. It rarely happens that any general good can be done by attempting to punish the mere brutalities of religious controversy; it never happens that the attempt is not attended by increased scandal and mischief; and every time that public officials resolve upon such a course, they more and more clearly prove the wisdom of the words of Tiberius: "Deorum injuriarum dis curas."

J. A. HAMILTON.

Some Further Recollections of a Happy Life.
By Marianne North. Edited by Mrs.
John Addington Symonds. (Macmillans.)

Mrs. SYMONDS has done well in giving us this further instalment of her sister's journal. The earlier volume, which dealt with her later wanderings, carried us to many curious and distant lands, and embraced the period of those artistic labours by which, until lately, she was chiefly known. The present volume covers an earlier period (from 1859 to 1870) and more familiar ground: Spain and the Pyrenees, Italy and Tyrol, Athens and the Golden Horn, Syria, Egypt, and Sicily. But these Reisebilder, though the places and people portrayed are not otherwise than commonplace, are genuinely remarkable for their easy and graceful draughtsmanship. Books of travel, and in particular travellers' journals, are so seldom literature, so prevalently stilted and self-conscious, that the total absence of these failings is in itself phenomenal.

From the first moment that she leaves England Miss North appears as an accomplished, in fact, an ideal traveller; and good travellers, like good poets, are, we incline to think, born and not made. The majority of people who journey nowadays are indeed shockingly ignorant of the art. In effect they do not travel—they simply transport themselves. They get to some region and then, it may be, study with intelligence the local art, or the local archaeology, or the local scenery; but, so far as getting any good of the journey goes, they might as well have dropped from a balloon. As a rule, they never for one moment get in touch with the life around them, they make friends with no class of the inhabitants, and they utterly fail to catch the feeling, to get at the true meaning, of the country of their sojourn. Miss North was the contradictory of all this. Everywhere she gets on terms with her environment, while her keen appreciation of things of beauty, as well as of things of interest, is reflected in every one of her simple but graphic entries. The old Arab pilot who took the party up the Nile to Wady Halfah and Abou Simbel (we follow Miss North's spelling) was one of the numerous natives whose hearts she won, and the description he gave of her to a subsequent employer, though, perhaps, a little superficial, is as obviously sound as it is undeniably humorous.

"This Bint was unlike most other English Bints, being, firstly, white and lively; secondly, she was gracious in her manner, and of kind disposition; thirdly, she attended continually to her father, whose days went in rejoicing that he had such a Bint; fourthly, she represented all things on paper: she drew all the temples of Nubia, all the Sakkiahs, and all the men and women, and nearly all the palm trees. She was a valuable and remarkable Bint!"

The picture which Miss North gives of the father whose days thus went in rejoicing is particularly happy. He had an amusing fancy for importing foreign servants—procuring a cook from Fobello and a butler from Macugnagā, and so on. Both he and his daughter got on excellently with these importations, though they were always glad, after a season, to go back to their homes in the mountains. He was beloved, too, by all of them, though not more than by his English servants, including the little virago, Mrs. Bunfield, who gave them shoulder of mutton six days a week, and when caught by her master in the act of raising a royal row in the kitchen, turned on him with the indignant protest, "And there you stands and says nothin'!" Everywhere, whether shown to us in the Austrian Tyrol, hooking and missing countless fish because "they didn't know how to take a fly properly," or haranguing the dahabieh milch goat as "Thou Harem of Billy," Mr. North is easy, natural, and piquant. The watermark of his style is however reached in the speech to the Greek quarantine doctor at Corfu. It should be mentioned that this functionary, who suffered from obliquity of eyes and morals, had for a week refused to let them land, and now came in a small boat to inspect them, his victims being on board a similar vessel.

"My father stepped gracefully on the rim of our tub, and grasping the ropes in one hand left the other free to see-saw up and down in the true M.P. style, and said, 'Signor Direttore.' The Signor took off his hat and said, 'Com-manda' with an extra squint; then my father waved his hand again, saying, 'Signor Direttore, j'ai voyagé con mia figlia in tutta la terra, and, hang it, tell him I never was so shamefully treated!'"

One feels in reading this book that, valuable as Miss North's artistic labours were, she somehow missed her true vocation. Her painting was a little mechanical, somewhat hard and dry; but the written sketches are light and sparkling in touch, and full of the soft pliancy of life. There are so many excellently drawn figures here that one hardly knows which to select. There is the German Fraulein, staying in a luxurious home at Smyrna, "whom the Turks thought mad and respected accordingly," because she tried to qualify herself for the hardship of travel by living on bread and onions, and cleaning her cuffs with a penknife. Then there is the French gentleman on the Nile, who could speak no English, but had read Dr. Faustus and recommended Tristram Shandy to Miss North as the best of all novels. Not less convincing is the outline of the tall and magnificent captain of the Cataract, whose sprained wrist she bound up with arnica, at which his magnificence promptly demanded backsheesh. One must mention, too, the Syrian consul's young stepmother, who wore crinoline over her Turkish trousers, and the Syracusan innkeeper, who drove off the Italian Canon, explaining that one cannot expect such people to be well mannered like the Sicilians! A certain melancholy interest attaches to this Sicilian journey, as it was the first of the series of longer and more adventurous enterprises in which Miss North's Reise-Lust found vent. These ended in the fatal trip to the Seychelles, where the crash came, "and brain and nerve and strength broke down together." She only made one more journey after that; but the joy in travelling, says Mrs. Symonds, was gone. Then came the few years in her country garden—a kind of Indian summer of peace—"but too late, and then the end."

REGINALD HUGHES.

Bond Slaves: the Story of a Struggle. By G. Linnaeus Banks. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

THE "struggle" is that known in history as the Luddite movement—an admirable subject for a story; and the story itself, it need hardly be said, is told with great skill. As a specimen of that large and popular class of story, "founded on fact," which aims to blend useful information with amusement, it is remarkable. It gives curious information about those now forgotten arts which were practised before the days of machinery, and is a good picture of the social life of the workers in the West Riding of Yorkshire—at the same period. Mrs. Banks informs us in the preface that she has been at great pains to make her work perfect in this respect; and for her persevering industry she should have all the credit she asks and deserves. Still, something is wanting. While Mrs. Banks is well able to tell us about people, she is less successful in making us partakers of their lives and struggles. Cramming with facts, however diligent and sustained, furnishes only the externals. It gives no useful clue to the inner spirit of any principle or any movement. When Mrs. Gaskell treated of the lives of the poor, she put, not information only, but heart, into her stories. She sympathised and compelled sympathy, and thus made the needs and struggles, hopes, fears and disappointments which she chronicled, not only known but felt. If, in one of her novels, Mrs. Gaskell had manipulated this fine subject of the Luddite movement, she might not have spent as much time studying technicalities, but she would have made the toilers alive to us, and compelled us to realise what the temptation was which led to frame-breaking and to darker deeds. This, Mrs. Banks fails to do. But then, of course, a work of Mrs. Gaskell would not have been characterised by the high Tory spirit of Bond Slaves. It would not have perverted Luddism into a desperate struggle of fools, led by rascals, to achieve their own ruin. Towards the close of her book Mrs. Banks makes this admission:—

"How few were animated with a truly patriotic, unselfish zeal to serve their suffering fellow-men! Yet such there were, no doubt, or the movement would neither have spread so far nor died so hardly" (p. 397).

A grudging admission surely, yet the best Mrs. Banks has to say about Luddism. Elsewhere we read of the "fierce vindictive plotter" engaged in "nursing fresh schemes of malignant savagery" (p. 340); of "ruthless assassins" (p. 353); of "men who committed cowardly outrages under cover of darkness" (p. 278); of plotters who "went stealthily as if afraid of an eye that never sleeps if not of noisy troopers" (p. 251); of "remorse" haunting a captive night and day (p. 257); all tending to convey the impression that the movement was dishonest and vicious, and known to those who shared in it to be so. On the other hand, we do not read anything of the greed of the masters or the cruelty of the law at that period, and very little of the hideous destitution which drove desperate men to secret, and perhaps mistaken, but by no means cowardly efforts to procure redress. There are rascals associated with every public agitation; but for the most part the Luddites were honest and earnest. Whether they were altogether mistaken is a question. Of course it was a mistake to suppose they could abolish the use of machinery by their destructive deeds; but the precept that "those who don't ask don't want," is so much in favour with those who have, that a rough and ready asking is sometimes the only way of making them recognise their responsibilities. In this respect, in the long run, the Luddite movement did not wholly fail. In Josiah Longmore, the workman who honours his employer, hates Luddism and gives good advice, we have Mrs. Banks's model workman. It is he who says "I hear both sides," and admonishes a misguided friend after the approved manner: "Already I perceive with sorrow that you are forsaking the religion of your pious parents for a delusion that will prove a snare to your soul and body." Of course, like all the unmitigated prigs of goody-goody story books, he keeps well on the safe side, suffers for a time from the contempt of evil doers, and, in the end, when they have come to grief, secures whatever good things are going.

Mrs. Banks mentions "Tom" Paine, and alludes to Robert Owen as one who "contrived to do a great deal of mischief where he only designed to do good." His early work, A New View of Society, is called, by her, "New Views of Life." In themselves, these may be small matters—the first-named is quite a common vulgarism—but they serve to show that Mrs. Banks has not taken the same pains to understand the spirit of those times as she has to know their habits. She was ill-equipped for her task if she was not acquainted with the writings and labours of Thomas Paine and Robert Owen. Her book might have been an excellent history of Luddism and its times, given, as the best history may be, and sometimes is, given, in the form of fiction. That she meant well is undoubted; but she has misrepresented, in a clever and attractive way, a social upheaval, whose true character is not too well known from other sources, and thus has, we fear, "contrived to do a great deal of mischief where she only designed to do good."

NEW NOVELS.

What Ails the House? By A. L. Haddon. In 3 vols. (W. H. Allen.)

A Ruthless Avenger. By Mrs. Conney. In 3 vols. (Hutchinson.)

An Island Princess. By Theo. Gift. (Lawrence & Bullen.)

Diogenes' Sandals. By Mrs. Arthur Kennard. (Remington.)

Men and Men. By V. S. Simmons. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

Clenched Antagonisms. By Lewis Iram. (Digby, Long & Co.)

A Father of Six. By H. N. Potapenko. (Fisher Unwin.)

It has been said that the born novelist receives casually the suggestions which he develops into tales. A chance phrase or the fragment of a story is enough for him. The author of What Ails the House appears to believe in a very different method of construction. A certain Mrs. Perkins, a popular novelist, has come to the end of her stock in trade. In her despair she writes to her cousin, Judith Minchin, for assistance, a person who of all others would seem, on the face of it, least likely to be able to help her. She is an elderly spinster and pious at that. Moreover, she has lived all her days in seclusion. But her cousin's importunity extracts from her a packet of letters containing the history of a old romance. Then the fun begins. Mrs. Perkins sets to work on the letters, interweaving fiction with fact, detailing, as she proceeds, the progress of her tale, first to her cousin and then to all and sundry. In the end the novelist's husband, her friends, even her domestics, are pressed into the service. The tale gets a suggestion from this person, an accretion from that; now it is kicked forward a pace; now it is pulled back. We have a mass of correspondence from the persons engaged in teaching Mrs. Perkins her business. All this is ingenious, and, up to a point, entertaining; but it makes a liberal demand on our patience, while any semblance of truth is destroyed. Were it not obvious that the book is designed as a satire on the novelist's art, levelled at the dullards of the craft, one would quarrel with the assumption, coolly advanced, that the fiction writer should equip himself for his task by cramming for it. A romancer must deal with what he has seen, felt, and experienced, that is to say, the motive force must be personal, not external. The introduction into the text of Shelley and Byron might be forgiven, were the dialogue, excellent in its way, merely general and abstract, and not particular. But in this I am inclined to give the author the benefit of the doubt, and to assume charitably that he or she is poking aly fun at the gratuitous impertinences of the historical novelist who dares to tamper with the lives of the illustrious dead. This must be so, in that an attempt is made to advance a fresh explanation of the running down of the Ariel, and the date of the occurrence is deliberately given as 1823! Nevertheless, if some readers are so dense as to miss the satire, they may be forgiven; for the business is not sufficiently well done to justify itself. It is to be feared, therefore, that my explanation of the author's intention will not find acceptance. This confused jumble, constantly begging the question; the melodramatic situations; the stilted phraseology of much of the dialogue; the wearisome methods of narration, especially in regard to the last "fragment," where a correspondent, to meet the exigencies of the tale, is made to repeat the substance of letters received from the very person he is addressing—to say nothing of lapses in style—will be taken as evidences of the amateur's ineptitude rather than as demonstrations of the satirist's skill.

Mrs. Conney's novel is skilful and ingenious. It is also interesting. All its characters are pasteboard, if we except Lady Helen Evelyn, who is a highly creditable creation. The materials are old and threadbare, but they make an attractive show. Ralph Evelyn, the rightful earl of Deptford, is first branded as illegitimate, then as a thief and as the murderer of his cousin, Lady Frances Evelyn. As his father had wandered the earth over to find the marriage certificate which would establish his right to the earldom of Deptford, so the son devotes his life to searching for the murderer of his cousin. The irony of fate brings him back to England a millionaire. At the moment when he has relinquished all hope of winning Helen Evelyn—she has become engaged to Jack Evelyn, a distant cousin and heir to the earldom—he destroys all chance of establishing his right to the family honours. Jack needs a light for his cigar. Ralph takes from his pocket the certificate which establishes his own legitimacy, rolls it into a spill, and hands it ablaze to his cousin. This was certainly heroic, but it was indiscreet. The moment might have arrived when he could have asserted his own rights, and hurt none of his kinsmen in doing so. The touch is effective but superfluous. It would be ungracious to say of the book as a whole that it is superfluous, since, given the proper frame of mind, the capacity to treat the tale as a gigantic joke, it is entertaining enough.

Here is the story of a young man who "means no harm," but who ruthlessly jilts as sweet and true a girl as any in or out of the pages of fiction. I have nothing but praise for this book, though Mr. Theo. Gift's conspicuous success in portraying the character of Jean Coniston, "the Island Princess," a girl to soften the heart of the most inveterate misogynist, brings with it a recrudescence of the primitive desire, that the heroine of a tale should marry the man she loves and live happily ever afterwards. But we are not without our compensations. Simple, untutored gentlewoman as Jean was, she was far too good to mate with the man who, although he had the externals of good breeding and indeed some superficial chivalry, was lacking in the quintessential qualities of refinement. Jean would have found him out. Her heart would have been broken slowly instead of suddenly. Once in this book we are reminded of the baptism of sorrow by Tess Durbeyfield; by the fifth act of Ibsen's

"Brand." An Island Princess is a fresh, direct, and artistic piece of work. It is full of clever word pictures and descriptions. Sub-acid humour and satire, never forced, give piquancy to an exceptionally well-written and cleverly-constructed tale.

If Mrs. Arthur Kennard's Diogenes' Sandals is the first book she has published, she has acquitted herself with distinction. Her style is bright; and it is correct. Her adroitness in skimming the cream of philosophies, old and new, excites admiration. If her matter is not always original, her manner of presenting it is. She has taken a leaf out of Richard Jefferies's book, and avoided many leaves to be found in Jerome K. Jerome's. Her novel is really a series of naturalistic studies, delicately flavoured with "up-to-date" knowledge and speculative thought, the whole lightly held together by a slender thread of romance. This is the work of a woman of real culture, of wide and catholic sympathies. It should draw hundreds to the Wiltshire Downs, which have never been treated more lovingly or with fuller knowledge. Mrs. Kennard is humorous, but she is never vulgar; she is informed, but she is never pedantic; she has the soul of a poet, but she never descends into cheap poetising.

Sedate, measured, crisp and withal truthful, the story of French studio life which goes by the name of Men and Men pursues the even tenour of its way with quiet confidence. Its healthiness of tone notwithstanding, the keen snout of the Philistine will detect naughtiness, and plenty of it. That nature is the only safe guide in the sexual relationship all the world knows, though it affects ignorance, and persistently acts in defiance of its knowledge. Fortunately for the American girl who affianced herself to "a gentleman-doll," whom she admired well enough at the distance, but from whose embraces she shrunk (as a pure woman must always shrink from the passion of a man who has failed to touch her own sensibilities), she was saved from making the fatal mistake by the brutal subtleties of a French painter, who had found in her, as she in him, the mate approved by nature.

The diffidence with which we approach Mr. Lewis Iram's Clenched Antagonisms quickly disappears; the author's simple unaffectedness and sincerity, his fairness in dealing with a difficult social problem, command our sympathy and respect. The tale of a girl left defenceless in London has been written before; Mr. Iram's plot is not original, but it is cleverly worked out, though there are plenty of specks in the craftsmanship. The author is evidently in earnest, but in a rational, measured manner; he is never betrayed into fanaticism. He demonstrates clearly enough that a virtuous woman, armed with invincible courage and a will of iron, may hope to have a fair chance of confounding the most artfully laid schemes to compass her downfall. But what if these qualities are wanting? Is she then entitled to no sympathy if she falls a victim to the machinations of the human beast? Is her destroyer to escape reprobation? That powerful body of interested persons, pledged to a conspiracy of silence in these matters, will sneer at the author of this book; chivalrous and wholesome-minded folk will grasp the author's hand in sympathy.

The latest volume of the Pseudonym Library contains two tales from the Russian of H. N. Potapenko, done into English by Mr. W. Gaussen. They throw a strong light upon the internal affairs of Russia. "A Father of Six" is a pathetic little narrative of the efforts of a village deacon—Father Anton—to get preferment. He resorts to bribing the Bishop's secretary, borrowing the money for the purpose from the sister of Father Pankratiï, the incumbent of the place. But for a while even this extreme, though apparently everyday, measure fails, in that the suppliant had been guilty of singing out of tune in the Bishop's hearing. From "An Occasional Holiday" it would appear that, when a really good harvest is vouchsafed, the moujiks are able to dictate their own terms to their employers, a comforting piece of information among the mass of gloomy stories concerning the condition of the Russian peasantry, with which this volume, in common with almost every book written about Russia, abounds.

JAMES STANLEY LITTLE.

CURRENT THEOLOGY.

The Epistle of St. James. The Greek Text, with Introduction, Notes, and Comments. By Joseph B. Mayor. (Macmillans.) This substantial volume is a very complete and well-nigh exhaustive study of the Epistle of St. James. It contains, besides the Greek text, with three Latin versions in parallel columns, a long and elaborate introduction, about 150 pages of notes, and a paraphrase with comments. Perhaps the most valuable part of the introduction, as contributing to a right understanding of the Epistle, and a just estimate of its place in Christian literature, are the chapters on the relation of the Epistle to earlier writings and to the other books of the New Testament, while that on the grammar of St. James is a useful study in Hellenistic Greek. That James, "the Lord's brother," was a younger son of Joseph and Mary is the conclusion at which Dr. Mayor arrives, after a careful examination of the Hieronymian, the Epiphanian, and the Helvidian theories; and it is one in which we may be permitted to say we entirely concur with him. Indeed, it may be doubted if any other theory would ever have been mooted, but for the growing prejudice in respect of Mary's perpetual virginity. The authenticity of the Epistle, however, is another question; and another still, perhaps even more difficult to determine, is the date of its composition. Dr. Mayor is one of those who have persuaded themselves that it is "the earliest of the books of the New Testament, written probably in the fifth decade of the Christian era by one who had been brought up with Jesus from his childhood, and whose teaching is in many points identical with the actual words of our Lord as recorded in the Synoptic Gospels"; and in defence of this view he enters into vigorous controversy with the German critics Von Soden, Brückner, and Pfeiderer, who put it far on in the second century, and with Dr. S. Davidson, who with more probability refers it to the period immediately preceding the destruction of Jerusalem. Dr. Mayor naturally makes the most of the external evidence, in the case of this Epistle notoriously defective, and claims to have shown that the Epistle was better known in the early centuries than has generally been supposed; but clearly a few coincidences of language, when it is uncertain which of the agreeing documents borrowed from the other, do not count for much. Whether James copied from Peter or Peter from James, Clement from James or James from Clement, are points on which it is difficult to come to a conclusion. We think it clear, however, that James was before Heras, and equally so that he was acquainted with the Epistle to the Romans; whereas Dr. Mayor maintains, what we cannot but think the preposterous view, that Paul had read and was influenced by the Epistle of James. Probably, the chief objection to the authenticity of the Epistle is the language in which it is written. Bishop John Wordsworth is quoted by Dr. Mayor, as assuming that "St. James could not have written such Greek as that in which the Epistle has come down to us, containing, as it does, many words with classical rather than biblical associations, implying a wide range of classical reading"; and if we accept this statement, and at the same time agree with Dr. Mayor himself that the Epistle has none of the marks of a translation, we seem to have arrived at a position fatal to its Jacobean authorship. The problems connected with the Epistle of St. James may possibly be beyond solution; but Dr. Mayor's work is none the less valuable, not only as presenting his own scholarly judgment, but as furnishing the materials to enable everyone to form his own opinion.

The Formation of the Gospels. By F. P. Badham. Revised and enlarged. (Kegan Paul & Co.) By far the most striking and original part of Mr. Badham's ingenious theory of gospel construction is undoubtedly that which maintains that the true Gospel of Mark is to be looked for, not in our second gospel at all, but in the matter peculiar to the third, plus that which is common to the first and third. The points in favour of this thesis are clearly, first: that the great pericope of Luke's gospel (ix. 51-xix.) agrees admirably with John the Elder's description of Mark, as being "not in order," the order of events and sayings being evidently subjective rather than chronological; and secondly, that John the Elder, so far as Papias reports him, or at least so far as Eusebius reports Papias, knows nothing of a gospel by Luke. Mr. Badham further seeks to make good his contention by showing that this Petrine fragment was the fifth gospel made use of by Tatian in his Diapente, that its authority was recognised by the compiler of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, and that it has linguistic peculiarities which bring it into close relationship with First Peter, and with the first half of the Acts. On the other hand, it may be asked, is Peter likely to have been the author of the most Pauline parts of the third gospel, including not only such parables as those of the Prodigal Son and the Pharisee and the Publican, but such an event as the mission of the seventy? Are Luke's highly artistic paragraphs more suggestive of notes of remembered discourses than Mark's comparatively rude style? Is it probable that the redactor of Matthew would have omitted the parables of the Prodigal Son and the Good Samaritan, if he had had before him an authoritative writing in which they were contained? Is it likely that the poetical narrative contained in Luke i.-ii. came from a personal follower of Jesus; or is Peter likely to be responsible, even indirectly, for the opening chapters of the Acts, including the unhistorical account of the gift of tongues? These are some of the objections that lie against a theory which nevertheless must be admitted to be captivating from its very boldness and originality. Mr. Badham has added to the present revised edition of his essay the text of the Synoptics in the A.V., distinguishing by difference of type the various documents which his scheme assumes as entering into their composition.

The Synoptic Problem for English Readers. By Alfred J. Jolley. (Macmillans.) This little book should at least satisfy the English readers for whom it is intended, that there is a synoptic problem. Mr. Jolley shows how impossible it is to reconcile the phenomena presented by the Gospels, whether with the theory of their mutual independence, or of their infallibility. He maintains the priority of Mark, and has no doubt that it was used by the other synoptics, but dismisses rather too summarily the notion of a primitive Mark from which our second Gospel was derived. What, then, about the testimony of John the Elder, that Mark wrote without regard to chronological order? Mr. Jolley, however, believes in the existence of a Primitive Gospel behind our three, and of this document he attempts a restoration "based on the work of Dr. B. Weiss, and carefully and repeatedly tested in every passage." He also assumes the existence of an Ebionite Gospel, derived equally with Matthew from the primitive Gospel and influencing Luke. Mark, which supplies materials to both Luke and Matthew, is itself founded on the primitive Gospel, but with the addition of the Petrine reminiscences. Mr. Jolley's scheme, if not in all respects satisfactory, is certainly worth considering; and his book may prove useful as an introduction to the study of the synoptic problem to those who have had no previous acquaintance with the subject. Only they should be warned that, of the many solutions that have been proposed, none has been discovered yet which can be regarded as final.

THE interest felt in the discovery of the Gospel of Peter is shown by the fact that two independent facsimiles of the MS. have already appeared. One is published in the Mémoires of the French School at Cairo, under the editorship of M. A. Lods, whose critical comments on the subject have more than once been mentioned in the ACADEMY. This contains not only the Gospel and the Apocalypse, but also the Book of Enoch, in which M. Lods takes a special interest. The mode of reproduction is by heliogravure; and the price is 40 francs. The other facsimile is by Dr. Oscar von Gebhardt, of Leipzig, who paid a visit to Egypt for the special purpose of photographing the MS. He has confined himself to the Gospel and the Apocalypse, which together make just twenty plates, including the blank leaves. But he has prefixed an introduction, giving a description of the MS., palaeographical notes, and a bibliography. He also prints the text, in a remarkably beautiful fount of Greek type, incorporating emendations of his own, and placing those of others at the foot of the page. For example, in v. 6, he would read ἰσομεν for the συμμεν of the MS.; and in v. 18 he inserts καὶ before πολλοὺς, and changes ἐξέταρα (which he maintains to be the corrected reading of the MS.) into ἀνετάρατα. Of this last we cannot approve. Dr. von Gebhardt's photographic facsimile, which claims to be more legible than the French heliogravure, is published by Hinrichs, of Leipzig, in a well-bound volume, at the price of 12.50 marks.

Canonical and Uncanonical Gospels. With a Translation of the Recently Discovered Fragment of the Gospel of St. Peter, and a Selection from the Sayings of our Lord not found in the Four Gospels. By W. E. Barnes. (Longmans.) As a restatement of the Gospel evidence, this little work must be pronounced superficial and imperfect. This is specially the case with the chapter on "the witness of Justin Martyr." In that on Papias the author seems to regard the canonical Matthew as a translation from Matthew's Aramaic. The best chapters are those on Tatian and Hermas, in which use is made of the most recent investigations. Besides the Petrine fragment, there is also a translation of the report of the trial of the Scillitan martyrs from the text of Prof. Armitage Robinson.

Greek-English Lexicon to the New Testament. By W. J. Hickie. (Macmillans.) We can cordially recommend this as a very handy little volume, compiled on sound principles. There are abundant references to the authoritative works of Pape and Thayer, and also to the variant readings adopted by Westcott and Hort. But that the author can think for himself is shown by his notes on such words as μονογενής and πρωτότοκος. He is careful to point out those words which are only used in biblical and ecclesiastical literature. A good example of his style is the article on λόγος, where we find the following meanings given, each with at least one reference:—Word, talk, speech, saying, announcement, account, reason, report, narrative, doctrine, affair, matter, plea, the Divine Word, the second person in the Trinity. Under πᾶς, he insists that the word in the Beatitudes should be rendered "gentle" and not "meek." Finally, we may mention that the book, though written by an Englishman, has been printed—and very well printed too—at an American press.

The Life and Times of Bishop White. By Julius H. Ward. (New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.) This little book tells in an effective way the story of the founding of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States. The Seabury centenary, as celebrated at St. Paul's Cathedral, London, in 1884, brought before English Churchmen the history of the origin of the American episcopate in the consecration (1784) of the first bishop, Dr. Seabury, by the bishops of the non-juring Episcopal Church in Scotland. But the difficulties of an ecclesiastico-political kind, which had been raised in England in his case, were before long overcome; and White and Provoost were sent over from the States and consecrated in Lambeth Chapel in 1787. The energy and force of character possessed by Seabury were lacking in White; but his caution, tact, and adroitness were not less valuable at the time. His life extended to 1836, and for close on fifty years he was a wise president of the councils of the American Church. The student will be wise to supplement his knowledge of the earlier part of the period as supplied by Mr. Ward by constant reference to Dr. Beardsley's Life of Bishop Seabury.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. HUGH THOMSON has drawn a series of illustrations for Miss Mitford's Our Village, which will be published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. in the autumn, uniform with the same artist's illustrated edition of Cranford.

MR. JOHN MURRAY announces an Introduction to the Study of the Greek Testament, by Mr. Theophilus D. Hall, intended for those who possess no knowledge of the Greek language. It will contain a brief account of the principal MSS. and editions; a connected narrative of Our Lord's Life from the Synoptic Gospels (based on St. Mark), in the original Greek, together with a grammar, vocabulary, and explanatory notes.

Little New World Idylls, and Other Poems, is the title of a new volume by Mr. John James Piatt, at present American Consul at Dublin, which Messrs. Longmans will shortly publish in London and New York. At the same time Messrs. Longmans will issue a new edition of the author's Idylls and Lyrics of the Ohio Valley.

MESSRS. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS have in the press a volume on The Zambesi Basin and Nyassaland, by Mr. Daniel J. Rankin, with maps and illustrations.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL will publish, in the course of the present month, a book by Mr. Robert Kempt, entitled Convivial Caledonia, being an account of the historic inns and taverns of Scotland, and of some famous people who have frequented them.

Dr. G. W. LEITNER proposes to issue immediately, from the Oriental University Institute at Woking, a second edition of his Hunza and Nagyr Handbook, which was first printed by the Government of India in 1889. He will now add a supplement of about 250 pages, giving a detailed account, brought down to date, of the history, religions, customs, legends, and songs of the several tribes of the Hindu Kush, illustrated with maps, anthropological portraits, &c. The edition is limited to 300 copies.

MR. RICHARD JACKSON, of Leeds, will publish immediately, by subscription, a book by the late Archdeacon Boyd, entitled Littondale Past and Present, which gives an account of the secluded valley containing the parish of Arncliffe, where the Archdeacon was vicar for fifty-eight years. Special chapters deal with the physical features of the country, its antiquities, its agriculture, the manners and customs of the people, and their folklore. A second part, written by the Rev. W. A. Shuffrey, will describe the daughter parish of Halton Gill, and will also treat of the local flora. The volume will be illustrated with six full-page etchings and twelve woodcuts, after drawings formerly in the possession of Archdeacon Boyd.

MR. WILLIAM BLACK'S new story, "The Handsome Humes," now running serially in Harper's Magazine, will be published in the autumn, by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co., in three volumes.

A STORY by Mr. Grant Allen, entitled An Army Doctor's Romance, will shortly appear in Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Co.'s "Breezy Library."

THE next volume of the "Elizabethan Library" will be a selection from the works of Francis Bacon, edited by Dr. Grossart, under the title of Thoughts that Breathe and Words that Burn.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. have ready for immediate issue a new book on sport by Mr. T. E. Kebbel, entitled My First Grouse.

MR. DE V. PAYEN-PAYNE, of King's College School, is about to publish, through Messrs. Nutt, a work on "French Idioms and Proverbs." It will be a companion volume to Prof. Dehumbert's Dictionary of Difficulties; and a special aim of the author has been to translate the French idioms, whenever possible, by English equivalents.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON announce a third edition of Annie S. Swan's new story, Homespun, of which twenty thousand copies have been sold within a month of publication.

THE Queen has been pleased to accept a copy of the revised and enlarged edition of Extinct Monsters, by the Rev. H. N. Hutchinson—a book which met with so much success last winter.

THE late John Addington Symonds bequeathed the copyright of his published works, and all his MSS. and unpublished works, to Mr. H. F. Brown, the historian of Venice.

AT a representative meeting of anglers, held at Broxbourne on August 9, it was resolved to commemorate the three-hundredth anniversary of Isaak Walton's birth by placing a stained-glass window in the church of St. Dunstan's, Fleet-street, where he was once churchwarden.

THE fifty-fourth annual report of the Deputy-Keeper of the Public Records has just been issued as a parliamentary paper. It states that the number of registered applications for the production of records, state papers, &c., in 1892, was—in the legal search room, 15,904; in the literary search room, 27,046; total, 42,950.

THE Nation for July 20 prints the will of John Washington, the eldest son of the original immigrant of the same name, about whom practically nothing has hitherto been known. The will is dated January 22, 1697, and was proved in the following month; the executors are the widow and the brother, Captain Lawrence Washington, from whom the President was descended.

APPARENTLY, the copyright of Uncle Tom's Cabin has run out during the lifetime of the authoress, and cheap editions are being put upon the American market. The authorised publishers, Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., call theirs the Brunswick edition, after the place where the book was written; and in recognition of it Mrs. Beecher Stowe has written a pleasant letter of thanks, which shows that her state of health must be much better than it has usually been represented.

THE Author for August contains some "American Notes and News," by Mr. Walter Besant, who has, we believe, returned to England; and also a long account of the proceedings at the World's Congress of Authors at Chicago, in which Mr. Besant took part, reading a paper upon "The Rights and Interests of Authors."

MR. K. DEIGHTON has published (George Bell & Sons) a pamphlet, containing Conjectural Readings in Marston's Works. Taking as a standard Bullen's edition (3 vols., 1887), he also considers the early texts. All of his emendations are worthy of attention, and some of them may be called palmary. For example, in "The Malcontent," v. 1, 213, where Don Cupid is described as "emperor of sighs and protestations, great king of kisses, archduke of dalliance, and sole loved of her," for the last three words he would read "lord of hymen," comparing "Love's Labour's Lost," III. i., 182-188. In "Sophonisba," I., ii., 76, he defends the reading "our anchor is come back," against Bullen's conjecture "rancour," by again appealing to Shakspeare, "The Winter's Tale," I. ii., 213, 214.

"You had much ado to make his anchor hold,
When you cast out, it still came home."
In "The Insatiate Countess," III. ii., 7, for "Fear keep with cowards, air-stars cannot move,"
he reads
"Fear keeps with cowards, air stars cannot move."
And in the same play, V. i., 42, for "Although Neptolis cold, the waves of all the Northern Sea,"
he reads
"Although, Niphates-cold, the Northern Sea."
More than once Mr. Deighton supports his emendations by supposing that the compositor had misunderstood corrections in Marston's original draft, and had incorporated both the correction and the words intended to be struck out.

WE have received the second number of "Harrow Octocentenary Tracts" (Cambridge: Macmillan and Bowes), containing a lecture by the Rev. W. Done Bushell, upon the Clovesho charter of Wulfred and Cwoenthryth, which he printed, with notes and explanations, in the first tract of the series. He is to be congratulated on his success in disentangling this complicated question.

THE name of the bookseller in Shaftesbury-avenue, whose catalogue was noticed in the ACADEMY of last week, ought to have been given as Mr. Frank T. Sabin.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE draft charter for a University of Wales, approved by the Privy Council, has now been laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament. It begins by including Monmouthshire in Wales, and then proceeds to throw open to women not only the degrees, but also every office in the university. The governing body, styled the University Court, is constituted largely on the principle of popular representation. The three existing University Colleges, at Aberystwith, Bangor, and Cardiff, are to be the constituent colleges; but others may be added by supplementary charter. The Senate is composed of the principals and heads of departments in these colleges; the remaining members of the teaching staff, together with any persons holding university degrees who have studied in these colleges, make up a third body called the Guild of Graduates. Degrees may be conferred in arts, science, law, and music, but not in medicine or surgery; and special conditions are imposed with regard to degrees in theology.

A CONFERENCE on secondary education will be held at Oxford, in the Examination Schools, on October 10 and 11. The following are the two special subjects for consideration, upon each branch of which short papers will be read as a basis for discussion:

"The need of various types of secondary education in England, with special reference to (1) the curricula and gradation of first grade schools (classical and modern), second grade schools, and higher Grad-Board school respectively; (2) the provision of preparatory schools for the upper grades of secondary schools; and (3) the relation between secondary schools and the universities.

"The means for supplying the needs for secondary education in England, with special reference to (1) the central authority, (2) provincial and district authorities, (3) the registration of teachers and schools."

IN reply to a question asked in the House of Commons on Tuesday, it was stated, on behalf of the government, that the university of Oxford is making arrangements for the training of student interpreters, in connexion with the existing arrangements for students destined for the Indian Civil Service. In addition to the lectureships in Arabic and Persian, it is proposed to appoint a lecturer in Turkish, who would also teach modern Greek.

WE understand that Prof. J. E. B. Mayor proposes to issue very shortly the second part of the Registers of St. John's College, Cambridge, extending to the year 1715, with elaborate indices.

MR. JOHN RUSSELL, assistant master at University College School, has been appointed to the wardenship of University Hall, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed.

MR. H. B. POLLARD, of Oxford, has been elected to a Berkeley research fellowship in zoology at Owens College, Manchester.

MR. R. W. STEWART, demonstrator in physics at Bangor, has obtained the degree of Doctor of Science from the University of London. His thesis, containing the results of a series of experimental determinations of the thermo-conductivities of iron and copper, will be published in the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society.

DR. JAMES ALEXANDER CRAIG, of Cincinnati—who recently spent some time studying the cuneiform tablets in the British Museum and at Berlin—has been appointed professor of Semitic languages and Hellenistic Greek in the University of Michigan.

GENERAL A. C. MCCLURG, the Chicago publisher, has received the honorary degree of LL.D. from the University of Yale.

MISS MARY BRODRICK, of London, has received the honorary degree of Doctor of Philosophy from Bethany College, Kansas, the same university that bestowed the like honour upon Miss Amelia B. Edwards.

THE death is announced of Mr. Edward T. McLaughlin, professor of English and belles-lettres at the University of Yale.

WE have received from Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons a handsome volume, entitled Princeton Sketches: the Story of Nassau Hall by G. R. Wallace, "class of '91." It appears that the College of New Jersey—for such is its official style—was founded by charter in 1746, and that its first home was at Newark. Nassau Hall, so-called after William III., was opened at Prince Town (now Princeton) in 1756. Its subsequent history is given in this volume, which is abundantly illustrated from photographs. In this country, the name of Princeton University—if it be correct to call it so—is indelibly associated with the name of Dr. James McCosh, who was summoned from Belfast to be its president in 1868, after the close of the Civil War period; and who, after serving in that office for twenty years, is still enjoying a green old age of honour and literary labour. There is more than one portrait of him in this volume, as well as a reproduction of the bronze statue in Marquand Chapel. Those curious about student life in the United States will also find here many details about secret clubs and other peculiar customs.

PROF. KONRAD VON MAURER, of Munich, entered upon his seventieth year last April. To celebrate that event, his pupils have published a handsome volume, entitled Germanische Abhandlungen (Göttingen: Dietrich), containing discussions, in German and the Scandinavian languages, upon questions of Teutonic and Norse history, literature, language, and law.

IZAAK WALTON'S HANGING CUPBOARD.

The Owner "loquitur."

HAUNTED by Izaak's presence sure thou art;
For, gazing on thee, ancient cabinet,
Forgot are mortal ills, and the world's fret,
When thus before thee, hastens to depart;
And a brief season of that sweet content
That in thy earliest Master ever reigned,
When in this England naught but strife obtained,
Steals o'er my heart, and draweth nourishment
In quiet thoughts that to his name pertain;
I scent the haystack—hear the birds and streams,
Hold converse with his worthies in these dreams,
And love the gentle craft and gentler swain.
On thy carved panels dwell my charmed eyes,
And days of eld, rejuvenate, arise.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE August number of the Expositor contains articles of unequal value, but on subjects of much interest. In dealing with St. Paul's conception of the divine righteousness, Dr. Bruce gives some more of his keen but not unfair criticisms of other interpreters. How difficult a theologian St. Paul must be! will be the comment of the non-specialist. Dr. John Taylor's study on Amos is a capital specimen of popularised criticism. It is undesirable, however, to quote from the Avesta without giving the name of the translator who is followed, and the exact reference to his work. Prof. Ramsay on the Pastoral Epistles and Tacitus will be read, as usual, with deep interest, though he damages his own cause by his want of deference towards Biblical criticism; even Prof. Sanday is not historical enough in his method to please this revolutionary historian. Prof. Beet seems somewhat too modern in his exegesis of Hebrew vi. 4-6, and Dean Chadwick altogether too uncomprehending in his controversy with Prof. Huxley and not a few other expert critics. Prof. Adeney discusses the opening pages of Weizsäcker's "Das apostolische Zeitalter" (second edition). The paper is of value as introductory to the subject of Weizsäcker's lifelong study of the Christian records, in his views of which he has not aimed at perfect self-consistency. With slight but kindly notices of books Prof. Dods closes the number.

THE current number of the Jewish Quarterly Review (David Nutt) contains two articles of a more popular character than usual. One is an eloquent lecture, recently delivered by Mr. Claude Montefiore at the Jews' College Literary Society, upon Hebrew and Greek ideas of providence and divine retribution; the other, by Mr. Oswald John Simon, is the expression of a hope that the theistic beliefs of reformed Judaism might afford the basis of a religion for non-Jewish agnostics. Another interesting paper is a study of the relations between the Emperor Julian and the Jews, by the Rev. Michael Adler. He shows that Julian, though well-read in the Old Testament, knew it only from the Septuagint version; and he implies that Julian's comparatively favourable estimate of Judaism was due to his greater hatred of Christianity. With regard to the legend that Julian attempted to rebuild the Temple, but was hindered by miracles, Mr. Adler finds in the evidence nothing more than an intention, which might have been realised if the Emperor had ever returned from Persia. Among the reviews is a careful summary of Chwolson's essay, in the Memoirs of the Imperial Academy of St. Petersburg, upon the contradiction between the Synoptic Gospels and St. John as to the day of the Last Supper. Chwolson reconciles the contradiction by means of a conjectural emendation in the presumed Aramaic original of St. Matthew (xxvi. 17), which would give the 14th Nisan for the day of the crucifixion, and consequently the 13th Nisan for the day of the Paschal meal, as in St. John. It requires to be also assumed that the two other Synoptics copied either St. Matthew, or his corrupted original. But Chwolson goes on further. Why did Jesus celebrate the Paschal meal not on the 14th Nisan (the day fixed by the law), but on the previous day? As to this, following a suggestion of Joseph Derenbourg, he suggests that Jesus followed the Sadducean practice of that time, according to which the Paschal lamb could not be eaten on a Friday, but might be eaten either in the morning of the previous day, or in the following evening. Jesus adopted the former alternative; Caiaphas the latter. Chwolson also argues that it was the Sadducees, and not the Pharisees, who were responsible for the death of Jesus. Finally, we must briefly mention that the Rev. R. H. Charles, the editor of the Book of Enoch, gives a preliminary account of two hitherto uncollated Aethiopic MSS., of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, from which he promises to reconstruct the text of the Book of Jubilees, known hitherto only from two most corrupt modern MSS., and from a fragmentary Latin version.

THE Contemporary Review has an article by Mr. J. Rendell Harris, entitled "The Structure of the Gospel of Peter," which would be more effective if it did not degenerate into a mere polemic against Dr. Martineau. For, as may be supposed, Mr. Rendell Harris has something of importance to say. In the face of the admitted fact that the newly discovered gospel contains not a single verbal quotation from the Old Testament, he boldly argues that it shows everywhere traces of a highly evolved prophetic gnosis, and (in particular) that most of the apparently new matter in it is taken from the Old Testament. To support this ingenious theory, a number of passages are quoted from the prophets, especially from the Septuagint version, which were interpreted by the early Fathers in a Messianic sense; and it is contended that these interpretations have furnished the pseudo-Peter with what he records as facts in his gospel. This argument, however, is capable of being pressed too far. For if, on the strength of it, the pseudo-Peter is to be dubbed "a systematic pilferer of the Prophets," what is to be said of the statements about the fulfilment of prophecy in the Canonical Gospels (especially John), which become specially numerous in the account of the Crucifixion? It seems to us difficult to assert that the difference here is one of kind, and not of degree only. Mr. Rendell Harris deals carefully with the connexion between the pseudo-Peter and Justin Martyr, but finds himself unable to arrive at any definite conclusion. The strongest argument, he thinks, is the common use of the word λαχμός, concerning which Dr. Martineau made an awkward slip—it is nothing more—pointed out at the time in the ACADEMY.

PROF. ZIMMER ON NENNIUS.*

I. — THE DATE OF NENNIUS AND OF THE COMPONENT PARTS OF THE HISTORIA BRITTONUM.

THE importance of the work which goes under the name of Nennius for the early history of Britain is so great, the problems connected with its date, origin, and character are so complicated, that Prof. Zimmer cannot fail of a welcome for investigations conducted with his wonted acuteness and subtlety. Nor is any apology needed for laying before the English reader a brief summary of researches which, if their results be assured, form one of the most important contributions ever made to the study of Celtic history and literature. "Nennius Vindictus," thus does Prof. Zimmer entitle his work—with what justice will be seen presently.

As is well known, existing MSS. of Nennius fall into three well defined classes, represented by Harl. 3859, Vat. 1964, and Cantab. F.f. 1.27.2; or, as they may be styled, the Harley, Vatican, and Cambridge recensions. Harley and Cambridge agree as against Vatican in style and phrasing, but differ from each other both in the amount and in the ordering of the matter. The Vatican recension has been held by many scholars to represent the oldest and purest stage of the work—a claim disproved by the fact that its Latin is infinitely more correct and fluent than that of the other recensions, as well as by its presenting a list of the civitates, the order of which was disturbed by the scribe's reading the three-column arrangement of his model downwards instead of across. The Vatican recension is, in effect, a specific English edition of the original Welsh work.

From a close examination of the MSS. of the Harley and Cambridge classes, Prof. Zimmer concludes that the former not only furnishes the oldest and best text, but served as basis for the Cambridge recension, which then incorporated a number of supplementary glosses. At the same time the arrangement of the subject matter, by which, in addition to these supplements, the Cambridge differs from the Harley recension, is much better in the former. And if we examine the Irish version of Nennius due to the eleventh century Irish antiquary, Gilla Coemáin, which dates at the latest from the year 1076, it is found to correspond to the Cambridge recension, a MS. of which must have been in Gilla Coemáin's hands.

It is possible to fix a terminus a quo for MSS. of this recension, as one of them in the computus prefixed to the Historia proper mentions the thirtieth year of Anaraut, King of Anglesey, as that in which the scribe wrote; and this date corresponds to 910 A.D.

Thus, the Cambridge recension, which presupposes an earlier Harley text, is at least as old as the late ninth century. But it is possible to get much farther back. One peculiarity of the Cambridge recension consists in a series of additions and interpolations, obviously the work of one man. What this redactor says about himself enables one to identify him with North Wales. He was a scholar of a priest, Beulan by name, for whom he compiled his version; and as he alludes to verbal communications which he received from Archbishop Elbodug, of Bangor, who died in 809, he cannot, to judge by these references, have written later than 810.

We have seen that the Cambridge recension is superior to the existing Harley one in the arrangement of the subject matter, while at the same time the MS. upon which it was based belonged to the Harley class. Can this superiority be placed to the credit of Beulan's scholar? No, answers Prof. Zimmer, who examines seriatim the additions made in the Cambridge, or, as it should be styled, North Welsh recension, and shows that the manner of their introduction betrays an absolute lack of critical or constructive faculty. Beulan's scholar must therefore have had a Harley version, which did not present the faulty arrangement of existing MSS. And if these be closely scanned, they afford conclusive evidence of a former ordering of the subject matter similar to that which obtains in the North Welsh recension. Prof. Zimmer shows, in the most ingenious manner, that the prototype of the existing Harley recension was written in 820, was composed of sixteen quires of 4pp. each, and how, owing to the misplacing of pp. 2 and 14, the disorder of the subject matter which characterises this recension was caused.

Taking the Stevenson-San Marte edition as a basis, Prof. Zimmer determines the contents and order of the original possessed by Beulan's scholar, as follows: Paragraphs 3 (Preface), 4-6 (Sex aetates mundi), 7-9 (geographia) 10 (first sentence only), 17 (from second sentence to end), 10 (second sentence), 11-15, 19 (1. 2 et seq.) 20-27 (1. 12), 29 (1. 2 to end), 27 (1. 12), 28, 30, 31-56, 57-65 (Saxon Genealogies, Civitates, Mirabilia). Paragraphs 16 and 18 of our present Nennius were thus lacking in the pre 810 text.

Who was the author of that text and what was his date? There is absolutely no reason to doubt that he was, as he himself states, Nennius, a follower of Elbodug. Now Elbodug was the head of the Roman party in the Welsh Church, and after a long struggle succeeded in inducing the same submission to Roman claims that Adamnan had obtained from the Irish Church. Nennius, his follower, is only acting as might be expected in his insistence upon the conversion of Britain through the mission sent by Pope Eleutherus to King Lucius, a story obviously forged in the late seventh century in support of the Roman claims. THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY LIBRARY.

THE report of the Library Syndicate does not give any figures for the total number of additions during the year, nor does it contain any financial statement. But it does make special mention of the principal donations, and prints a complete list of them in an appendix of some fifteen pages.

The late Prof. Adams bequeathed to the Library such of his early printed books as the Librarian should select. In this way about 1500 volumes, mostly printed before the year 1700, have been added to the library, where they will commemorate at once the many-sided exploring instinct of their late owner, and his affectionate care for the University Library. They will be kept together as a special collection, and the catalogue will form an extra volume of the Bulletin.

Mr. Samuel Sandars has again made many valuable additions to the collection of early-printed books. Some of these were the subject of a special report, which has already been noticed in the ACADEMY. Mr. Sandars has since presented an odd folio volume (vol. ii., part 1) of the Latin Bible printed at Mainz in 1462, in which the initial letters are partly printed in red and dull blue; a quarto copy of the Facetiae Morales, by the printer of the Speculum Humanae Salvationis, circa 1470; Ambrosius de Officiis, (Ubr. Zell, Cologne, circa 1470); the fifth (or fourth) edition of the German Bible; two vols. folio (Augsburg, circa 1473-75); Dat liden ende die passie ons heeven Jesu Christi (Haarlem, 1483)—the only perfect copy known to exist of the first book printed at Haarlem with a date; The Chronicles of England (St. Alban's, 1483); W. Lyndwode's Provinciale (Wynkyn de Worde, Westminster, 1496); and a specimen of morocco binding executed for John Grolier—the sides, which are in good condition, were used long ago to form the binding of a smaller book; they are now exhibited in their original form, with a modern morocco back.

The Rev. H. Bothamley has given a small collection of books in choice condition. These include a copy of the Book of Common Prayer, printed at Verdun in 1810 for the use of the British prisoners of war; the Olney Hymns (1779); The Christian Year, in 2 vols. (Oxford, 1827); and early editions (undated) of Little Goody Two-Shoes, and similar books for children.

Prof. Mayor, Mr. G. A. Matthew, Prof. Maitland, Mr. C. L. Prince, the Rev. W. G. Searle, and Mr. B. Taylor have made considerable donations.

Among the items, we may specially mention:—Two broadsides of Charles I., from the consistory of the London Dutch Church; four sermons of the very end of the sixteenth century, which originally formed part of a volume in the Royal Library, but have recently been missing—they were found on a stall in Farringdon-road; six folio volumes of Political Sketches by H. B.; and Prof. Jebb's Commentary on the Areopagitica of Milton, privately printed at Cambridge in 1872.

The purchases made during the year were comparatively unimportant. Those of MSS. include several Syriac codices, which have not yet been catalogued or described; a Greek MS. (circa 1500), containing glossaries, ascetic rules, &c.; a remarkably full collection, entitled "Collectarius S. Adriani martyris Geraldimontensis ecclesiae" (circa 1200); and Higden's Polichronicon on vellum, dated 1367, with a Latin poem on Death, beginning "Surge piger quare dormis mortis memor esto."

The purchases of printed books include:—a folio Latin Bible printed at Strassburg by H. Eggestein (circa 1446); seven scarce Flemish fifteenth century books, from the Kockx sale at Antwerp; and some sixteen other incunabula of the German and Italian presses.

We may add a record of the chief additions to the library of the Selwyn Divinity School. Mrs. Hort has given 300 volumes from her late husband's library, selected by Prof. Ryle, to fill up such gaps as might exist. The Rev. C. A. Goodhart, of Sheffield, has given a copy of "Vetus Testamentum Graecum ex Codice MS. Alexandrino descriptum cura et labore H. H. Baber" (1828). The three folio volumes, with the supplement, are in magnificent condition, as perfect in every respect as when they were first issued. Mr. W. Aldis Wright has given Mill's Greek Testament (two vols. folio), Buxtorf's Hebrew Concordance (1632), Englishman's Hebrew Concordance, Greenfield's Syriac New Testament, and Henderson's Syriac Lexicon.

The committee of the Philosophical Library report that, in consequence of the financial position of the University, they have refrained from asking for leave to purchase books, and also that they have confined their bills for binding within the limits of the strictest necessity.

CORRESPONDENCE.

RACIAL DWARFS IN THE ATLAS AND THE PYRENEES.

United Service Club: August 5, 1893.

Mr. Haliburton complains of finding that people "get into a rage about so very little a thing as a dwarf." Let me say that no competent ethnologist will be either surprised at, or indisposed to welcome, any new discovery of dwarf races. But what may not unreasonably provoke those interested in such discoveries are assertions of which the positiveness is out of proportion to the adequacy of proof, and particularly the imbedding of these assertions in a maze of other assertions of the most questionable, if not incredible, character.

As to Mr. Haliburton's attack on myself, charging me with "an acrimony of dissent unusual in such discussions," I shall only state the following facts. It was I who was asked to report explanation of the origin of the Lucius legend, and of the reason why Nennius has absurdly placed the alleged mission under Pope Evaristus, is a masterpiece of ingenuity.

The date of Nennius is thus partly settled by the fact of his acquaintance with Elbodug, who died in 809. Other indications agree. Nennius alludes to Fernmail, Kinglet of Bulth (reigned 785-815), and to Catel Durnluc, King of Powys (died 808) the object of both passages being to glorify the ancestors of these chiefs. He was evidently a native of Powys, a fact otherwise proved by the large proportion of the Mirabilia belonging to that and neighbouring districts, and by his statement that he was an eye-witness of a "Marvel" the scene of which was at Llan Garan, in what is now part of West Herefordshire.

It is possible not only to fix the period within which Nennius must have written, but the very year in which he finished the Historia Brittonum. One portion of that work, the so-called Saxon Genealogies, has long been recognised as an independent and much earlier tract. It is, in reality, a summary of the relations between the Angles and Britons of North Britain from the year 547 to the year 679 (the ninth year of Egfrith, son of Oswy), in which it was finished; and it is the work of a North British writer.

This work did not reach Nennius in its original condition. Divers interpolations were made with a view of continuing the genealogies of the various Saxon kings from the year 679 onwards. Nennius himself continued the Mercian genealogies (in which, as a native of Powys, he was of course specially interested) down to his own day; and as the last entry is that of Egfrith, son of Offa, who died in 796 after a short reign, it follows that the Historia Brittonum must have been completed in that year. It was probably sent almost immediately to Elbodug at Bangor, and thus became known to Beulan's scholar, who, as we have seen, knew Elbodug personally. It mainly consisted of two portions: (a) The older North British history of the years 547-679; (b) Nennius's own work, which is in effect a history of Britain prior to the year 547.

The question then arises—Why did the 679 North British writer begin with the year 547? There were Angles in North Britain before then. He wrote, answers Prof. Zimmer, as a continuator of Gildas. Preceding this writer's "jobation" of his British contemporaries is a meagre and jejune sketch of the history of Britain. In some MSS.—e.g., Stevenson's A—this is transcribed separately as Gildas Historia, in contradistinction to the Epistola proper. But this very MS. (Cant. F. f. 1.27.2) was written at Durham, and its prototype may well have been known to the 679 writer. In the Epistola Gildas has much to say about Maelgwn; but the 679 writer, only knowing the Historia, starts his account of the Angle kings with Maelgwn's contemporary, Ida, and of the British kings with Maelgwn himself.

We may now conjecture that what reached Nennius's hand was—(a) the very meagre sketch of pre-547 British history by Gildas; (b) the (comparatively speaking) full and detailed sketch of North British history from 547 to 679. Nennius had a sense of proportion, and wrote his Historia to supersede Gildas's meagre sketch; but in so doing he was largely influenced by Gildas's hints, of which his own work is, in effect, an amplification. Thus, Gildas's words—"bis denis, bisque quaternis fulget civitatibus"—gave rise to the list of the twenty-eight civitates.

So far Prof. Zimmer in the first half of his work. The latter half is devoted to discussing the sources made use of by Nennius in the compilation of the Historia Brittonum. This I propose to summarise next week.

ALFRED NUTT.

in his paper offered to the Orientalist Congress of 1891, and I did so favourably. Ever since then, and no later than in Nature of July 27, I have publicly expressed my agreement with him as to the probable former wide distribution of dwarf races. And from private conversation and correspondence Mr. Haliburton is aware that certain theories of my own, and one particularly as to the origin of stories of fairies, would be so greatly strengthened by further additions to the evidence collected by De Quatrefages and others as to the existence of dwarf races, that such further discoveries would be welcomed by few persons more than by myself.

The very fact, however, that I have theories which would be supported by further evidence as to the existence of racial dwarfs makes me, perhaps, more critical than I might otherwise be of such evidence. Now, I have not seen the Morocco Times of January 26, about dwarfs in the Atlas; but I have seen the letter of Mr. Harris in the London Times of January 10, the evidence on which Mr. Haliburton appears chiefly to rely. And this is how Mr. Harris summarises the results of his researches: "Although, perhaps, our visit to the Atlas may tend to prove the existence of small people, it will certainly have a damping effect upon the many romances woven up with their existence"; and he then proceeds to contradict these "romances" of Mr. Haliburton's. Mr. Harris finally "finds himself forced to believe that they owe their small stature to the climatic influences and the rigorous conditions of life in the country they inhabit." And as to the dwarfs whom Mr. Haliburton believes to be living in the Wad Draa, Mr. Harris says, "I am unable even to venture an opinion." But there is clearly nothing in this to negative the existence of racial dwarfs in the Atlas; and I regret that the corrected proof of my letter in the ACADEMY of July 22 was unfortunately received too late, in which I made it, perhaps, more clear that what I questioned was not so much the existence of these asserted racial dwarfs, as the further assertions as to the Egyptian "Holy Land of Punt" on the Atlantic shores of the Atlas, &c., &c.

As to the asserted dwarfs in the Pyrenees, I should have been particularly delighted to discover them, as they would have been in the most interesting relations with the Ligurian giants whose caves I had been exploring on the Riviera. Mr. Haliburton now complains that I made my inquiries in France and not in Spain. But my inquiries were chiefly made in the South of France simply because Mr. Haliburton, in his letter to Nature last January, located his dwarfs "within half a day's journey of Toulouse." Now he says that they are "only a few hours by rail from Barcelona." But to his informant at Barcelona I also wrote, not, however, in such a way as Mr. Haliburton groundlessly supposes, but merely asking whether Mr. McPherson had received any further information on the subject, and whether he could oblige me with some rough estimate as to the probable time required for, and expense of, my proposed journey in search of these dwarfs. To this letter, as I have said, I had no reply. Had Mr. McPherson informed me, as Mr. Haliburton now informs us, that these Pyrenean dwarfs are "only a few hours by rail from Barcelona," I should immediately have decided on the journey. But Mr. McPherson's silence naturally appeared ominous, particularly as, in his letter in Nature, he had admitted that the dwarfs are often confounded with Cretins, and that he had never himself visited the place, though of so easy access.

I shall only add that the facts which I stated in the ACADEMY of July 22, and in Nature of July 27, had been withheld for five months in the hope that my extensive correspondence about these dwarfs would lead to some confirmation of Mr. Haliburton's assertions. Let the reader, therefore, judge of the "sweet reasonableness" of his charge of "acrimony of dissent."

SCIENCE.

THE AÏNOS OF SAGHALIEN.

Life with Trans-Siberian Savages. By B. Douglas Howard. (Longmans.)

THE people described in this book are the Aïnos of Saghalien (or, as the author would prefer to write it, the "Ainus" of "Sakhalin")—"the most ancient, distant, and least known savages surviving in Asia." Mr. Howard appears to have been unaware of the existence of these people until the spring of 1890, when he saw his first Aïno—a woman—in the hospital at Korsakoff, in Saghalien. So impressed was he with her appearance, that he could not rest until, by the friendly aid of the Russian deputy-governor, he was enabled to visit some of her kindred in their forest home, where he remained for some time as a guest. In this way he obtained an insight into their daily life, which, handicapped though he was by his ignorance of their language, has qualified him for contributing much fresh information upon this subject.

One experiences a feeling of disappointment on first opening Mr. Howard's book, and realising that it does not contain a single illustration. This is due, however, not to any want of foresight on the part of the author, but to an unlucky adventure which he thus describes (pp. 96-98):

"In a very quiet way I had taken a good many carefully selected snapshots with my camera, which included the old chief, the wizard, and several other portraits. . . . One day, when several men were in the hut with the chief, I took the opportunity to attempt a surprise, and watch the effect upon them as I displayed before them their newly-finished portraits. Instantly they sprang to their feet as if they had been shot. All except the chief rushed out of the hut as if in a rage. The old chief stamped up and down the hut in the greatest distress. Hearing a great hubbub mixed with wild cries outside, I went to the hut-door, where I found these people, whose gentle virtues I have so faithfully depicted, raving and gesticulating in the most menacing manner. To my utter consternation, I saw that some of them were brandishing sticks, some of them knives, that indeed one and all were suddenly changed to savages of the wildest type."

The upshot of all this was that camera and photographs had alike to be mercilessly committed to the flames; and so the book remains unillustrated. It contains, however, some excellent verbal descriptions: for example, of the Aïno method of decoying deer into an ambush by imitating the bleating of a doe, and occasionally showing a pair of antlers above the tall grass, as though a stag were quietly grazing there. There is also a capital account of a bear-hunt, on which occasion a timely bullet from Mr. Howard's rifle not only finished the bear, but saved the life of an Aïno, just as he was about to receive "the final crunch and hug." The Aïno custom of employing dogs to chase and catch fish is certainly very remarkable, and is here (pp. 51-52) described for, I think, the first time.

Of the appearance of those people a great deal has been written; but the accounts of travellers vary so much in this respect that a few extracts from the report of a new observer are desirable. Their complexion he invariably regards as dark, somewhere between copper-colour and the hue of "pale Turkish tobacco" (a delightfully novel simile). This agrees with the testimony of most modern travellers, although it is noteworthy that three seventeenth-century writers speak of the natives of Saghalien and Yesso as white men. Describing the chief of the village, Mr. Howard says that "the whole of his body, which, except for a strip of loin-cloth, was quite naked, was covered with straggling black hairs from one to three inches in length, the upper parts of the face along excepted." More valuable, because more exceptional, is his statement that the women are almost as hirsute as the men. What first aroused his interest in the race "was that the neck, chest, arms, and, as I afterwards found, the whole body" of the woman in the hospital at Korsakoff "was more hairy than the most hairy man I ever saw." And he afterwards found that the women in "a thoroughly representative family hut" "were also all over the body nearly as hairy as the men." This is what one would expect of the females of a race whose men have been fitly styled hommes velus. Yet, of all the Aïno scenes known to the present writer, only one—a large and beautifully executed panorama in the museum of the Royal Zoological Society at Amsterdam—represents the women as femmes velues. Unaccountable though it may appear, the women are almost invariably portrayed as smooth of skin, although, of course, having the mop-like heads and shaggy eyebrows of their race. Lieut. Holland, indeed, distinctly states that "the women do not seem to participate in this [the peculiarity of a furry skin], and are not more hairy than is ordinarily the case." Consequently, Mr. Howard's testimony is of much importance, supporting, as it does, the evidence furnished by the Amsterdam picture. Another exceptional statement in this work is that the men tattoo themselves, although the tattooing "is generally confined to a spot in the middle of the lips, to imitation finger-rings, and to the forearm as far as the elbow." The abundant tattooing of the women he, of course, mentions; as do all other writers on the Aïnos. But this seems to be the only instance in which the men are spoken of as tattooed. Noteworthy, also, is Mr. Howard's statement that his host was "about five feet ten" inches in height. This contrasts very strongly with Anutschin's estimate of "four feet six" as the average height of Aïnos; and with the "dwarfs" recorded in 1613, and at earlier dates. Very many writers, however, report Aïnos of almost as great a stature as the one just referred to.

There is much else of interest in the book, but, for the most part, the descriptions are familiar to students of the Aïnos. Although Mr. Howard agrees with modern writers in alleging that these people "have no written language," he nevertheless shows (pp. 96 and 110-111) that they communicate with each other by means of something very like "rune-staves."

Owing, no doubt, to his recent interest in the race, Mr. Howard has obviously made very little acquaintance with the literature of this subject. "So little known is this people as they still survive in their original home," he remarks, "that I find only two observers who have written about them, and that was nearly three hundred years ago." By "their original home" he means Saghalien; and yet, of that section of the race alone, much has been written within late years. In 1888, two years before Mr. Howard had seen his first Aïno, there had appeared an account of Captain Jakobson's "Reise" in Saghalien, with many particulars regarding the Aïnos there; and in the same year M. Hégel had a note, "Sur les insulaires de Karofuto" [Saghalien], in the pages of Lotus (vol. vi.). But besides these there are many others—Davidoff, Tarenetzky, Aston, Bickmore, Dixon, Greey, Von Schrenk—all these have discussed the Aïnos of Saghalien. As for those divisions of the race inhabiting Yesso and the Kurile Islands, they have received still greater attention. The Bibliography appended to Prof. Romyn Hitchcock's admirable monograph on the Aïnos of Yesso (which itself occupies seventy-four pages of the Smithsonian Report for 1890) gives no fewer than fifty-three references to works on the Aïnos, all by modern writers, European and American; while there are more than twice that number of references in a recently-published work on the same subject by the present writer (supplement to vol. iv. of the Internationales Archiv für Ethnographie). Each list has something that the other lacks, and yet neither is complete. So that Mr. Howard's observation, quoted above, and his further statement (p. 170) that "the only source from which any European can get a reliable account of the religious beliefs, and of the significance of the religious rites and ceremonies of the Sakhalin Aïnos" is Mr. Batchelor's Ainu of Japan, merely show that the wide territory of Aïno literature is almost as little known to him as were the forests of Saghalien four years ago.

This, however, does not detract in the least from the genuine value of his own observations, obtained at a sacrifice of personal comfort from which many would shrink. But in order to understand the disagreeables of Aïno life one must read descriptions such as his. It is to his credit that he went through these experiences so cheerfully; still more so that his hosts parted from him with such sincere sorrow.

It is to be regretted, indeed, that Mr. Howard did not confine himself entirely to his own experiences, on which he could have enlarged much more fully. The later pages admittedly contain much that is found in Mr. Batchelor's book, and apparently very little that is the result of Mr. Howard's own observation. Of minor defects, the only important one is the absence of an index; it is almost superfluous to refer to the Americanism "smell of," for "smell," on p. 133, although it jars on the British ear. But the book, as a whole, is well worthy of perusal by anyone interested in the Aïnos, or, indeed, in the inner life of any savage people, as described—not by a passing tourist—but by one who has taken the trouble to live among them for a time as one of themselves.

DAVID MACRITCHIE.

RECENT ARMENIAN PUBLICATIONS.

THE following are some of the works which have appeared during the last two or three years, and which deserve notice.

(1) History of Armenian Journalism, by Gregory W. Kalemkiar (at the press of the Mechitarists, Vienna, 1893). This is an account of the Armenian journals, monthly, weekly, or daily, which have been published in the Armenian language during the last hundred years. It is interesting to remark that the first Armenian journal appeared at Madras and flourished during the years 1794-1796. It was called the Azdarar, or Intelligencer, and appeared once a month. Dr. Kalemkiar gives a facsimile of one of its pages. The types used seem to have been the same with which the "Isagoge with Commentaries" of Porphyry had been printed at Madras in the year 1793.

A bi-monthly journal of the same name was begun in Madras in 1846; and in 1848 and 1849 another paper circulated called the Philologus, giving political as well as literary and other news. In Constantinople there is said to be still preserved a complete set of the Intelligencer of 1794 to 1796. In Calcutta also during the first ten years of this century there was an Armenian journal, now lost, all except in name. From 1845-1852 an important Armenian newspaper was printed in Calcutta called the Patriot. In the early years of the century an Armenian journal, of which only the name is preserved, seems to have existed in Bombay. In Singapore the Armenian colony had their newspaper from 1849 to 1853. It appeared twice a month, and was called the Philomath, and contained political, literary, and religious news.

In Constantinople an Armenian newspaper was first published in 1832; between which date and 1893 no less than twenty journals have been started there. Few of them have lived over five years; but the Masis has lasted from 1832 until 1893, and has been issued daily since 1879. The Messenger has gone on from 1855 until now. In Smyrna the Armenians have had newspapers since 1839. The Mechitarists, or Uniat Armenians, have issued periodicals at Venice from 1800 until now. Their Basmawép, or "Polyhistor," was begun in 1843, and still appears once a month, well written and full of learning. At Vienna the same congregation started a brief-lived journal in 1819; and a more successful one in 1847, the Europa, which went on till 1863. At Tiflis the Armenians began to print newspapers in 1846, and in Moscow in 1858; in Paris in 1855. Dr. Kalemkiar's little history is well printed, and costs 2fr. 50c. I know of no more interesting record of the wide-spread literary activity of his race: unfortunately, being written in modern Armenian, it is accessible to few.

(2) Nouvelles sources de Moïse de Khoren, par A. Carrière (Paris: 1893), and Moïse de Khoren et les généalogies patriarcales (Paris: 1891). M. Carrière, who is professor of Armenian at Paris, contends in these two pamphlets that Moses of Khoren compiled his famous history as late as the eighth century, instead of in the fifth, as formerly supposed. He proves this much at least; that in the form in which we now have this history, it contains passages from an Armenian version of Sokrates, which was not made before A.D. 690.

(3) Studies in the Life of Alexander by the Pseudo-Kallisthenes. By Jacob Dashian.

(Vienna: at the Press of the Mechitarists, 1892. Fr. 3.) This is written in modern Armenian, and is an exhaustive study of the age and MSS. of the Old Armenian version of the pseudo-Kallisthenes. It also contains a collation of the Armenian with the Greek text, and traces the influence of the work in mediæval Armenian literature.

(4) The Works of Philo in the old Armenian Version. (Venice: 1892.) The parts of Philo preserved in Armenian alone were long ago published by Aucher. This new volume comprises certain treatises of this author which are preserved in Greek, and which it was therefore not so necessary to print. The treatises now published for the first time are the De Vita Contemplativa, Vita Abrahami, Legum Allegoria, de Sacerdotibus, de Decalogo, de Legibus Specialibus. The Armenian text goes back seven centuries at least behind the earliest of the Greek MSS., and will therefore be a prime authority for the text of these treatises.

(5) A Collection of Mediæval Armenian Songs and Ballads. In 2 vols. Collected and edited in Armenian by Karapet Kostaneantz. (Tiflis, 1892.) Song-books are numerous in any collection of Armenian MSS.; and in Balliol College library, out of four Armenian MSS. one is a volume of songs, some of which have great excellence. M. Kostaneantz has chiefly drawn on the stores of Ecmiazin and Venice, and many of the songs here collected go back at least as far as the sixteenth century. Most of the earlier ones are of a religious character.

(6) Armenian Chrestomathy. By N. Marr, Professor of Armenian in Petersburg. (St. Petersburg: 1893.) A book of well-chosen extracts, with an Armenian and Russian glossary.

(7) The History of Elisäus, with Armenian and Russian Glossary. By Ch. Johanniseanz. (Moscow: 1892.) These last two works are excellently done, and are meant to be used by Russian or Armenian boys learning the old language. They are well printed, and prove that the study of ancient Armenian is in no danger of being neglected in Russia.

(8) Precatio pro universa Ecclesia ex sacra liturgia S. J. Chrysostomi quinquaginta linguis exarata. (Vindobonæ. Typis congregationis Mechitaristarum: 1893.) Among the languages represented are Icelandic, Lapp, Lithuanian, Manx, Sanskrit, Chinese, Ancient and Modern Georgian, Irish, Welsh, and many more. Prof. J. Rhys, Standish H. O'Grady, A. W. Moore, D. Mackinnon, J. Morrison are the scholars who have contributed the versions in languages spoken within the United Kingdom. This is a sort of show-book, and is beautifully printed and got up, but of little use otherwise.

(9) Zur Abgar-Sage. Von P. J. Dashian. This is reprinted from the Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, and is written in German. It is a criticism of L. J. Tixeront's work, Les origines de l'église d'Édesse et la légende d'Abgar, so far as the views of the latter require modification in regard to features of the legend which relate to Armenian literature and history.

(10) A History of Jerusalem, in two volumes, by the Bishop Johanneseanz. (Printed at the Patriarchate of St. James in Jerusalem: 1890.) These two volumes contain a history of Jerusalem from the birth of Jesus until A.D. 1865, in over a thousand pages of small print. The first volume carries the history as far as 1716, and contains an interesting account of the monasteries which the Armenians possessed in Jerusalem as early as the fifth century, and on the site of which the Russian Government recently excavated Armenian tombstones dated as far back as A.D. 420. The second volume is a long record of the quarrels between the Greeks and Latins and Armenians over various sacred sites, quarrels which can only result in contempt on the part of Mohammedans for the Christian religion. The whole story is told from the standpoint of a bishop of the old or orthodox Armenian Church; and, as the author draws throughout from native Armenian records, his book contains much information which would be sought elsewhere in vain. Unfortunately it is written in Armenian, and is, therefore, inaccessible to most readers.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE HINDU NAKSHATRAS IN THE WEBER MS.
Edinburgh: July 29, 1893.

In the Journal of the Bengal Asiatic Society (part 1 for 1893), Dr. R. Hoernle gives an interesting analysis of a collection of old MS. fragments from Central Asia, obtained by the Rev. F. Weber, Moravian missionary at Leh.* Among them are nine leaves, numbered 7 to 15, which contain part of an astronomical treatise, apparently by a writer called Pushkarasarin. Dr. Hoernle extracts five pages of this, respecting the twenty-eight Nakshatras or Dhishn Tas. The list begins with Krittikā (instead of Asvini) which is generally accepted as the oldest arrangement; it assigns to Abhijit (the 20th) a duration of eight (or, in another place, seven) muhūrtas; six have a duration of forty-five muhūrtas each, five (Nos. 4, 7, 13, 16, and 23) of fifteen muhūrtas, and the rest of thirty each—differing from Garga, Brahmagupta, and the Nakshatra-kalpa chiefly in allotting to Bharanī a full day, or thirty instead of only fifteen muhūrtas. The Nakshatra-kalpa, as noticed by Prof. A. Weber (Vedische Nach. v.d. Navatra, ii., 391), seems to agree with Garga in joining Abhijit with Uttarā Ashādhā, with a united duration or arc of one and a half of the average. From this arrangement the ancient MS. distinctly differs, but is in accord with the arrangement in Brahmagupta's Uttarā-Khandakhādya (Sachau's Albiruni, ii., 87) allotting to Uttarāshādhā, one of the six longer spaces, and also assigning a separate duration for Abhijit. If we suppose the MS. duration of 30 muhūrtas for Bharanī to be a mistake for 15, then it coincides with Brahmagupta in assigning 810 muhūrtas, or exactly 27 civil days, to 27 Nakshatras. Brahmagupta—apparently with a propensity for theoretical accuracy in figures—reduces the time values to arcs, computed to the minutest fraction, and instead of the usual 13° 20' (which is the moon's motion in a Nakshatra dina of 12 hours 17 minutes 9.3 seconds) he gives 13° 10' 34" 52" as the arc for each of the 15 Nakshatras of the average duration of one civil day: this leaves for Abhijit an arc of 4° 14' 18" 15",—equivalent to a duration of 9½ muhūrtas, and makes a total for the sidereal or Nakshatra revolution of the moon of 819½ muhūrtas or 27.32167 civil days. The Weber MS. assigns to Abhijit 8 (or 7) muhūrtas, thus making the revolution consist of 818 (or 817) muhūrtas, that is 27.267 (or 27.233) days, which is a rough approximation such as we might expect before the application of Greek methods of computation.

The position and extent of Abhijit in early astronomical works is interesting, and may throw light on a debated question. It seems not improbable that the Nakshatras were early arranged as positions marked out by groups of stars, not very equally distributed, but easy of recognition, with reference to which the positions of the moon and planets could be most readily referred. It would also be quickly observed that the moon returned to the same position in rather less than 27½ days. This required no instrumental observation; and if the daily place of the moon was to be registered in any way by the stars, it could best be done by using a 28th Nakshatra of small extent, placed about the position where the excess of daily motion amounted to a considerable portion of this third part of a day, or about the twentieth in the cycle. When sexagesimal computation came to be depended on rather than simple observation, the lunar arcs were measured out without reference to the asterisms, in equal portions of 800' each, and still retained the names of the Nakshatras.

The Muhūrta-Mālā, allowing 800' of arc to each Nakshatra, as in the later Hindu works, says "the last quarter of Uttarā Ashādhā and the first fifteenth of Śravana together constitute Abhijit." This gives an arc of 4° 13' 20", and seems intended practically to preserve the old value given by Brahmagupta. Most late works take 100' from Śravana and extend Abhijit to 5': but this forgets its original purpose.

It would be interesting to know more about how this intercalary Nakshatra is treated, especially as to duration in time, in MSS. that have not been published. I learn from Prof. Bühler that Dr. S. von Oldenburg, of St. Petersburg, has got some twenty more leaves of what appears to be a portion of the same Central Asia MS., and their publication may throw some light on this or other points in early Hindu astronomy.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE July number of the Indian Antiquary (Kegan Paul & Co.) is almost entirely devoted to an elaborate paper by Dr. J. F. Fleet, in which he attempts to extract the geographical information that is to be found in the Brihat-Samhita of Varahamihira. This treatise, which is in the main astrological, has been edited and in great part translated by Dr. Kern. It contains one chapter intended to be geographical, entitled "the division of the globe," starting from the Madhyadesa, or middle country, which seems to be identical with Hindustan proper; but there are also a great many references to places, tribal names, &c., scattered throughout the work. All of these Dr. Fleet has taken the pains to collect, and arrange in an alphabetical list, adding notes on most of the names, and giving (in particular) the earliest mention of them in inscriptions. It seems that there is no topographical reference for Brahmans: but the Kshatriyas are placed in the north, the Vaisiyas in the west, and the Sudras in the south-west. There is a mention of Romaka, a people or place, translated "the Romans," by Prof. Kern; while the Yavanas or Greeks are placed in the south-west.

THE last number of the Babylonian and Oriental Review (David Nutt) contains two articles of interest. Mr. W. St. Chad Boscawen gives an account of Tel-el-Amarna, which he has recently visited. His special object is to show how the foreign names on the tombs confirm the evidence of the tablets, that many of the officials at the court of Khuenaten were, in all probability, Syrians, Amorites, and Babylonians, who formed part of the retinue of the foreign queens of Amenophis III. Prof. Terrien de Lacouperie discusses the question of the first mention of hemp in China. He assigns its introduction to the beginning of the seventeenth century B.C., when it was brought into the west of Northern China by the Tchou, who may have learnt both the name and the use of it from the Scythians of Central Asia.

MR. TAW SEIN KO, lecturer in Burmese at Cambridge, contributes to the Indian Magazine and Review (Constable) a very interesting article on place-names in Burma. As the subject is an obscure one, we venture to make some extracts. The people call themselves Bamā in the spoken language, and Mranmā—pronounced Myanmā—in the written language. Historical evidence seems to show that Bamā is a corruption of "Brahma," the Creator in the Hindu pantheon. The indigenous name for Arakan is Rakhaing, a corruption of the Sanskrit Rakshasa, a term loosely applied to the autochthonous races of India by their Aryan conquerors. Of Pegu, in the Talaing language Pago, there is no satisfactory explanation. Tenasserim is made up of two Malay words—tāna=an island, and siri=betel-leaf. Irawadi or Eravati=the river of cooling draught, is the classic name of one of the rivers of the Punjab, now known as the Ravi. The old name of Rangoon was Dagon, after the famous golden pagoda. But in 1757 it was changed by the great conqueror Alompra to Yangon, which is made up of yan or ran=enmity, and kōn=to be exhausted. Mandalay is derived from the Pali word mandala=a flat plain. Moulmein is the Anglicised form of the Burmese Mawlam-yaing, which again is the Talaing mut mwe leim=one eye destroyed. Prome is the Talaing Prohm=the city of Brahma. Henzada is probably Hinthā Tat=the fort of the Hansa goose. Bhamo is the Shan Manmaw=pottery village.

In addition to presenting his own paper at the late Congress of Literature in Chicago, the Rev. Dr. W. C. Winslow was deputed by the council to read the paper by Prof. A. H. Sayce on "Assyrian Tablet Libraries," and that on "Babylonian and Assyrian Archaeology" by Mr. H. Rassam. A paper by M. Naville arrived too late to be read.

WE quote the following from the New York Nation—

"Kilmāt Araby is the title of a pretty text-book published privately at Florence by Prof. Willard Fiske, and being in fact a list of 'Arabic words' arranged in the order of the alphabet, with an attached grammar. The words are from the vulgar Arabic, and the compiler follows the lead of Spitta Bey in seeking to make this language a literary one. With the aid of Mr. Socrates Spiro, who is himself diligently preparing a much more extensive vocabulary, Prof. Fiske has got together about 7,000 words taken down in Cairo or along the Nile, and has appended grammatical paradigms and illustrative sentences—these last intended to show that the spoken language is capable of being used to convey literary and scientific information. He has adopted Spitta Bey's simple and ingenious modification of the Latin alphabet, but discards the semi-vowels, now associated with the greatly corrupted classical Arabic employed by the Egyptian and Syrian press, in which Prof. Fiske sees the marks of caducity."

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN LITERARY SOCIETY. IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.—(Tuesday, August 1.)

E. A. CAZALET, Esq., president, in the chair.—The president informed the society that several new Russian books had been presented to increase the library. The most prominent of these had reference to trade and manufactures and the new Siberian railway. They were edited by the donor, M. de Kovalevsky, director of the Russian department of commerce and manufactures, and had been specially printed for the World's Fair at Chicago. There were also some useful books on the products of Transcaucasia.—Mr. E. Delmar Morgan then read a paper on "Industrial Art in Russia," giving an historical outline of its growth and development and the influence exercised on it by the Tartar conquest, which introduced Oriental embroidery in dress and the delicate tracery seen on the gold and silver plate adorning the banqueting halls of the early Tsars, and which produced such an effect on Chancellor and his companions in the palace at Moscow. With the consolidation of Moscow

* See an article, entitled "Another Collection of Ancient MSS. from Central Asia," in the ACADEMY of May 27.

under Ivan III., Vassili, and Ivan IV., Russian art takes a fresh start. It was in the reign of the first of these sovereigns that Italian architects were invited to Moscow to build the gates of the Kremlin. Germans were engaged to cast cannon, and in the reign of Ivan the Terrible the printing press was introduced. We find this monarch writing to Queen Elizabeth to send him apothecaries, surgeons, architects, and other useful men. But it was only after Peter the Great threw open the door to Western civilisation, and under the milder rule of the more modern sovereigns of the Romanov dynasty, that any real progress was made in art. The lecturer maintained that literature far outstripped painting and especially sculpture; and he even supposed that the latter art had remained so long in its infancy because the early Greek Church took the commandment, "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image," in too literal and narrow a sense. He dwelt with some detail on the talented productions of Vereshchagin, whose pictures, showing the horrors of war and the varied scenes of Oriental life, were the admiration of all the capitals of Europe. He also referred to Pissaretsky's sketches and panoramic pictures of the route from Peking to the Russian frontier, and of the country bordering the new Caspian railway. Other artists, who were mostly personal acquaintances of the lecturer, were likewise mentioned. A passing tribute was paid to Semiradsky, the historical painter who had acquired a European reputation. As regards sculptors, Antakolsky alone was mentioned. The lecturer concluded by explaining that his principal object in his paper was to show the advantages that might result from Russian art students availing themselves of the training in the national art schools at South Kensington. Hitherto Russians seeking instruction have invariably gone to France, Italy and Germany, and their works have been largely influenced by the arts of these countries. For technical or applied art the training school at South Kensington, under its present distinguished principal (Mr. Sparske) and its able staff of lecturers, might supply a want very much felt, and there is no reason why Russian students should not derive advantage from it.—Dr. Pollen moved a vote of thanks for the able paper, which proved that the author was himself an artist at heart. Mr. Beerbohm Tree had lately delivered a lecture in which he dwelt on the danger of our insular university education for art, because of the narrowing influence of cliques. The tendency to make the imagination didactic, to pay too much attention to so-called "good form" (boot polish), even leads men to become snobs. Russian genius does not err on the side of being narrow, and an extensive unploughed field lies before it. There is perhaps too great a tendency to imitate Western thought; but there is a grandiose ability not only for assimilating but also for creating, which requires to be brought out on an original path of culture. There is a glory and a gloom about the grand collection of imposing buildings which form the semi-European city of St. Petersburg. Moscow is Oriental, but unique of its kind. Russians will do well to come to London to study the practical and profitable application of industrial art, and while learning themselves they will also teach us.—Mr. Kinloch seconded the vote of thanks, and observed that all that Mr. E. Delmar Morgan had said was simple and true. The Russians had, indeed, been seriously handicapped by their enemies and frequent wars, but lately the improvement had been wonderfully rapid. Exhibitions of Russian pictures abroad did not do the nation full justice, because these exhibitions were not unfrequently made use of by Jewish traders, who sought rather to advertise their business than to show real works of art. Even peasants inhabiting distant villages show an innate aptitude for the minor branches of industrial art, by making, for instance, wooden bowls, cut out of trees, which they cover with a varnish impervious to hot water, and which they ornament with curious designs of their own invention. Lacquer-work, known under the name of Loukoutinski, is both original and artistic. There is a fund of latent talent which only needs development and encouragement. Mr. Kinloch expressed the hope that Russian artists would accept this paper as an invitation to come and cultivate their natural aptitudes in the South Kensington School of Art. Such technical training would lead to practical results.—In conclusion, the president read a most able and complimentary leading article on the Anglo-Russian Society in the Nedelia ("The Week"), written by Mr. Syromiatnikoff, who had delivered an eloquent speech at the last meeting of this society.—A vote of thanks was proposed by the president, and unanimously carried, to express the gratitude and approval of the society to the author of this article.—It was announced that on August 5, at 3 p.m., Mr. Nash would read a paper on "Russian Sport," which promised to be interesting, as the author was himself a sportsman and had resided many years in Russia.

FINE ART.

ENGRAVINGS AND DRAWINGS by OLD MASTERS.—Messrs. DEPREZ & GUTEKUNST have always on hand a selection of WORKS by the best Masters. Collections arranged, valued, and purchased. Prints and Drawings mounted and framed.—18, Green Street, Charing Cross Road, W.C.

The Legendary Lore of the Holy Wells of England, including Rivers, Lakes, Fountains, and Springs. By Robert Charles Hope. (Elliot Stock.)

So far as we can call to mind, the volume before us is the first work in our language devoted to Holy Wells. It is an attractive subject, and the wonder is that others have not been in the field long ere this. As a first attempt we have little but praise to give it, but the author must be aware that his collections are at present very imperfect.

It is not very easy to define what a holy well is. Woden's well near Berkeley Castle, Gloucestershire, and Thorskill (i.e. Thor's well) in Yorkshire, are evidently survivals of Teutonism. It is probable that many of the Saints' wells scattered about the land were regarded as holy, health-giving places, long ere Christianity became the religion of our forefathers. We know that Gregory the Great issued instructions to his missionaries that the heathen temples were not to be destroyed, but that they should be purified and adapted to Catholic worship. We may, therefore, pretty confidently assume that the wells which the heathen regarded as sacred would receive similar treatment. The Italian monks who accompanied Saint Augustine could not fail to have known of Christian holy wells in their own land, and nothing would be more natural than that they should dedicate the wells to which they found their people attached to the Saints of the Church's calendar.

Mr. Hope's catalogue is at present confessedly so imperfect that it is in no way safe to generalise from it; but, taking it as it stands, the list leads us to infer that the greater part of these dedications are of an early period. Many of the latter saints do not occur at all: Saint Bernard, Saint Francis, and, strangest of all, Saint George, are absent from the catalogue; while, on the other hand, there are five Saint Peters, six Saint Outhberts, and ten Saint Helens. Indeed, the mother of Constantine seems to possess more wells dedicated in her honour than any Saint in the calendar, with the sole exception of the Blessed Virgin, of whose wells Mr. Hope records twenty-nine. We believe that, if inquiries were made throughout England, many more Saint Helen's wells would be discovered. We know of two in Lincolnshire: one of them is near the town of Louth, the other is in the parish of Wrawby, and has for the last forty years supplied the greater part of the town of Brigg with water. Mr. Hope has only come upon one well dedicated to St. Michael, the archangel. It is at Arthuret in Cumberland. There is, or recently was, a St. Michael's well at Stow in Lincolnshire, the little village which gives its name to an archdeaconry, and is famed for its Saxon church.

It is impossible for any one single man, however zealous and enthusiastic, to make a work of this sort fairly complete without local help. We trust that this present edition, imperfect as it is, will induce local antiquaries to put the names of all old wells on record. Such lists should not be confined to holy wells alone. Many old wells have curious names, which seem in no way connected with religion; for example, there is Craikall Spring in the parish of Bottesford, Lincolnshire, and Brank Well in the adjoining hamlet of Yaddlethorpe. Both these names were known upwards of a century ago, and are probably of remote antiquity.

It may not be amiss to note here that the first volume of the Abingdon Chronicle (Rolls Series) contains the names of several wells, and that, scattered through the pages of Southey's "Commonplace Books," several bits of well folk-lore are to be found. If Mr. Hope extends his inquiries to the northern kingdom, he will find interesting material in Bishop Forbes's Kalendar of Scottish Saints.

Mr. Hope's gleanings contain here and there facts which have a wider use than he may have intended. Under Saint Anne's well at Buxton, he gives a letter from William Bassett, knight to his master, Thomas Cromwell, Henry VIII.'s Vicar-General, in which he tells him that the image of Saint Anne has been carried away to his own house, and that he has removed the "crutches, shirts, and shifts . . . being things that allure and entice the ignorant to the said offering." Not content with this, he goes on to tell Cromwell that he has "locked and sealed the baths and wells at Buxton, that none shall enter to wash there till your lordship's pleasure be further known." It will be conceded that the superstition of the Reformer was, in this case, at least equal to that of the sick folk who had left their crutches behind them as memorials of their recovery.

EDWARD PEACOCK.

THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

THE trustees of the National Portrait Gallery have just issued their thirty-sixth annual report, from which it appears that forty portraits have been acquired by gift and bequest during the past year, and four by purchase.

The former include an interesting series of twenty-two portraits of persons connected with Sir John Franklin's Arctic exploration, which were painted for Lady Franklin and by her bequeathed to the National Portrait Gallery, subject to the life interest of her niece, Miss Cracroft, who died in 1892. The series comprises portraits of Sir John Franklin by Thomas Phillips, of Lady Franklin by Miss Romilly, and of General Sir Edward Sabine, Sir John Richardson, Admiral Sir Edward Parry, Admiral Baillie Hamilton, Admiral Sir James C. Ross, and Admiral Sir F. Beaufort, by S. Pearce. Among the other works acquired is a copy, by J. Lockhart Bogle, of the last portrait of the Earl of Beaconsfield painted by Sir John E. Millais, presented by the committee of the National Memorial to Lord Beaconsfield. The Earl of Carlisle has presented Hogarth's celebrated picture of a Committee of the House of Commons inquiring into the cruelties inflicted by Thomas Bambridge, Warden of the Fleet, the sketch of which was in the Strawberry Hill collection, and a portrait of the second Lord Melbourne, by Partridge; from Lord Ronald Gower comes a portrait of Reynolds by himself, and one of Gainsborough, also from his own brush; the late Mr. Graves, the art dealer, has bequeathed Beechey's portrait of Alderman Boydell, and a likeness of John Burnet, the engraver and writer on art, by J. Simpson; while Sir Richard Owen's portrait, by Pickersgill, is presented by his daughter, and that of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, by A. D. Cooper, by the Hon. Walter James.

The purchases include portraits of the first Earl of St. Vincent; of Sir William Boxall, R.A., by M. A. Pittatore; of Richard Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury; and of General the Hon. Sir Galbraith Lowry Cole, by Dyce.

The report mentions that a new arrangement has been entered into with the Treasury regarding the annual grant to the trustees. Hitherto any balance of the sum voted by Parliament that was unspent during the current year has been refunded to the Exchequer, instead of remaining available for the ensuing year. In future, such balances are to be refunded as formerly; but credit is to be given to the trustees for the amount, and if necessity should subsequently arise for spending more than the ordinary annual grant, application may be made to Parliament for a supplementary grant not exceeding the accumulated amount of such credit, subject, for the present, to a maximum of £2000 for any single year. The report also contains the welcome intelligence that the new buildings are well advanced, and that it is hoped that some portion of them will be in working order by next spring.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

A DISCOVERY of the first importance has just been made in the course of the excavations that are being carried on at Silchester by Mr. W. H. St. John Hope and Mr. Fox on behalf of the Society of Antiquaries. This is nothing less than a stone bearing two lines of Ogam inscription, which Prof. Rhys provisionally interprets to read: "[The Grave] of Evocatus, Son of Muco Xi." The significance of the discovery arises from the fact that this is not only the oldest Ogam in existence (being dated by the destruction of Calleva of the Atrebatas), but also the only one that has been found in England so far to the East. We hope to publish next week a letter from Prof. Rhys, giving a reproduction of the inscription, with comments upon it.

MR. JOHN MURRAY has in the press a second volume of the late Giovanni Morelli's Critical Studies of the Works of Italian Painters, dealing with the Galleries of Munich and Dresden. Like the former volume on the Borghese and Doria-Pamfili Galleries, it has been translated by Constance Jocelyn Ffoulkes, and will have illustrations.

THE opening of the British Museum in the evening, from 8 to 10 p.m., will be resumed on Monday next, August 14. The Eastern and Western Galleries will be opened on alternate days, and illuminated by the electric light.

THE new part of Archaeologia Aeliana contains an article by Mr. F. Haverfield upon a new Roman inscription from South Shields, which is illustrated with an excellent photograph. The inscription records that a water supply was provided for the Fifth Cohort of Gauls, in the first year of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222), and while Marius Valerianus was propraetor in the North of Britain. The emperor is described by his full titulature, but (as is frequently the case) the name Alexander has been erased. The cohort in question has been found before at South Shields, and also at Cramond, near Edinburgh. Mr. Haverfield appends a list of all British inscriptions dated in the reign of Severus Alexander, and also of those commemorating the erection or repair of buildings in Roman fortresses, such as head-quarters, offices, aqueducts, armouries, baths, drill-halls, store-houses. Most of these belong to the first half of the third century; and Mr. Haverfield attributes their frequency, not to the campaigns of Septimius Severus, but to the changes in the army introduced by that emperor and his successors, which tended to make the troops more territorial and the administration more efficient. To the same part, Mr. Wilfred J. Cripps contributes an illustrated paper on old church plate in the counties of Northumberland and Durham. There are two patens, but not a single chalice, of pre-reformation type.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

FROM Messrs. Augener & Co.:

Joh. Seb. Bach. Sixth Sonata in G for Two Claviers and Pedal. Edited by W. T. Best. In this work the master shows his usual thorough mastery of contrapuntal devices.

At the head of violin music must be named the volume of Arcangelo Corelli's Twelve Sonatas (Op. 5). The pure style of the Italian master, the pathos of his slow movements, and the vigour of those in quick tempo, will always render these Sonatas attractive, whether to player or listener; while, as a contrast to the complex music of our day, they serve a useful purpose. A pianoforte accompaniment has been skilfully worked out from the composer's figured bass by Gustav Jensen. To alter any of the notes in the violin part would be dangerous; yet Corelli's "own embellishments" to some of these Sonatas in an old edition show that the notes as printed do not fully reveal the composer's intention. Jensen's Classische Violin Musik (third series) contains two Sonatas by Handel, and two by Leclair, also provided with an effective pianoforte accompaniment. The Handel Sonata in A has been much played, and the appearance of others of the set will be welcome to violinists. Ritter's Practical School for the Violin, and L. Hegyesi's Rhythmical Scale and Chord Studies, are sound educational works.

From Messrs. Forsyth:

Schneeflocken, six pianoforte pieces (Op. 8), and Zwölf kleine Tonstücke (Op. 12), by Nicolai von Wilm, are short, excellent pieces for teaching; they are light, but not trivial. Op. 8 is for more advanced players than Op. 12, though still, however, only of moderate difficulty. Hiller's Youthful Reminiscences, is a collection of five pianoforte pieces, in the composer's best style. The music is said to be "edited and carefully fingered by Charles Hallé." Was the adverb necessary? Evelyn, Impromptu Gavotte for the pianoforte, by S. Szarvady, is a clever and showy little piece.

A Short Treatise on Time is a small but useful manual. The idea of illustrating dry time tables from the works of various composers is excellent. The mistake of Schumann for Chopin on page 8 should be corrected in a future edition.

LITERATURE.

THREE BOOKS ON SWIFT.

Jonathan Swift. A Biographical and Critical Study. By John Churton Collins. (Chatto & Windus.)

Selections from Swift. With Life, Introductions, and Notes by Henry Craik. In 2 vols. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

Dean Swift and his Writings. By Gerald P. Moriarty. (Seeley.)

If anything were wanted to prove the interest which still centres in the life and genius of Swift, these four volumes would supply the need. As it is, they form but a small portion of the literature which in recent years has been devoted to the illustration of his writings or the history of his life.

Mr. Churton Collins's book will be welcomed by all who remember the two brilliant articles on Swift which he contributed to the Quarterly Review ten years ago. They are now republished as a biographical and critical study, and form a very fascinating volume. Mr. Collins has slightly revised his former work, and has added in conclusion a new chapter on Swift's "Characteristics." The addition, however, increases but little the value of what he has already written, being somewhat inferior to the rest of his work. It consists for the most part of a critical review of his whole subject, and Mr. Collins's criticisms are perhaps a shade too positive. He tells us, for example, that Swift was "utterly devoid of a sense of 'the beautiful in Nature.'" It is impossible to subscribe without demur to so sweeping a sentence. Numberless passages in the Journal to Stella alone disprove its accuracy: the constant references to "the willows and quicksets," and the "cherry trees on the river walk" at Laracor; to "the lime trees in the park all out in leaves, though not large leaves yet"; and to the haymaking at Chelsea, which "smells so sweet as we walk through the flowery meads." Again, when discussing the character of Swift's religious convictions, Mr. Collins conveys a wholly unfair impression by saying that "the evidence for supposing that the existence of a future state formed any article of his personal belief is very slight." The evidence for supposing that it did not form part of his personal belief is equally slight. Nothing is more notorious than Swift's intense aversion to anything like religious ostentation. It was one of his most marked characteristics. It drove him to the opposite extreme of excessive reserve, and caused Bolingbroke to describe him as "a hypocrite reversed." The few scattered hints which throw any light on this point lead us to no definite conclusion: they certainly do not lead to the conclusion at which Mr. Collins has arrived, that "the balance of probability is decidedly adverse" to supposing "that Swift's own opinions inclined certainly towards belief in the promises of Christianity." Few, however, will dispute the justice of the following estimate of Swift's unique position, which occurs in the same chapter, and deserves to be quoted in full:

"Swift is the one figure of colossal proportions in the age to which he belonged. . . . Among men whose fame depends mainly on their writings, there is, if we except Aristotle, Shakspeare, and perhaps Bacon, probably no man on record who impresses us with a sense of such enormous intellectual power. He has always the air of a giant sporting among pigmies, crushing or scrutinising, helping or thwarting them, as the mood takes him. Immense strength, immense energy, now frittering themselves away on trifles, now roused for a moment to concentrated action by passion, interest, or benevolence, but never assuming their true proportions, never developing into full activity—this is what we discern in Swift. We feel how miserably incommensurate was the part he played with the part which Nature had fitted him to play: how contracted was the stage, how mighty the capacities of the actor. In his pamphlets, in his two great satires, in his poems, in his correspondence, is the impression of a character there is no mistaking. And it is not among philosophers, poets, and men of letters that we are to look for its prototype or its analogy, but among those who have made and unmade nations—among men like Caesar and men like Napoleon."

By far the greatest part of Mr. Collins's book is devoted to biography pure and simple. He contributes scarcely any addition to what we already knew of Swift's career, and in one or two particulars—notably when he attempts to define Swift's relationship to Dryden—he falls into serious error; but over all the old details and familiar surroundings of Swift's life he throws a heightened charm by the picturesqueness of his narrative, and the freshness of his views. It was his industry which first unearthed the original from which Swift borrowed the framework of the Tale of a Tub; and his book abounds with comparisons and parallels, gathered from a wide range of literature—comparisons which are generally apposite and never uninteresting. The style of Macaulay encourages the use of contrast; and, when adopted by less practised hands, it easily leads on from contrast to exaggeration. But Mr. Collins employs it with uncommon skill; and his contrasts, though often striking, are seldom overdrawn. His picture is full of light and shade, and he is particularly successful in painting with a few rapid touches a brilliant sketch of contemporary history or contemporary life. He devotes two or three pages to an admirable account of the Scriblerus Club and the Society of Brothers; and the following description of Ireland during the period of Swift's life at St. Patrick's is by no means too strong:

"In the South, in the East, and in the West, stretched vast tracts of land untilled and unpeopled, mere waste and solitude. Even where nature had been most bounteous, the traveller might wander for miles without finding a single habitation, without meeting a single human being, without beholding a single trace of human culture. Many of the churches were roofless, the walls still gaping with the breaches which the cannon of Cromwell had made in them. Almost all the old seats of the nobility were in ruins. In the villages and country towns every object on which the eye rested told the same lamentable story. Much of this misery was undoubtedly to be attributed to the inhabitants themselves. For the aborigines Swift could scarcely find terms sufficiently strong to express his contempt. He always, indeed, denied their title to the denomination of Irishmen, and nothing enraged him more than the persistency with which the English Government confounded, under the common name of Irish, the natives and the Englishry. . . . But there was little to choose between them. It was distinction without difference. If the Celt had been exterminated, Celtic infiltration had done its work. Never had co-operation and concord been more necessary; but never had civil and religious dissension raged with greater fury than it was raging now. Feuds in religion, feuds in politics, feuds which had their origin in private differences, and feuds which had descended as a cursed heirloom from father to child, rankled in their hearts and inflamed their blood. There was the old enmity between the aborigines and the English; there was a deadly feud between the Catholics and the Protestants; there was a feud not less deadly between the Episcopalians and the Nonconformists; while the war between Whig and Tory was prosecuted with a ferocity and malignity scarcely human."

One other passage from Mr. Collins's work deserves especial mention—that in which he describes the appearance of Gulliver's Travels. He emphasises the fact that

"though the work appealed to all, it appealed in different ways. By the multitude it was read, as it is read in the nurseries and play-rooms of our more enlightened age, with wondering credulity. But the avidity with which it was devoured by readers to whom the allegory was nothing and the story everything was equalled by the avidity with which it was devoured by readers to whom the allegory was supreme and the story purely subordinate. At Court and in political circles it was read and quoted as no satire since Hudibras had been . . . The circumstances which led to the flight of Gulliver from Lilliput, and the account given of the natives of Tribnia, must have come home with peculiar force and pungency to readers who could remember the proceedings which led to the imprisonment of Harley and the flight of Bolingbroke and Ormond, and in whose memories the trial of Atterbury was still fresh. To us the schemes propounded in the Academy of Lagado have no more point than the schemes which occupied the courtiers of Queen Entelechy; but how pregnant, how pertinent, how exquisite must the satire have appeared to readers who were still smarting from the Bubble-Mania, who had been shareholders in the Society for Transmuting Quick-silver into Malleable Metal, or in the Society for Extracting Silver from Lead!"

Fortunately, all the wealth of illustration which Mr. Collins lavishes with such ostentatious profusion is throughout subordinated to the central figure; otherwise, it would be rather overpowering. Scarcely any character has ever presented a greater fascination, or been the subject of more analysis, than Swift's; and it says much for Mr. Collins's skill that he has contrived to invest it with still freshened interest, without indulging in an excess of eulogy. He does not soften down any of those incidents in Swift's career which have been most severely censured, nor does he seek in any way to extenuate the charges which have been most frequently made against him. In most cases he adopts the simpler expedient of rejecting the evidence on which they rest. When, for example, he comes to deal with Swift's treatment of Hester Vanhomrigh, he describes the whole episode in abundant detail; but, in conclusion, he points out that those who have judged Swift harshly have "proceeded on the assumption" that "he was the husband of Esther Johnson." Having thus ingeniously made the culpability of Swift's conduct to Vanessa depend upon the nature of his subsequent relations with Stella, all that remains for him to do is to recapitulate the evidence which proves that no marriage between Esther Johnson and Swift was ever solemnised. So, too, with the well-worn story of Swift's ride to Celbridge, and his last angry interview with Hester Vanhomrigh. Mr. Collins describes this story as "one of the gravest of the charges which have been brought against Swift with respect to Vanessa"; but he promptly proceeds to discredit the authority on which it comes to us, declaring that Sheridan (who is mainly, though not entirely, responsible for it) "is confessedly among the most inaccurate and uncritical of Swift's biographers." This somewhat evasive method is the more unjustifiable in this case, because in an earlier portion of his work Mr. Collins introduces, with no apparent misgiving and with considerable dramatic effect, an incident in Swift's career which we owe to Sheridan, and to Sheridan alone—indeed, in his very first chapter he assures us that Sheridan's name "stands high, and . . . deservedly high, among Swift's biographers."

Yet, if sympathy with his subject leads Mr. Collins into occasional inconsistency, it never substantially affects the general fairness of his work. If a fault at all, it is a fault on the right side: without detracting to any great extent from the accuracy of his narrative, it considerably enhances its interest. He holds, he says, no brief for Swift. He states his case strongly; but, if we make one or two exceptions, it cannot be said that he overstates it. He has "endeavoured to do Swift justice where justice has been either withheld or too grudgingly allowed"; and his endeavour has been rewarded by a large measure of success.

Mr. Craik has had an exceedingly difficult task to perform. The editor of every "selection" has sooner or later to decide between showing the author only when he is at his best, and showing him in each stage of his development and every department of his work. But in the case of Swift this difficulty of choice is immensely increased by the vast range of his literary activity and the abundance of the material he has left to us; and in attempting to compress into two volumes a fully-annotated edition of all that is best or most representative in his writings, Mr. Craik can scarcely have expected that his selection, when made, would satisfy every taste.

Probably, no two people who are at one in their admiration of Swift would, in selecting a given number of his works, agree in selecting the same. Mr. Craik, however, might well have dispensed with the Earlier Poems and the Discourse on the Dissensions in Athens and Rome—with everything, in fact, previous to the Tale of a Tub and The Battle of the Books. The Earlier Poems show us nothing except that Swift had not yet discovered the true sphere of his genius. They were written while he was still at Moor Park, repairing in Temple's society and among Temple's books an education which had been sadly neglected, and gaining in his long pedestrian excursions much of that keen insight into human character and that intimate familiarity with the details of low life which are so apparent in his more famous works. But of those peculiar powers which we most naturally associate with the name of Swift, these early poems contain no sign whatever. They are written in a form which Mr. Craik himself describes as "obscure in thought" and "involved in expression," a form to which in later life Swift never returned; and we grudge the space which they occupy in these volumes all the more when we find that among the later poems no place is found for Cadenus and Vanessa, or for such eminently representative pieces as the Petition of Mrs. Harris, the Meditation on a Broomstick, and the City Shower. The Dissensions is, no doubt, "interesting as the first of Swift's political tracts"; but Mr. Craik most truly says that "it wants, in all but one or two isolated passages, the force and humour" of "almost every other controversial writing that Swift has left"; and its inclusion is the more astonishing in a Selection which contains no specimen whatever of The Barrier Treaty, the Advice to the October Club, the Conduct of the Allies, or the Public Spirit of the Whigs.

But whatever may be thought of the choice Mr. Craik has made, there cannot be two opinions as to the way in which he has edited the selections themselves. The editing is admirably done, in a manner worthy of the author of the standard Life of Swift; and as we re-read these works under his guidance, our only regret is that he has had to labour within so narrow a compass, and to confine his editing to so comparatively small a part of all Swift's works. He has been compelled to abridge most woefully the Journal to Stella. As we read the Journal in extenso, we feel as we near its close that we are witnessing the climax of a great political drama, and our acquaintance with all the characters grows more intimate, and our interest in all their movements more intense. But as we near the close in Mr. Craik's edition, his excisions become so ruthless that the thread is broken and we cannot appreciate the fragments which are left. Even Mr. Craik himself seems momentarily to have lost his way; for in a note to the Journal of October 28, 1712, he says that Swift was then at work on The Conduct of the Allies. As a matter of fact, The Conduct of the Allies had been published in the previous November; and the work on which Swift was then engaged—as Mr.

Craik has demonstrated in another place—was the History of the Four Last Years. These wholesale excisions from the Journal, moreover, do not always attain their object by economising space. Over and over again Mr. Craik has to interpolate an explanatory note when, in a passage which he retains, reference is made to a previous passage which he has omitted; and in such cases it would have been much better to leave the original passage untouched as it stands in Swift's own narrative, and thus to avoid the necessity of a note. But, with the exception of such cases, there is not an unnecessary annotation in Mr. Craik's book. The short paragraphs in which he explains a reference or summarises a character or a career are as complete as they are concise; and the notes, which in the first volume he devotes to the Mohocks, to the Court of Requests, to a parliamentary "Tack," and those which in the second he devotes to the "bole" in Ombre or to the geography of Gulliver's Travels, are models of what such notes should be. The Life, which forms a preface to the whole work, is an excellent specimen of condensed biography; and no less admirable are the introductions which precede each individual selection. In scope and design Mr. Craik's volumes range with another "Selection" which years ago issued from the Clarendon Press, and which has since become a classical edition—Mr. Payne's Select Works of Burke; and it is not too much to say that what Mr. Payne did for Burke Mr. Craik has now done for Swift.

Mr. Moriarty's book is of a different design, and is intended for a different class of readers—for those who have no time or no taste for studying in any close detail a great historical character or subject. For such—like many more of Messrs. Seeley's publications—it is admirably adapted. Considering its compass, it is wonderfully complete; and the copious extracts from Swift's own writings with which it abounds are just those most likely to leave with the general reader an accurate general idea of his life and works. Mr. Moriarty summarises the Tale of a Tub and The Battle of the Books as successfully as in faint outline it is possible to summarise them; and he states very fairly the aim and effect of those three half-political, half-religious pamphlets, published in 1708, which—as Mr. Leslie Stephen well observes—"may be taken as the manifesto of Swift's faith at the time when his principles were being most severely tested." Mr. Moriarty also gives some excellent specimens of Swift's work in The Examiner; and in his chapters on Swift's "Political Activity" and "Life in the Great World from 1710 to 1713" he draws very largely on the political tracts and the Journal to Stella. In his account of the Drapier's Letters and of Gulliver's Travels he is less successful, and his treatment of "Swift as a Poet" is altogether inadequate. Frequent and judicious quotations from Swift's correspondence enable him to tell his story to a large extent in Swift's own words; and throughout, it is in the liberal and careful manner in which his extracts are chosen, rather than in the narrative by which he threads them together, that the excellence of his work consists. Yet Mr. Moriarty's narrative is trustworthy, though occasionally it is so vaguely worded as to convey an impression of carelessness. In referring, for example, to Swift's expectations with regard to the bishopric of Cork in 1709 (when its holder, Dr. South, was dangerously ill), Mr. Moriarty states that Lord Halifax wrote to Swift to say that if Dr. South died Swift would be provided for; and he adds: "But when Dr. South died another was again preferred in Swift's place, and the episcopal mitre was as far off as ever." This sentence, if it means anything at all, means that very shortly afterwards Dr. South died, and that then Swift's friends ignored his claims to the vacant see. But, to be precise, Dr. South did not die until 1716, when Swift had already been installed for three years as Dean of St. Patrick's, and when all power of patronage or promotion had long since passed into the hands of his political foes.

The attractiveness of Mr. Moriarty's volume is enhanced by the excellent type in which it is printed, and by the series of portraits which are dispersed through its pages. Of these the most interesting, because the least familiar, are those of Stella and Vanessa; the most successful are those of Temple, Addison, and Prior. The reproduction of Jervas's celebrated picture of Swift, which serves as a frontispiece to the book, gives but a faint conception of the force and character of the original in the Bodleian.

WILLIAM E. GREY.

Founders of Old Testament Criticism. By T. K. Cheyne. (Methuen.)

NEXT to the established results of biblical criticism, there is no more interesting study than the history of the process by which these results were gradually achieved. If there are any still among us who fancy that the modern theories of the Hexateuch and Isaiah—to take only the most typical examples of analysis and reconstruction—are subjective, arbitrary, and evanescent, nothing could be better calculated to undeceive them than such a study. The history of geology and palaeontology does not show a steadier growth of scientific opinion always moving in the same general direction, nor a closer agreement of scientific authorities in the conclusions ultimately reached. And just as in the physical sciences there is no more striking testimony to the truth of new doctrines than their acceptance by teachers who have grown gray in the advocacy of opposite views, so also in Old Testament criticism, the conversion of such a theologian as Franz Delitzsch to theories that he had long resisted cannot lightly be passed over by those who feel incompetent to examine the convincing evidence for themselves. It is, then, to be regretted that Prof. Cheyne, having all the materials ready to hand for the composition of such a history, should have given us no more than the present collection of brief and, in part, rather unsatisfactory sketches. Not all the founders of Old Testament criticism are dealt with in his pages; and a considerable space is allotted to some who were not founders at all, but who, at best, built on the labours of others, or even attempted, unsuccessfully, to overthrow the edifice raised by their predecessors. No account is given of Richard Simon and Astruc, on the ground that they have already been dealt with by Prof. Curtiss; and if Graf is passed over with the barest possible mention, this, and all similar omissions, seem to be covered by a general reference to M. Westphal's first volume. But the generality of readers resent being bandied about from one author to another in this unceremonious manner; nor have all those who possess the requisite patience the run of such a good library as Prof. Cheyne assumes to be at their command.

It is, however, perhaps more to the personality of his subjects than to their work that the author would draw our attention. Of all Biblical critics, Ewald seems to have exhibited the most strongly-marked character and the greatest genius; to Ewald accordingly are allotted more than fifty pages, or not much less than a third of the whole space given to Continental critics. Prof. Cheyne's rather apologetic chapters will hardly efface the impression that this great writer—a sort of theological Ruskin—was intolerably arrogant and rude even for a German professor, that his mode of reaching conclusions had little to do with rational methods, and that the bulk of his writings is out of all proportion to the amount of new truth that they contain. But Ewald was profoundly religious, and Prof. Cheyne writes throughout in a religious interest. The words "reverent" and "devout" continually meet us in his pages; even the needs of "essential orthodoxy" are once recognised as limiting conditions of historical speculation (p. 286); and, in fact, the whole volume is marked by an unction that might enable the author to make his peace with his clerical opponents if only his and their notions of "essential orthodoxy" were the same.

For Prof. Cheyne's reverential attitude towards the spirit, one may even say towards the letter, of the Biblical narrative carries with it not the slightest concession to its historical authority where that has been impeached, as he thinks successfully, by a criticism which reverences nothing but scientific truth. Half the volume is occupied with a survey of English contributions to Old Testament criticism, and incidentally with a defence of the author's own more advanced views against avowed enemies or half-hearted friends. In these chapters he shows himself at his best, and these will be read with the greatest interest. The annotative and allusive character of his style is less perplexing where the facts are of a more familiar order; though even here far too much is left for the reader to supply. For instance, it is exceedingly tantalising to be told that

"from a 'higher critic's' point of view Prof. Davidson sacrifices too much to the Philistines in that humorous and somewhat cavalier declaration which Elmslie quotes on p. 42 of his sketch. There is not a little of the Philistine in every untutored student even at New College, and those teachers who are more sensitive than Prof. Davidson to the less conspicuous data of criticism may be pardoned for regretting a gibe which in almost any other person they would meet with as dry and cavalier a retort" (p. 227).

Those who are more sensitive to the graces of style than Prof. Cheyne may be pardoned for regretting that the actual gibe and the suppressed retort were not either given in full or buried in a profounder silence. On the other hand, Prof. Sayce is handled with a plainness of speech that leaves nothing to be desired. He is denounced as "a populariser of questionable theories and unfair accusations" (p. 236); his readers are cautioned to be "on their guard for the sake of historical truth" (p. 237); and his "fresh light from the ancient monuments" is reduced to a very feeble and uncertain glimmer. Prof. Driver, to whose Introduction a third of the present volume is devoted, naturally receives far more respectful treatment; but his compromises with conservative teaching are, one after another, made to appear as so many pusillanimous surrenders of scientific principle. I do not know how far the sting will be taken out of these reproaches by the reviewer's very candid admission that in criticising Prof. Driver he is criticising himself. He admits having at one time given "the traditional view in its most refined form the benefit of the doubt wherever there was a sufficiently reasonable case for doubt" (p. 259). But he holds that the time for such concessions is past; and he seems to think that the enormous success of Prof. Driver is proving a hindrance rather than a help to real progress.

The delicate question of inspiration is one the decision of which cannot fail largely to affect the general attitude of theologians in these controversies; and here Prof. Cheyne's view seems to differ intrinsically from that of his friend. According to Prof. Driver the Elihu-speeches, although by a different and later poet, are just as much inspired as the rest of Job. Our author on the other hand holds that though "of course inspired" they are not inspired in the same degree as the rest of the book, nor "must we force ourselves to reverence these two poets in an equal degree" (pp. 348-9). The Chronicles are also "of course inspired," but only "as even a sermon might be called inspired, i.e., touched in a high degree with the best spiritual influences of the time." The Chronicler is only guided by inspiration "with those limitations subject to which the same thing could be said of any conscientious and humble-minded preacher of the Christian Church" (p. 362). We knew on the authority of Keble that all sermons were good, but we did not know before how many of them were inspired. At any rate it is to be hoped that few preachers would now deliberately falsify history to the same extent as the Chronicler. There are however three books which Prof. Cheyne cannot bring himself to place even on the level of a tolerable sermon. The Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, and Esther are not inspired at all; at any rate they "are not for us Christians in the truest sense of the word canonical" (p. 349). Nevertheless all three deserve "reverent study." I confess I do not understand the constitution of a mind that can study with any feeling but one of utter disgust such a glorification of cold-blooded and sanguinary vindictiveness as the Book of Esther. The whole of this searching and, as it seems to me, well-founded criticism on Prof. Driver's book will leave many readers under the impression that the critic lays himself open to somewhat similar charges from theologians occupying a slightly more advanced position.

The spirit of free inquiry once thoroughly awakened must inevitably extend itself from the Old Testament to the New. It is refreshing to find that Prof. Cheyne faces the prospect with perfect fearlessness. He does not agree with a writer (apparently Prof. Sanday) who looks on the state of New Testament study in England as "almost wholly hopeful." It appears to him to be, "however fruitful up to a certain extent, singularly one-sided" (p. 330). And he even goes out of his way to declare that "if it should be made decidedly the more probable view that St. John did not originate the Fourth Gospel as it now stands, I am sure, in spite of Dr. Sanday's recent words, that all truly religious students would believe, with heart and with head, as strongly as ever in the incomparable nature and the divine mediatorship of Jesus Christ. They would do so on the ground of the facts that would still be left by the historical analysis of the Gospels, and on the correspondence between a simple Christian view of those facts, and the needs of their own and of the church's life" (p. 258).

In conclusion I venture to suggest that the usefulness of this little volume, replete as it is with thought and learning, would be much enhanced by the addition of a good index.

ALFRED W. BENN.

Round the Black Man's Garden. By Zélie Colville. (Blackwoods.)

FASCINATING seems to be the epithet most applicable to this delightful account of a trip taken in the winter of 1888, for the benefit of his health, by Mr. H. E. Colville, Commissioner of the Kachin Hills, Upper Burmah. He was accompanied by his wife, who, despite her French nationality, describes their experiences in singularly correct and even idiomatic English, illustrates the text with numerous clever sketches, and personally displays an extraordinary degree of pluck and endurance throughout a succession of trying, if not thrilling, adventures, related with characteristic good taste and many touches of sly humour. When it is explained that "The Black Man's Garden" is the dark continent, the title becomes sufficiently intelligible even without the amusing discussion of the point in a sparkling preface supplied by Mr. Colville.

The circuit of the continent was made from east to west, starting from Alexandria and terminating at Lisbon, the only overland sections being through Lower Egypt to Suez, across Madagascar from Tamatave through Antananarivo to Majanga (this decidedly the most interesting part of the route), and from Durban round by Transvaal to Cape Town. So far nearly all important points were touched at both in the Red Sea and down the east coast, and opportunity was thus afforded of taking pen and pencil sketches of such places as Tor, Jiddah, Suakin, Massowah, Aden, Mombasa, Zanzibar, Mozambique, Quilimane, and Lorenzo Marquez. But at Cape Town no conveyance was available by which the western seaboard could be visited. Hence the party had here to ship straight for the Canaries, where means were found to retrace their steps by the west coast as far as the Gaboon and back nearly by the same route round by Senegambia to Europe. In this section also short visits were paid to most of the large seaports and trading stations, such as Dakar, Freetown (Sierra Leone), Monrovia, Grand Bassam, Accra, Bonny, and Libreville.

Except the Mediterranean and the west coast between the equator and the Cape, the whole of the African seaboard has thus been passed in rapid survey; and, notwithstanding the great variety of subjects, the work is singularly free from serious inaccuracies of any kind. The Hadendoah Hamites of the Suakin district are, of course, called "Arabs," and Tor is, apparently by a slip of the pen, placed at the "northern" instead of the southern extremity of the Sinai peninsula. But ample compensation for this almost solitary geographical oversight is made by the vivid sketch of the lonely station, "consisting of three palm-trees and what looked like a few mud walls dropped on the seaward edge of a burning plain of yellow sand, bounded at a distance of some ten or fifteen miles by the range of Sinai, a mass of sharp-cut peaks and rocky gorges, now in the forenoon mostly in a deep purple shade, relieved by a still darker shadow in the clefts, with here and there a glow on some pinnacle that had caught the sun. Except for those lonely palms, on shore there was no sign of life—all looked so dead and burnt that one could hardly even imagine there could be sound."

Those familiar with the weird-like scenery of these coastlands will recognise the truthfulness of this picture of rugged purple heights, sombre clefts, peaks aglow in the blazing sunshine, the whole pervaded by a sense of utter desolation and deathlike stillness. So it is everywhere throughout this charming volume, in which are, so to say, focussed a series of bright panoramic views unfolding the varied aspects of man and nature round the continental periphery. When Suakin was reached, the Mahdists were still, for the twentieth time, trying to storm the trenches, while some of the English officers, presumably off duty, were playing tennis near a fort just within the walls, presenting

"a curious mixture of homely everyday life and the excitement of war. On the one side of the wall, the two men, wholly absorbed in their game; on the other, the fanatics only waiting for a favourable opportunity to rush and cut all our throats; in the middle, the Egyptian soldiers in the fort, rather bored with their day on guard, and, purely as a matter of business, potting the Arabs as occasion offered."

At Antananarivo some state ceremonials were to the fore, including the Queen's bath in public, more antiquo, a grand banquet of extremely high meat and rice handed round with banana-leaf scoops, speeches, salvos of artillery, and the collection of offerings from vassal chiefs "shovelled on to the Queen's lap in a most undignified manner. So ended this strange jumble of pantomime, church, pic-nic, drawing-room at Buckingham Palace, pomp and utter want of dignity, with a considerable addition of good honest savagedom." It is added that "they have many other curious customs, and their morals, as far as I have heard and read, closely resemble those of the South Sea Islanders. We were informed on good authority that the reason the Methodists formerly became a great power in the country was that the Prime Minister, wishing to get rid of his too powerful brother, turned Christian, and married his queen under Christian rites, so as to have the excuse of exiling his brother as a heathen. Later on, finding that the Methodists were getting too strong for him, he established the Church of England as a counterpoise."

Almost every page of the book presents some piquant passage of this sort, so that a review inevitably resolves itself into a series of quotations. These may conclude with a gruesome picture of the social and religious relations still prevailing amongst the Upper Guinea natives on the opposite side of the continent:

"Only a few weeks before our arrival thirty slaves were killed at a place not fifty miles from Bonny, in order that their late master might not be unattended in the land of spirits; while the relations of another deceased chief, also in the immediate neighbourhood, had lately buried alive two of his slaves in his grave, and had hung up two more, head downwards, by hooks passed through the sinews of their heels; in which position they remained until the flesh rotted away, and the poor wretches, still alive, fell into a pit full of spikes, on which they were impaled."

The natives in question have been in contact with Europeans for about four hundred years; and there are Europeans who still believe in the absolute equality of all mankind, who believe especially that the pure Negro is capable, unaided, of rising to the European level in the social scale.

The Poetical Works of George MacDonald. In 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

It should always be remembered of Mr. George MacDonald, as of Mr. George Meredith, that he is not a proseman who has deviated into verse, but a poet who has been impelled by promptings from without rather than within to settle down into prose. Had both writers found at the first the audience they sought, it is tolerably certain that we should have had neither The Ordeal of Richard Feverel nor Alec Forbes of Howglen; and it is interesting, as a further detail of correspondence, that both bade farewell slowly and lingeringly to the higher levels. Their earliest works in the new vehicle, Mr. Meredith's Shaving of Shagpat and Mr. MacDonald's Phantastes, seemed like sorrowful protests against an unwelcome necessity. They were books of imagination all compact; and between their lines a quick sensibility could read the words of defiance, "If I am compelled to cast off the form of poetry, nothing shall compel me to abandon its essential substance." Neither has abandoned it; and probably the most delightful qualities as well as the sometimes irritating defects of the novels of both writers are due to the fact that they are the work of a poet who now and then has a feeling of limitation as if from the strain of a fetter.

We have never believed that in either case prose has been really a fetter; and, so far as Mr. MacDonald is concerned, our belief is strengthened and, as it were, solidified by a study of this first issue in a single edition of the entire body of his published poems. Some confusion has, we believe, been caused by the often repeated assertion of the identity of the poet and the singer. The prime essentials of the poet are surely found in the man whose perception, reflection, and emotion express themselves naturally and habitually in forms of imagination rather than of literal definition: as Coleridge truly said, the opposite of poetry is not prose but science. It is undoubtedly true that in a large number of cases this imaginative habit of nature finds its instinctive and most adequate utterance in the harmonies or melodies of verse; and when this is so, we have a Spenser, a Herrick, or a Shelley. But there are others in whom the plant of poetic imagination either stops short of blossoming, or blossoms only at times in the bright consummate flower of perfect verse. De Quincey, who wrote "The Three Ladies of Sorrow," produced no verse at all; the verse of Mr. Ruskin has none of the distinction of his prose; and though Mr. MacDonald is, in the ordinary sense of the word, much more of a poet than is either of these mighty masters of imaginative prose, it can hardly be said of him, any more than it can be said of them, that he finds in verse the only natural and satisfying rendering of his thought, emotion, or vision. In the early poems—especially in Within and Without—there is even a considerable portion of matter which is really prose in everything but its external form; and though the later verses fulfil all the conditions of true poetry and many of the conditions of fine poetry, it can hardly be said that the imagination is always aware of that poignant touch of which we are conscious while reading certain passages of Phantasies, Robert Falconer, or some of the prose stories for children. When the touch comes we wish its impression to remain with us undulled; and if some competent admirer would do for the verse of Mr. MacDonald what Matthew Arnold did for the verse of Wordsworth, we should have a MacDonald anthology of flawless flowers.

To point out existing flaws when one has so little space in which to celebrate beauties is an ungracious and thankless task; and only in justification of our plea for some process of winnowing do we refer to the frequent inversions which very small labour would have removed: to occasional trivialities which are almost a burlesque of the simplicity at which they aim; to grotesque conceits, the worst of which—"years are Christ's napkins to wipe off the sin"— is not outdone by the most fantastic of the so-called "metaphysical poets"; or to the intrusion of some jarring incongruity such as that which all but spoils a lovely poem of child-thought, otherwise as beautiful in expression as it is tender in feeling. It is the second of the two poems devoted to "Little Effie" in the series of "Roadside Poems," and it is entitled "Reciprocity." The first line is, of course, a reference to the preceding poem, and might perhaps be recast with advantage, as it gives a feeling of incompleteness:

"Her mother, Elsie older grown,
One evening for adieu,
Said, 'You'll not mind being left alone,
For God takes care of you!'

"In child-way her heart's eye did see
The correlation's node:
'Yes,' she said, 'God takes care o' me,
An' I take care o' God.'

"The child and woman were the same,
She changed not, only grew;
'Twixt God and her no shadow came:
The true is always true!

"As daughter, sister, promised wife,
Her heart with love did brim:
Now, sure, it brims as full of life,
Hid fourteen years in him."

All can see the beauty here; some who cherish a like memory will find something dearer than ordinary beauty; but one feels the pedantic invasion of the second line of the second stanza as one feels a physical hurt, and to be hurt by such a poem is, indeed, to be wounded in the house of one's friends. Here is the poem that immediately follows: not more beautiful as a whole, but restfully satisfying, because quite unmarred. It is called "The Shadows."

"My little boy with smooth fair cheeks,
And dreamy large brown eyes,
Not often, little wisehead, speaks,
But hearing, weighs and tries.

"'God is not only in the sky,'
His sister said one day—
Not older much, but she would cry
Like Wisdom in the way—

"'He's in this room.' His dreamy, clear,
Large eyes look round for God:
In vain they search, in vain they peer—
His wits are all abroad.

"'He is not here, mamma? No, no;
I do not see him at all!
He's not the shadows, is he? So
His doubtful accents fall—

"Fall on my heart, no babble mere!
They rouse both love and shame.
But for earth's loneliness and fear,
I might be saying the same.

"Nay, sometimes, ere the morning break
And home the shadows flee,
In my dim room even yet I take Those shadows, Lord, for thee."

To be a poet with a recognisable individuality of imaginative vision and utterance is much; but Mr. MacDonald is something more, for he adds to the poet's special gifts those of the mystic and the spiritual seer. He has something of Vaughan's quiet rapture of communion, something too of Blake's divinely childlike simplicity. One small section of his work is entitled "Parables;" and the title might, without any great strain, be made much more largely inclusive. No writer of our time has a clearer eye than he for the large truth revealing itself for a moment in the apparently trivial fact: for the permanent in the transient, for soul in sense, for the divine in the human. Some years ago a brilliant, shallow, and immensely popular book attempted to trace the operation of "natural law in the spiritual world." Mr. MacDonald reverses this sterile process. He is bent upon seeing and declaring the operation of spiritual law in the natural world: of rendering the lower in terms of the higher, not of limiting the higher by the conditions of the lower. The last word of the philosophy of Jacques of Arden was to see "good in everything": the ultimate goal of Mr. MacDonald's vision is the seeing of everything in good—that is, in God:

"In God alone, the perfect end, Wilt thou find thyself or friend," or the secret of spring and winter, of birth and death, of the life that seems, and of the life that is.

A very charming illustration of this instinctive attitude—and one altogether free from the subtlety which may at times daunt the uninitiated reader—is to be found in the poem "Baby," which begins with the couplet:

"Where do you come from, baby, dear?
Out of the everywhere into here;"

but fortunately the Anthologies have made it so well known that it need not be quoted. Other and perhaps really finer examples, though "Baby" is bad to beat, are plentifully scattered up and down these volumes, and even to indicate them by name would be a somewhat lengthy task. In reviewing a book of new poems, the reviewer who refrains from copious representative quotations falls somewhat short of his duty; but the work included in these two volumes is already known to a large and rapidly increasing circle, and we may be pardoned therefore for what would otherwise have been an undue preponderance of comment. We should, however, like to give one specimen of Mr. MacDonald's sonnet work. It is not large in bulk, but admirable in quality, though Mr. MacDonald is often characteristically careless of some of the less obvious refinements of structure, as in the following, "Lost and Found," where it will be seen that the main pause comes at the end not of the octave, but of the first line of the sestet.

"I missed him when the sun began to bend;
I found him not when I had lost his rim;
With many tears I went in search of him,
Climbing high mountains which did still ascend,
And gave me echoes when I called my friend;
Through cities vast and charnel-houses grim,
And high cathedrals where the light was dim,
Through books and arts and works without an end,
But found him not—the friend whom I had lost.
And yet I found him—as I found the lark,
A sound in fields I heard but could not mark;
I found him nearest when I missed him most;
I found him in my heart, a life in frost,
A light I knew not till my soul was dark."

This is a fine rendering of a profound spiritual experience; and the reader of these volumes will find it difficult to enumerate the exquisitely tender touches, the poems of lovely vision, the flashes of insight into wonderful mysteries of things human and things divine. To those who already know, and care for, Mr. MacDonald's verse, these volumes will be a thing of price; but the outsider may possibly find the collection too bulky to be appetitising, and for his sake the suggested anthology is a thing to be desired. We may note that, though the title-page seems to promise absolute inclusiveness, the work does not contain "The Diary of an Old Soul," and that, after careful search, we have failed to find the perfect little lyric in Phantastes: "Alas! how easily things go wrong." The publishers ought, we think, to have given some indication of omissions.

Miss Honoria. By Frederick Langbridge. (Frederick Warne.)

Sister Constance. By Kate Fitzgerald. (Olipphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY is one of the few writers of fiction who might be warranted never to produce a really bad novel. But he is also one of those past-masters of the craft whose work is certain to be occasionally thin and unimpressive. The very facility with which he writes, the ease of his style, the quickness of his invention—these are qualities which are sometimes as likely to conduce to indifferent work as to good work. One may suppose that The Dictator was either a holiday task, taken up and treated in the lighter mood suited to a holiday, or a piece of pleasant occupation alternating with the worries of parliamentary and political life. If it was undertaken by way of relief from Nationalist vexations, or from the obtuseness of the British Philistine, one can understand how it came to be what it is. In such a case, it would be too much to expect profound studies of character or elaborate work of any kind. What it would be natural to expect is exactly what Mr. McCarthy gives us—a light, easy, graceful story, which makes no severe demand on our attention, and can be taken up or put down at any point, without the least strain on the reader's patience or shock to his feelings. Ericson, the "dictator," scarcely sustains his part. He is neither a Bluebeard nor a Bonaparte, but a mild, amiable, loveable man. The incongruity between his gentleness and his boldness, between the average human powers with which he impresses us and the extraordinary powers which he is supposed to display at need, would hardly be conceivable off the stage or out of a novel. Captain Sarrasin and Mrs. Sarrasin, two of the most living people in the book, are fitted with parts that would tell admirably in a comedy. Sir Rupert Langley, the British Foreign Secretary, who seems at one time modelled on Lord Randolph Churchill, really belongs to no known ministerial or diplomatic type. He is only brought into the book in order that his daughter may also figure in it. But if Sir Rupert is too obviously fictitious, Helena Langley is clearly impossible. She is drawn as a girl of strong parts and character, but she makes love to the dictator with the sentimental simplicity of a novice and the daring of a flirt. She was neither the one nor the other; and being what she was, it was simply impossible that she should act as we are told she did. Prof. Flick and Andrew J. Copping, the villains of the piece, are a very clumsy pair of conspirators, though the comic touches given to them make them amusing. The whole story, indeed, is amusing rather than edifying; and to a reader who wants to while away a summer afternoon without effort, but with some amount of pleasure, that will hardly seem a demerit.

The Winning of May is a very able novel. Though the central incidents are in themselves comparatively small, their bearing upon the general plot is important, and the scheme of the plot is skilfully worked out. But that is by no means the chief merit of the book; for though it is necessary that a story should be so constructed as to hold together, there are other things more essential. Truth of observation, skill in the delineation of character, the power of making the author's puppets live, and of giving freshness, thought, interest to the things they say—these things are far more important than the mere invention of incidents. In these respects, as in those of less weight, The Winning of May is a distinct success. From beginning to end it is brilliantly written—indeed, it would well bear reading twice: in the first instance for the story, and again for the excellence of the style, the finish of the workmanship. Among the numerous characters there are two in whom the chief interest centres—May Leslie and Arthur Beresford. May is a curate's daughter, a girl with more than ordinary sense and sensibility; Beresford is a rich, proud, highly cultivated man, whom an acute deformity has made cynical. These two are thrown casually together; and after an occasion when Beresford has called at May's rooms—though not to see her—a discovery is made, in connexion with which suspicion falls upon him. May's evidence, which is volunteered, proves his innocence, but exposes May herself to unjust reflections of which she is not conscious. Beresford conceives himself bound in honour to offer her marriage; and she accepts him, with genuine love on her own side, and the belief that the same feeling exists on his side also. When she learns that the offer of marriage was only made because "society" had concocted a scandal out of a perfectly innocent circumstance, she at once puts an end to the engagement, and goes away to be out of the reach of further approaches from Beresford. It was after this time that the "winning" was accomplished. May was brave and noble; and the innate gentleness and warmth of heart in Beresford were brought out, as they could not otherwise have been, by the long and not easy pursuit of a prize which he saw to be well worth the winning. There are some matters of detail which are perhaps open to criticism. One does not see why May should have been regarded as Beresford's social inferior; and it is hardly conceivable that society would resent in so marked and persistent a way Beresford's supposed bad faith towards her. But these are trifles, while the merits of the tale are as substantial as they are striking.

It is a big drop from the book just noticed to The Heart of Tipperary. Though Mr. Ryan's "romance of the Land League" is floated by a preface from Mr. William O'Brien, it will hardly make many converts to that gentleman's faith. The Land League itself is dealt with in the most shadowy way, and the characters altogether fail to lay hold of the reader's mind. They are mere stalking-horses, from behind which the writer of the book levels his little snapshots at "the Castle." Devin Gilpatrick, the ardent leader of the insurgents, who turns informer through disappointed love and finally marries Lady Clonmoragh, the tyrant of the district, is not a more false or strained picture than that lady herself. She, by the way, for reasons perhaps known to Mr. Ryan, but certainly unknown to any "peerage," is indifferently called Lady Clonmoragh and Lady Frances. Novels written with a political object are generally failures, and Mr. Ryan has failed egregiously. The romance, the fire, the enthusiasm are wanting, which alone could excuse such partisanship as the book shows. The Phoenix Park murder is briefly alluded to as "the disaster which had ruined the bright fortunes of the country," and outrages are either made light of or explained as practical jokes. The story of Ireland is not to be told in this fashion.

The writer of Lydia can scarcely have considered whether it would be easier for a woman with a genius for painting to help her impoverished family by persevering in her art or by giving it up to play general servant to them. Granted the reasonable possibility of the form of Lydia's self-sacrifice, Mr. Sydney Christian's book is distinctly good. It shows a real feeling for character and the results of character, and it also gives evidence of that wise restraint which writers of stories of this scope do not always observe. The style is admirably suited to the subject; and though the few incidents are perhaps hackneyed, the light and effective touches with which they are presented make them seem fresh.

Of Welsh stories there are not many, and one so attractive as Sweetheart Gwen should be appreciated. It is refreshing as being full of true human feeling, and yet emphatically not a love story. The scrappy indistinctness and simplicity with which small Mark's impressions are recorded give them a vivid reality of their own, and each of the few characters has his or her own individuality. The reader will enshrine Gwen, as did the grown-up Markham of the last chapter, in a very tender memory. It is doubtful whether the suggestions of Mr. George Meredith that occur throughout the book add to or take from its value.

Mr. Frederick Langbridge tells a touching story, and tells it well, in Miss Honoria. Miss Honoraria herself is a very interesting personality, whose merits are pathetically recalled for the reader, on the last page of the book, by one of the kindest of monumental inscriptions. But one is inclined to think that her and Daisy's forgiveness of Sebert Gold, who caused so much misery and showed so little contrition for it, was a little too hasty and unquestioning.

If Sister Constance is a first book, and it apparently is, there are good things to be said for it. The writer has evident skill in the construction of a plot. With more practice she will give more attention to essential details. She had need, however, beware of the commonplace, both in descriptions and in conversations.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

After the Revolution, and other Holiday Fantasies. By William Wallace. (Glasgow: Hodge.) The holiday humour in books is sufficiently rare to make it easy for the reader to overlook one or two obvious defects in Mr. Wallace's portly volume. To begin with, the volume is a trifle too portly for either sylvan hammock or seaside boulder; though, as book-buying goes nowadays, bulk appears to be rather a virtue than otherwise, so that what may seem to one man an inconvenience may be to some scores of others a distinct recommendation. This, perhaps, is no affair of Mr. Wallace's one way or the other. In the matter of humorous local references and allusions to passing events, however, the author alone is concerned, and—except for the future student of the Victorian period—it is rather a pity that these flies have been allowed to get into the amber. A Glasgow man, no doubt, will "catch on" to the humour of "Ursalair;" but how many, even among the good folk of St. Mungo's, will perceive the amusing suggestion embodied in "Bellapigott"? After all, these are very subordinate points, and will not detract materially from the reader's enjoyment of the author's dry, shrewd, and exuberantly topsy-turvy jocularity. Speaking of Scotch humour, one is fatally reminded of the small change of English wit; it is impossible not to remember the man who "jock'd wi' diffeeculty." Mr. Wallace is the antipodes of that genial but obstructed soul: the difficulty with him is to prevent his joking. The fun occasionally runs off into harlequinade; but just as often—indeed, much more frequently—one is pulled up short by a keen, sober aside, full of insight into character and tinged with a little of the irony of a wide experience of life. It would be an unprofitable task to attempt to give a detailed notion of the contents of the volume, or to enumerate the various topics, from golf to the authentic history of Scotland, on which the author discourses. Enough to say that while the Shepherd and Christopher North would have enjoyed the whimsical fooling of the "Revolution," which converted the ploughman and artisan into the Upper Class, and the old aristocracy into butlers and ladies' maids, a pretty little scrap-book of worldly wisdom might be clipped from such papers as "Quiet People as a Nuisance," "The Heartless Man," and "The Art of Being Alone."

Folia Litteraria. Essays and Notes on English Literature, By John M. Hales. (Seeley.) Prof. Hales's acquaintance with our mediaeval literature is far-reaching and exact. He seldom blinds his critical judgment or winks at facts in the defence of a pet theory, and his contributions to the subject are therefore sound and valuable. To the student these jottings from the less trodden pathways of bookland will be very welcome; but the minute and yet brief treatment of so many disconnected "points" does not make an attractive volume: a far more detailed continuous study of any one work or author or period would be more readable. Here is what may be called a series of useful appendices to various works, of which they were, in some cases, "press notices." It is not now necessary to dwell on the particular results of Prof. Hales's scholarship thus expounded, since all these papers have appeared in magazines and, at the time of their original publication, no doubt attracted the attention of those to whom they were chiefly addressed. But it is unfortunate that many of the essays in Folia Litteraria are still divided into two parts, written in the first instance for different editors, and partly covering the same ground. The longer essays, in spite of the competent handling in those devoted to "Old English Metrical Romances" and "Ballad Poetry," also suffer from having been written for a magazine. They are too crowded with facts in one paragraph, and, in consideration for the average reader, too diffuse and gossipy in the next. The sense of unity or proportion is wanting, and Prof. Hales's style is ill-calculated to lead him triumphantly over dull matter. The interesting and helpful information contained in Folia Litteraria will be appreciated for its intrinsic worth or not at all.

The Trumpeter. By Joseph Victor von Scheffel. Translated by Jessie Beck and Louise Lorimer. With Introduction by Sir Theodore Martin. (Blackwoods.) We are not aware whether the immense popularity of Scheffel's Trumpeter—it has run through two hundred editions in Germany—has caused any earlier translation into English. That the two ladies who have now translated it have done full justice to the original poem we should not like, from lack of knowledge, to affirm; but we do affirm that their translation makes it quite easy to understand the popularity of the original. The story is a simple tale of love, separation, re-union; but its charm lies in its lightness of touch, its ready adoption of the mock-heroic, and equally ready relapse into simple pathos, and, above all, in its twinkling humour. The sage tom cat, Hiddigeigei—who plays chorus or commentator to the shifting fortunes of the lovers—is a real creation; he has solved to his satisfaction all philosophic problems, save one!

"Why do people kiss each other?"

"His not hate, nor is it hunger,
They nor bite nor eat each other.
"Tis not blind and bootless nonsense,
For they act, in other matters,
Shrewdly, and with wit and prudence.
Why then, all in vain I query,
Why do people kiss each other?
Why especially the young ones?
Why these especially in springtime?
On this knotty point, to-morrow,
Will I on the roof's high gable,
Make my earnest meditation." (p. 142.)

And the results of Hiddigeigei's wisdom is enshrined in his delightfully demure songs (pp. 166-175). The rippling facility with which The Trumpeter was clearly written, probably prevented Scheffel from realising that it was too long: sixteen cantos of four feet trochaics take a good deal of reading; yet, though many, they are none of them prosy. If we must choose, we think canto 8, "The Concert in the Garden Pavilion," is about the best; the quietly satiric humour with which Sir Fludribus the painter is described, with his foibles, and vanities, and kettle-drumming, and triangle playing, is delightful; so are the two Roman cantos which conclude the poem.

Byron's Siege of Corinth. Mit Einleitung und Anmerkungen herausgegeben von Eugen

Kölbing. (Berlin: Felber.) Prof. Kölbing, of Breslau, one of the first of living Anglicists, and the author of the exemplary edition of the Middle English romance Sir Bevis, the concluding part of which is now being printed for the Early English Text Society, has here turned to the comparatively fresh field of the nineteenth century poets. It is natural perhaps that the first commentaries upon recent poetry should appear in some other country than that of the poet, particularly where, as in Byron, the form is bold and simple and free, and subtle imagination as rare as subtle thought. Indeed, if Byron is anywhere difficult to a competent student of English, it is in his carelessly ambiguous phrases, the trashy lines which he did not blot, which reflect his want of artistic penetration, and which it is least worth while for the student to scrutinise. However, Prof. Kölbing has done a great deal more than discuss, with elaborate precision and abundant scholarship, these rifts in the somewhat coarse texture of Byron's tale. At every step he is at hand with quotations from Byron's letters, and from much other contemporary literature, illustrating the several descriptive traits. Another valuable point is the indication, in the minutely careful footnotes, of the passages which were condemned or approved by Gifford, to whom Byron entrusted his work with carte blanche to omit what he pleased. Whatever the critical reputation of Gifford may be worth in the literary market to-day, the precise indication of what was approved in Byron by the scornful assailant of Shelley and Keats has undoubted historic interest. The most original feature of the Introduction, which contains a very full literary history of the "Siege of Corinth," is the systematic account of the use of alliteration in it. That may not carry us far towards the essence of poetry; but alliteration is so important an element in the ring of Byron's verse, that an analysis of his use of it has great value: in particular, the attempt to distinguish how far it was in him founded upon traditional alliterative formulae, how far upon new combinations. The Introduction contains also the plausible hint that the character of Alp was suggested by that of the apostate Julian in Southey's "Don Roderick." Prof. Kölbing's edition is indispensable for the student of Byron. We cannot help, however, expressing the perhaps irrelevant wish that German editors of his calibre would do something to bring home to the university students, for whom we presume this edition is intended, some of the really profound and original work of the time in poetry. The "Siege of Corinth" is, as a poem, neither better nor worse than a good many other pieces of energetic and fluent narrative verse: it is poetical, but it teaches nothing new in poetry. Whereas a careful choice from Shelley, or Keats, or Wordsworth, adequately and critically illumined, would be a treasure from which the student even of Goethe could draw acquaintance with worlds of poetry less great indeed than his, yet even rarer and more instinct with magic.

Molière's Les Femmes Savantes. With Introduction and Notes by G. H. Clarke. (Williams & Norgate.) Mr. Clarke deserves credit for having given in a school edition of the "Femmes Savantes" details about the original production of the play, the stage on which it was first represented, a plan of Molière's theatre, and other particulars, valuable in that they awaken an historical interest, and lead teachers and scholars back to the sources. The title-page of the original edition is reproduced with specimens of Molière's orthography. There are some misprints in the text, perhaps unavoidable in the short time allowed for revision of proofs: l. 565, "grenier ce céans," "ce" instead of "de"; "la princesse d'Uranie," instead of "la princesse Uranie"; half a line omitted, "Ah! laissez-le donc lire," in l. 760; "vous mes feux" instead of "tous mes feux" l. 1183. The notes are interesting and helpful. It is perhaps hard on the lover Clitandre to call him "conceited" because he prefaces a delicate explanation with a declaration of his own sincerity, and to tax him with "eaves-dropping," because he overhears a conversation between two ladies in which his character and prospects of happiness are spitefully attacked, and allows it to proceed for a while without immediately revealing his presence. The grammatical note to the words "me la faire sortir" (l. 505 in Philaminte's speech to her husband about the kitchen wench Martine) is misleading; it gives two alternatives—both of them wrong—to the right construction, "me ethic dative." "Rhyme in Latin" is a mis-translation for "rhymes with Latin" in l. 1432.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE memoir of Louisa, Marchioness of Waterford, by Mr. Augustus J. C. Hare, which has more than once been announced in the ACADEMY, will form a very different book from what was originally intended. It is now decided that it shall be in no less than three volumes, each of about 500 pages; and that it shall tell in full the "story of two noble lives"—those of the Marchioness and her sister, the Countess Canning. They were the daughters of Lord Stuart de Rothesay, who was ambassador at Paris to Louis XVIII., and again to Louis Philippe. Almost the whole of the second volume will be devoted to India during the Mutiny, which is described from the contemporary letters and journals of Lady Canning. The illustrations will include two portraits engraved on steel, fourteen photo-gravures after Lady Waterford's drawings, and numerous woodcuts from sketches by the author. The book will be published, in October, by Mr. George Allen.

AMONG the contributors to the two volumes on Yachting, which will shortly appear in the "Badrington Library," are the Marquis of Dufferin, the Earls of Onslow and Pembroke, Lord Brassey, Lieut. Col. Bucknill, the Rev. G. L. Blake, R.N., Mr. E. F. Knight, Mr. G. L. Watson (the Clyde builder), and Mr. Lewis Herreshoff (the Rhode Island builder). The illustrations will be from drawings by Mr. R. T. Prichett, and from photographs.

MR. R. L. Stevenson's Catriona will be published on September 1, by Messrs. Cassell & Co., and will be issued simultaneously in New York.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. have in the press The Story of Louis XVII. of France, by Elizabeth E. Evans, the author of a recent work on Caspar Hauser. She contends that the Indian missionary, Eleazer Williams, was the son of Louis XVI., and refutes the claims of Naundorff and other minor pretenders.

THE REV. JAMES WOOD, editor of Nuttall's Standard Dictionary, has just completed a new Dictionary of Quotations, upon which he has been engaged for the last three years. The comprehensive character of the work, which contains 30,000 entries and fills about 670 closely-printed pages, may be judged from its full title—"Dictionary of quotations from ancient and modern, English and foreign sources, including phrases, mottoes, maxims, proverbs, definitions, aphorisms, and sayings of wise men, in their bearing on life, literature, speculation, science, art, religion, and morals, especially in the modern aspects of them." The mode of arrangement is alphabetical, following the order of the initial word in each quotation; but there is also a copious index, classified according to subject matter. The work will be published shortly by Messrs. Frederick Warne & Co.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN has in the press a book by Mr. W. W. Hodson, entitled The Meeting-House and the Manse; or, the Story of the Independents of Sudbury. In the preface, Mr. Ira Bosely says that in examining the Sudbury Chapel books he discovered a list, extending from 1685 to 1852, of baptisms and deaths of members of the Gainsborough family.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL will publish, before the end of the present month, A Tour in Palestine and Syria, by Mr. John Brinton, with illustrations and maps.

MESSRS. F. V. WHITE & Co. will publish this month Mrs. Alexander's novel Found Wanting, in three volumes; also a new edition of Florence Warden's A Witch of the Hills, in picture boards.

The Pilgrim's Progress and its Lessons is the title of a new work, in exposition of Bunyan's Allegory, by Mr. Samuel Wright, announced for early publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MR. ERSKINE BEVERIDGE, of Dunfermline, is about to issue privately, at the press of Messrs. Constable, a local history of the ancient burgh of Crail in Fife, entitled "The Churchyard Memorials of Crail." The author, taking the tombstones of the churchyard as his text, gives a detailed account of the families and antiquities of the district. The book will form a large quarto, and will be profusely illustrated.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. are contemplating the publication of a volume of Matthew Arnold's letters; and his family will feel much obliged if those who possess letters will forward them to Mr. G. W. E. Russell, M.P., to the care of the firm. All letters will be carefully returned when copies have been made.

THE seventieth birthday of Miss Yonge has been marked by a presentation to her from admirers in all parts of the world. An album containing 5000 autographs and criticisms of her writings was left on her birthday at her house in the village of Otterbourne, Hampshire. On the front-page is the following inscription, in an illuminated border:—

"Charlotte Mary Yonge.—We offer our hearty congratulations on your seventieth birthday, and desire to express to you the great enjoyment that we have received from your writings, and our belief that they have done much good in this generation. August 11, 1893."

Among the signatures are those of the Archbishop of York, the Marquis of Salisbury, the Earl of Selborne, Viscount Wolmer, the Bishops of London, Manchester, Salisbury, Chester, Bath and Wells, Chichester, Leicester, Reading, Southwell, Cape Town, Connecticut, and St. Helena, Bishops Selwyn, Jenner, and Hobhouse, the Deans of Winchester, Windsor, and Salisbury, Canon Scott Holland, the Warden of Keble College, Mr. Balfour and several members of Mr. Gladstone's family, besides the local clergy and gentry. The Queen of Italy sent a large photograph of herself, bearing her autograph and accompanied by a congratulatory note.

MR. EDWARD BAKER, of Birmingham, has published a hand-book (or, rather, sale-catalogue) of books, &c., connected with the history of the railway system in Great Britain and Ireland, which illustrates the growth of a new department of book-collecting. We observe that no less than three guineas is asked for the treatise of Thomas Gray, the Nottingham mechanic, who is said to have been the first to agitate persistently for public locomotive railways; that the two first numbers of Bradshaw can only be supplied in facsimile; and that early numbers down to 1847 are worth a guinea.

A WELL-KNOWN scholar and man of letters has sent the following jeu d'esprit to Dr. Murray, on hearing the news that the New English Dictionary has at last got through the letter C, and that D is now in hand:

"Wherever the English speech has spread,
And the Union Jack flies free,
The news will be gratefully, proudly read,
That you've conquered your A B C!
But I fear it will come
As a shock to some
That the sad result must be
That you're taking to dabble and dawdle and daz,
To dulness and dumps, and (worse than those)
To danger and drink,
And—shocking to think—
To words that begin with a d——."

THE thirty-third fascicule of the Archives Historiques de la Gascogne contains the first part of volume ii. of the "Livres des Comptes Frères Bonis," edited by M. E. Forestié. The first volume has been crowned by the Académie. The second part of Vol. ii. will contain the rest of the text, a glossary and index. The next fascicule promised is Audijos's "Histoire de la Gabelle en Gascogne." This society has also undertaken the publication of the "Bullaire Gascon, d'après les Archives du Vatican." The first volume, edited by M. l'Abbé Guerard, covering the Pontificate of John XXII (1316-1334), will be ready in the beginning of next year.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

PROF. MAX MULLER, who has been spending some months at Athens and Constantinople, is now on his way to Leipzig, where he will celebrate the jubilee of his doctor's degree, conferred upon him by the University of Leipzig on September 1, 1843.

AN appeal is made for subscriptions to complete the equipment of the Cambridge Observatory. What is specially needed is a photographic telescope, with a refractor of eighteen inches diameter, which would be used for the investigation of solar parallax. The amount asked for from the public is £2200.

THE next session of the faculties of arts, law, and science at University College, London, will be opened on October 3, with an inaugural lecture by Prof. W. M. Flinders Petrie, the occupant of the chair of Egyptology founded by the late Miss Amelia B. Edwards.

THE following is a complete list of those upon whom the University of London has conferred the degree of Doctor of Science this year:—In experimental physics, R. W. Stewart; in chemistry, F. D. Chattaway and J. T. Hewitt; in zoology, H. B. Pollard; in animal physiology, J. W. Pickering; in geology and physical geography, J. W. Gregory, W. F. Hume, and Miss M. M. Ogilvie. The last mentioned is well known for her researches in the geology of the Tyrol Alps.

THE Royal Commission for the Exhibition of 1881 has published the following list of science scholarships:

Four science scholarships of 1891 exceptionally renewed for a third year. (Scholarships are renewed for a third year only in cases where it appears that the renewal is likely to result in work of scientific importance. Not more than one-fourth of the scholarships granted in any year are renewed for a third year.) (1) James H. Gray, University of Glasgow; (2) John Joseph Sudborough, University of Heidelberg two years, Owens College third year; (3) Harry Ingle, University of Munich; (4) Thomas Ewan, Owens College two years, third year University of Germany.

Science scholarships of 1892 renewed for a second year: Andrew John Herbertson, Ben Nevis Observatory, University of Berlin; James Blacklock Henderson, University of Berlin; John Macdonald, University of Jena; Lionel Simeon Marks, Cornell University, State of New York; George Lester Thomas, University of Leipzig; Harold Hart Mann, Sorbonne, Paris; James Terence Conroy, University of Gottingen; Thornton Charles Lamb, University of Heidelberg; Edward Arnold Medley, City and Guilds Central Technical Institution; William Henry Oates, Firth College (permitted to remain there under special circumstances); William Gannon, Owens College; Frederick J. Smale, University of Leipzig; Samuel Henry Baraclough, Cornell University; David Hamilton Jackson, University of Melbourne; Edward Taylor Jones, University College, Bangor, first year; James Bernard Allen, University of Sydney.

Science Scholars of 1893: Herbert William Bolam, University of St. Andrews; George Edwin Allan, first year University of Glasgow, second year a German university; James Wallace Walker, first year University of Leipzig, second year University of St. Andrews; Arthur Lapworth, first year Central Technical Institution, South Kensington, second year University of Munich; John Ellis Myers, University of Strasburg, physical laboratory; Arthur Walsh Titherley, at first University College, Liverpool, afterwards a German university; Edward Chester Cyril Baly, first year, University College, London, second year not yet decided; John Cannell Cain, first year Owens College, second year not yet decided; Ella Mary Bryant, first year Durham College of Science, second year not stated; James Darnell Granger, University of Berlin; Mary O'Brien, University of Oxford Botanical Laboratories; Frederick George Donnan, University of Leipzig; James Alexander MacPhail, Königliche mechanische technische Versuchs-Anstalt, Charlottenburg; Norman Ross Carmichael, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore; W. Henry Ledger, Cornell University; George W. Macdonald, first year University of Melbourne, second year University College, London.

List of institutions to be invited to nominate science scholars for 1894: University of Edinburgh; University of Glasgow; University of Aberdeen; Mason College, Birmingham; University College, Bristol; Yorkshire College, Leeds; University College, Liverpool; University College, London; Owens College, Manchester; Durham College of Science, Newcastle; University College, Nottingham; Firth College, Sheffield; University College of South Wales, Cardiff; Queen's College, Cork; Queen's College, Galway; University of Toronto; Dalhousie University, Halifax, Nova Scotia; University of Adelaide; University of New Zealand.

THE new buildings of the Agricultural College at Aspatria, in Cumberland, were opened last month by the mayor of Carlisle. This college, which was founded in 1874, has received a great stimulus from the encouragement given to agricultural education by the county councils. The number of students now in residence is sixty-five.

WE may also mention that the county councils for Kent and Surrey have agreed to establish jointly an agricultural college at Wye as a centre for scientific and practical instruction.

Two Southern State Universities—those of Alabama and Tennessee—have recently adopted resolutions admitting women to all classes and privileges. The new code of the State University of Mississippi also authorises the admission of women, while the board of visitors of the University of Virginia are considering a recommendation of the faculty to the same effect.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THE PLESAUNCE OF THE CITY CHILDREN.

HERE in the heart of the grimy town
Is the fairest spot that the children see,
An acre of grass-plot bare and brown,
Six scanty shrubs and a stunted tree;
Though sorrier garden scarce could be
To make the heart of the weary gay,
It rings at evening with mirth and glee.
This is the place where the children play.

Round it the dingy terraces frown,
The fog hangs over it ceaselessly,
Never a bud doth the rose bush crown,
Nor daisy lurk in the grass. Ah me,
Birds on their voyages past it flee,
And none for a song's space cares to stay,
Bound for the vastness of moor and lea.
This is the place where the children play.

Never the roar of the streets can drown
Songs that the children shout lustily,
Glad is the crowd of the tattered gown,
Though out at elbow and frayed at knee;
Here for a jubilant hour they're free
When work is over at close of day;
And so it is fairyland all agree.
This is the place where the children play.

ENVOY.

Prince, this ballad I make for thee;
Listen awhile to the thing I say:
Thy palace gardens are fair to see:
This is the place where the children play.

PERCY ADDLESHAW.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE current number of Mind opens with a clever article by Prof. Jones on "Idealism and Epistemology." The aim of the writer is to show that Hegelianism and Neo-Hegelianism have no place for the new and much-vaunted branch of philosophy known as Theory of Knowledge or Epistemology. Hegelianism or "Idealism" starts from the essential unity of knowledge and reality, subject and object, and is thus relieved from the fruitless task of trying to get from the former to the latter. It is "the supreme merit of Hegel that he has indicated a way of deliverance from this endless and hopeless puzzle of getting out of thoughts by means of thoughts." We hope Prof. Jones's article may stimulate some neo-Kantian to put forth a new statement of the problem of epistemology. Mr. F. Granger expounds in a learned and instructive manner Aristotle's Theory of Reason; Mr. H. Laurie seeks to improve on Mill's account of the Methods of Inductive Inquiry; Mr. E. T. Dixon argues that the distinction between Real and Verbal Propositions is a capital one in logical science; Dr. James Ward contributes the first of a series of articles on that knotty and much-discussed problem in psychology, the relation of Assimilation to Association. The paper, like all that its author gives us, is marked by great precision of thought and critical acuteness. Yet it leaves the reader a little in the dark as to how far Dr. Ward recognises in Assimilation a distinct intellectual process not included in Association. The subsequent articles will, no doubt, make this point clearer.

PROF. ZIMMER ON NENNIUS.*

II. THE SOURCES OF THE HISTORIA BRITTONUM. NENNIUS' work is an amplification of the brief sketch of British history prefixed by Gildas to his admotiuniuncula to the princes of South West Britain. In thus amplifying, Nennius made use of Latin works which came to him both from the Continent and from Ireland, which was in his day still the great home of classic culture in Western Europe. The continental works are the Chronicles of Eusebius with Jerome's Continuation; Prosper's Chronicle, itself an abridgement and a continuation of Eusebius-Jerome; and a Liber Beati Germani. The Irish Latin works were a Liber de sex aetatibus mundi, of similar character but not identical with that we find in Irish mediaeval MSS. preceding the Lebor Gabala or legendary pre-history of Ireland; a version of the Lebor Gabala itself, shorter and simpler than nearly all existing versions of this text, which are post-Viking productions and influenced by events of the Viking period (A.D. 800-950); the Vita Patricii of Muirchu Maccu Machteni and the Collectanea Patriciana, ascribed to Tirechan, both of which documents are preserved in the Book of Armagh. Nennius also had at his disposal Cymric genealogies and Cymric accounts of Arthur.

* Nennius Vindicatus. Ueber Entstehung, Geschichte und Quellen der Historia Brittonum, 8vo. viii. 342 pp. (Berlin: Weidmann.)

Nennius endeavoured to reconcile and harmonise his various authorities; but as the chronological system of Eusebius is based on the Jewish, whereas that of his Irish authorities is based upon the Septuagint scheme, Nennius's own chronology is hopelessly and absurdly at fault and deserves no credence whatever.

Nennius's capacity for making a really critical use of his authorities may be gauged by the following fact:—Jerome's Continuation of Eusebius ends with the year 381 post natiuitatem, after which date Nennius was compelled to have recourse to Prosper. But whilst Eusebius-Jerome reckons the years according to the Emperors, Prosper reckons them according to the Consuls. The first entry in Prosper that Nennius had to look up was one relating to Maximus. Struck by the difference in the mode of reckoning, he pondered what it might mean, and finally, worthy conscientious dunderhead that he was, penned the following amazing piece of information: "a tempore illius (Maximi) consules esse coeperunt et Caesares nunquam appellati sunt postea."

In fact, with the exception of the North British history (A.D. 547-679), embodied whole in Nennius' compilation, and of the material derived from Cymric sources, no portion of the Historia Brittonum has the slightest historical value; we possess all his authorities, and we can assure ourselves that he egregiously misunderstood and misrendered them. But for the study of early Irish and early Welsh legend and saga and for that of early British speech, he is of first rate importance.

As regards Nennius's presentment of the Arthur Sage, Prof. Zimmer is at one with most modern investigators. Arthur was the guledig, the commander in chief of the British forces, as his father Uther (= Victor?) Pendragon had probably been before him; the battle of Mount Badon was fought about 493, and, in effect, stayed the Saxon advance for nigh upon half a century. There can be little doubt that this view meets the facts of the case better than any other; but it is a pity that Prof. Zimmer has not applied his critical acumen to discussing the serious objections to it that may be founded upon the entries in the Saxon Chronicle, the work of Gildas, and the facts of the emigration to Armorica. As regards the latter, he insists upon the second stage of the emigration consequent upon Ceawlin's advance in the second half of the sixth century; and it is apparently to the emigrants of this period that he would attribute the transportation of the first germs of the Arthurian romance, destined, according to him, to receive its chief and most characteristic development among the continental Britons.

It is in the consideration of the Irish sources of Nennius that Prof. Zimmer shows himself most fertile in pregnant and acute investigation and suggestion. The Patrician sources afford him an opportunity of repeating his views about Patrick. Christianity in Ireland is older than Patrick: it came from Britain in the course of the third century, as is proved (inter alia) by the fact that in the older stratum of Irish ecclesiastical loanwords from Latin we find evident traces of British influence. The projected mission of Palladius was less for the conversion of the heathen than for the repression of heresy—a counterpart in fact to Germanus's visit to Britain.

Sucat of Alclyde (afterwards known as Patrick), who took up the abandoned mission of Palladius, and died as first bishop of Armagh about 457-460, enjoyed at first a merely local reputation, as may be seen from the silence of Bede concerning him. The aftergrowth of the Patrick legend owes its existence to the exigencies of the struggle waged by Armagh, first as champion of the Roman usage in the seventh and early eighth century, later, as champion of ecclesiastical nationalism against the bishops of Dublin, representatives of the Anglo-Saxon Church in the tenth to eleventh century. The name Patrick cannot be older on Irish soil than the late seventh century: had it come into Ireland with the fifth century Sucat, it would have appeared as Pathraich.

Prof. Zimmer's view of the Lebor Gabala has been briefly alluded to above. It was originally written in Latin, and came before Nennius as a Liber Occupationis forming a necessary sequel to the Liber de sex aetatibus mundi. The original Latin form has perished; and when Irish letters revived, after the storm and stress period of the Viking invasion, the text was put into Irish and considerably added to. The section concerning the Tuatha de Danann, apparently the most mythological portion of early Irish romance, was largely influenced by the hundred years' contest between the Christian Irish and the heathen Vikings. The original Latin Liber de Occupationis must have been compiled later than the years 617-621, in which a Viking fleet ravaged the Northern coast of Ireland and seized hold of Tory Island for a couple of years—facts which have left their trace on the story found in the Lebor Gabala about the giants of Tor Innis.

As regards the Liber de sex aetatibus mundi, Prof. Zimmer, following up a hint of Gilla Coemain, the eleventh century Irish translator of Nennius, attributes it to Cuana of Fermoy, who died in 640, and whose chronological works are frequently cited in the Annals of Ulster. It is further conjectured that it was an Irish counterpart to the Chronicon of Isidore, from which it differed chiefly in the presentment of the second and sixth aeates, the sixth being, of course, fuller as regards Irish events and the second being elaborated so as to provide a basis for the pre-history of the Irish as found in the Lebor Gabala, and also to supply a pre-history for most of the races known to sixth and seventh century Ireland. In this elaboration the Origines of Isidore were used, as well as Servius's commentary on Vergil (the amplified form of which was the work of an Irish scholar, Robartach), a Latin work based upon the Chronicle of Hippolytus, and a version of the so-called "Frankische Völkertafel." The date of this latter document is accepted from Müllenhoff as 520, and it is maintained to be a genealogical scheme for all the people in contact with the Frankish kings. The mention of "Brittones" shows that at that period the British emigration to Armorica was already of such magnitude as to compel these Frankish scribes to notice it. In this text, which came to Ireland in the sixth century, thanks to the continual communication between Irish and Breton monasteries, Brittones and Alamanni are both described as descendants of Istio. The assumed eponymous hero of the Alamanni, Alamannus or Almannus, became in the Irish sources Albannus, and, by analogy with Romanus, Albanus; was connected in the eleventh century with Albania, the old name for North Britain; and gave rise to the fable of the two sons of Hiscio, Brito and Albanus, who divided Britain between them, as set forth in the eleventh century poem Duan Albanach.

Another work used by Cuana was the Cuilmenn, literally "the lighted up dark corner," which is conjectured by Prof. Zimmer to have been an adaptation of the chronological work of Hippolytus (known to us by means of another adaptation bearing the title of Liber generationis) and to have been brought to Ireland in the middle of the sixth century by Gildas. There exists an Irish legend that the greatest of Irish epics, the Tain bó Cuailgne, had almost faded out of the national memory by the beginning of the seventh century, and that the full text had to be brought back from Brittany, whither it had been carried by "that wise man in exchange for the Cuilmenn." Gildas's standing epithet is sapiens; he did come to Ireland in the middle of the sixth century, returning thence to die in Brittany; and the Cuilmenn, so far as we can judge from the numerous notices about it to be found in mediaeval Irish sources, is just the kind of work he would have written. Prof. Zimmer is therefore minded to accept the Irish legend as fact. It would be pleasant to believe it, as then the tradition for the Tain bó Cuailgne would be thrown back to the early sixth century, at the latest, and Gildas, preserver of the oldest Irish epic, could claim forgiveness for his silence concerning Arthur.

Cuana's work already gave the Trojan origin of Brito, eponym of the Brittones. Nennius, with his genius for muddle and his anxiety to get information from all his sources, identified Brito, son of Silvius, with Brutus, the first consul and expeller of the kings! The ultimate source of the whole Troy fable is sought for by Prof. Zimmer in Ausonius, Epigrams 108-113. It would be unfair to reveal the secret.

Such are the chief results of this fruitful series of investigations. But, indeed, every page teems with novel and suggestive matter. Prof. Zimmer has an amazing faculty for seeing men and events behind the blurred lines of manuscripts; an unintelligible gloss evokes long-forgotten controversies, a trifling difference between two MSS. enables him to reconstruct the history of a period or a movement. He will have a reason for every jot and tittle of his text, even if he has to invent one. Let me hasten to say that in this, far less than in other of his works, does he appear as a breeder of sea-serpents from mares' nests, and even when he seems most adventurous he is profoundly illuminating. An instance will show this. The North British writer of 679, who was, of course, perfectly familiar with his subject, briefly mentions the leading bards of the Northern Cymry:

"Tunc Talhaern Tataguen in poemate claruit; Aneirin et Taliessin et Bluchbard et Cian, qui vocatur Guenith Guant, simul uno tempore in poemate Brittanico claruerunt."

But Nennius read the A of Aneirin as the old Cymric conjunction a (= et), and handed down the passage, teste the existing MSS., thus: "T. T. in poemate claruit et Neirin et Taliessin," &c. Ergo, a well-informed South Welshman of the end of the eighth century knew nothing about the great sixth century North British bards; ergo, the poems ascribed to these bards in mediaeval Welsh MSS. cannot have existed then; ergo, they must all be productions of the ninth and following centuries. The conclusion seems excessive; but how few men would have had the courage to draw it, how few would have noted the fact upon which it is based!

It should further be noted that any hypothesis once put forth by Prof. Zimmer straightway assumes a sacro-sanct character in his eyes. He persuades himself that what he imagines must have happened did happen. There is an amusing instance in this book. As is well known, Prof. Zimmer starts the Fenian saga from the exploits of a Kettill Find (of whom practically nothing is known save his death) in the early ninth century. The legendary Finn mac Cumhal has a son Oisín, and a grandson Orcar, names which may be explained, argues Prof. Zimmer, from the Norse Ansvins and Ansgar respectively—nay must be, for does not the hypothesis require it; and so in the present work we have presented to us (p. 212) "Caillil Finn nebet seinem Sohn Ansvims (Oswin) und Enkel Ansgar (Osgar)," without one word of warning that these hypothetical relations of Caillil's are pure figments of Prof. Zimmer's "Kombinationsgabe." But in this book the part du feu is but insignificant, and what remains is a splendid achievement of industry and acumen.

The book ends with an appendix claiming the authorship of the Hesperica famina for Gildas. One word by way of conclusion. Professor Zimmer makes large and fruitful use of the texts published by Mr. Phillimore in Y Cymrodor. These texts are the basis of the oldest authentic history of a large part of Britain; they have been edited with an impeccable mastery that beggars praise. As might have been expected, Mr. Phillimore's work has passed practically unheeded in this country; and it is left to the scholars of Germany (Prof. Zimmer) and France (M. Loth) to appreciate and utilise it.

ALFRED NUTT.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

Zimmer's Nennius is such an important book that I am rather concerned to see several small inaccuracies in Mr. Nutt's account of it. I enclose corrections—of which please make any use you think fit.

P. 132, col. 3, lines 10, 13, for Coemain read Coemgin; l. 33, for "later" read "earlier" [this is important]; l. 55 ff. read:

"a predecessor of the Harleian and Vatican recension . . . commenced with a quire of sixteen leaves, and how leaves 3 and 14 (the third pair) must have become detached, and must then have been misplaced and so have caused the disorder. . ."

[What Mr. Nutt has attributed to Zimmer has no meaning]; 133, col. 1. I doubt whether anyone who has not the book before him will understand the passage about Mailcun: but at least they can hardly take it wrong.

Prof. Zimmer has unfortunately had to do his work without accurate collations of some of the most important MSS., and in some respects his conclusions may have to be modified when Prof. Mommsen's materials have been worked up. But it remains a brilliant and sound piece of work, and places the subject on a new footing altogether. Hitherto, editors have merely disported themselves on the surface: though perhaps Petrie, if he had lived, might have done better than he did.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE OLDEST OGAM.

Oxford: August 9, 1893.

I have just been writing a letter to the Society of Antiquaries, and I venture to think that a brief abstract of it may prove interesting to the readers of the ACADEMY. It is on the subject of an Ogam inscribed stone, recently discovered at Silchester in the course of the excavations carried on there by Mr. W. H. St. John Hope and Mr. Fox on behalf of the Society of Antiquaries.

The stone has been taken to Burlington House, where I saw it yesterday. It was found in a pit or well 9 feet deep, made, as I am told, in the corridor of a house, in the heart of the ancient Calleva of the Atrebatæ. The material consists of a highly perishable sandstone, rudely carved into what seems to me a phallic form, but the upper part of the stone is gone. What remains of it may be roughly described as the frustum of a cone, below which the stone narrows greatly, and then widens out into a sort of pedestal. To do justice to this part of the subject, one must wait for the publication of the drawings prepared by the Society of Antiquaries; and it will suffice for my purpose to say that the inscription consists of two lines of Ogam, beginning about the greatest circumference of the frustum, and reading upwards into the broken top of the stone. The first line reads, as it now stands, thus:

Below this, and situated near the neck of the stone, are certain depressions, which at first sight seemed to me to form ; but, on scrutinising them, I found that only the first of them was cut or scratched at all, and that not in the same way as the rest of the Ogam. I conclude accordingly that it is due to accident; and it is further to be urged against this and the other depressions that they could only be at best about one-half the length of the other consonants of the group with which they would have to be ranged: that is to say, in case they proved to be writing at all. The legend here given ends with the first digit of a group on the right, the rest is gone.

The next line begins at a spot where a considerable patch of the frustum at its greatest circumference has been broken off by some accident or other. The line ends also in the breakage at the top of the stone; but what remains reads as follows:

In spite of the breakages, the formula of the epitaph and one proper name are fairly certain; and I complete the reading to the following extent:

The first line may have consisted of the name Ebicatos alone; it may have been followed by maqui with a parent's name, or else Ebicatos may have had an epithet. The second line must have ended with a proper name following mucoi; we have no means of discovering it, so let us represent it as x. The whole will then read in its shortest possible form somewhat as follows: (The Grave) of Evocatus son of Muco x. Here Muco x represents the clan-name; and, in a few Latin inscriptions, Muco is rendered by nepus (for nepos) and pronepus, as in Carataci Nepus (Exmoor), Nepus Barrovadi (Whithorn), and Pronepus Eternali Vedomavi (Glamorgan).

A word now as to the proper name Ebicatos: it is the genitive of Ebicatus, a compound to be analysed Ebi-catus. Here it is to be remarked that the thematic vowel, in this instance i, appears to have been obscurely pronounced. When Goidelic names are given in Latin, the thematic vowel is written o, but in Ogam a, as in CYNOTAMI, in Ogam Cunatami; compare SENOMAGLI and SENEMAGLI, also such names as EVOLengi and Gaulish Evotalis, where the element evo is the Gallo-Brythonic form of what we have as ebi in the Ebicatos of the Silchester Ogam. So that, judging from Ogams found in Wales and Ireland, one would have expected Ebacatos rather than Ebicatos. This equation, it will be seen, makes b stand for v—a fact due, no doubt, to a touch of the influence of late Latin, where b had the two values of b and v. This is not the only instance of the kind known to me in early Ogam. Lest, however, it should be thought that I am merely constructing a chain of frivolous conjectures, let me say that the name in question is already known to me as a genitive Ivacattos, namely, on one of the stones at Killeen Cormack, in co. Kildare. I was there in the year 1883, and I thought the reading was Ivacattos rather than Evacattos, the form which I should have expected. But I was not without doubt as to the i, and I copied the whole as follows:

Ovanos avi Ivacattos.

In this instance there is an accompanying legend in Latin, which seems to me to read IVVENE DRVVIDES, where nothing can be clearer than that IVVENE is to be somehow equated with Ovanos. With these and other matters of the same kind, which I cannot discuss in this letter, I hope to deal in detail in a volume on "The Celts and Pre-Celts of the British Isles."

To return to the Silchester stone, I abstain from explaining how the finding of an Ogam so far east as that spot, lends itself to the support of theories to which I have from time to time committed myself; but I may be allowed to remark that the form of the writing raises several interesting questions. Among other things, it is to be noticed that the scores, though not drawn on a very large scale, are comparatively deeply cut, and that, as the stone in its carved form offered no angle to write upon, the writer drew two grooves on the face of it, and cut his two lines of digits in connexion with them. This has never before been found in the case of an Ogam dating, let us say approximately, before the eighth or ninth century. On the other hand, the fact of the m being represented by a long score perpendicular to the groove, and not by an oblique one, is probably to be regarded as a mark of antiquity. The vowels consist of short lines drawn perpendicularly across the groove; but the spacing of them is irregular, which suggests to me that the writer was so used to carving Ogams that he had become careless. It is needless to add that antiquities discovered at places like Bath, Caerleon, or Caerwent, and even Chester, should be carefully searched for traces of Ogam writing.

Lastly, I wish cordially to thank Mr. Hope and Mr. Ireland for their courtesy and help to me when I called to see this most precious of all Ogmio monuments, also to thank Mr. Haverfield for early news of the find.

J. RHYS.

THE ALDINE BURNS.

London: August 14, 1893.

As a general rule, it is no doubt best not to answer one's critics; but in the notice of my edition of Burns's Poems in last week's ACADEMY, Mr. William Wallace has referred to some specific matters of fact, and challenges me to say more clearly what is meant by my allusions to them. On these points, then, I should be glad to say a few words.

As regards Mr. Wallace's remarks on the text, I fail to see why portions of the "Court of Equity" should not be printed because the whole cannot be given. Mr. Wallace says that surely I might have published the whole: I can only conclude that he has never read the piece in the original MS., or in the copies which have once or twice been privately printed. I venture to think, however, that the general scheme of the poem—in spite of considerable omissions—is of not a little biographical interest. I am obliged to Mr. Wallace for pointing out that "The Jolly Beggars" first appeared in its complete form in 1802, and not in 1801; but as that is the only slip in the notes which is pointed out, I think most readers will forgive the error, even if it be, as Mr. Wallace says, "a serious blunder." The general absence of mistakes is kindly attributed to the fact that I have usually followed Mr. Scott Douglas. I do not know how anyone wishing to write brief explanatory notes for a popular edition, rather than to make new conjectures or useless critical remarks, could do other than repeat much of what preceding editors had said; and as Mr. Scott Douglas had embodied in his edition all that was best and most accurate in the works of his predecessors, I naturally, while constantly consulting others, found his edition the best basis on which to work in preparing my own.

Coming to the events of Burns's life, I am sorry I cannot admit that what has been said about the sadder side of the poet's closing years is incorrect; there is, unfortunately, abundant contemporary evidence in support of all I have said. As regards the return home from a tavern at three o'clock, "benumbed and intoxicated," as to which Mr. Wallace says, "Was that in the morning or the afternoon?" Currie's words are, "Three o'clock in a very cold morning."

Mr. Wallace is very angry at the quotation of Burns's words about being "an old hawk at the sport." He assumes that the words relate to Miss Peggy Chalmers, to whom Burns made an offer of marriage, and asks: Did Burns mean by "sport" the "betraying of unsuspecting innocence?" I do not suppose anyone would suggest that the poet ever had any dishonourable intentions toward the lady whom Mr. Wallace has dragged forward; but there is no proof whatever that Burns was referring to her when he wrote the words, which occur in a letter to James Smith, of June 30, 1787. This is the version given by Currie, the only one we have:

"My heart no more glows with feverish raptures, I have no paradisaical evening interviews, stolen from the restless cares and prying inhabitants of this weary world. I have only. . . . This last is one of your distant acquaintances, has a fine figure, and elegant manners; and in the train of some great folks whom you know, has seen the politest quarters in Europe. I do like her a good deal; but what piques me is her conduct of the commencement of our acquaintance. I frequently visited her when I was in—and after passing regularly the intermediate degrees between the distant formal bow and the familiar grasp round the waist, I ventured, in my careless way, to talk of friendship in rather ambiguous terms; and after her return to—, I wrote to her in the same style. Miss, construing my words farther than even I intended, flew off in a tangent of female dignity and reserve, like a mounting lark in an April morning; and wrote me an answer which measured me out very completely, what an immense way I had to travel before I could reach the climate of her favour. But I am an old hawk at the sport, and wrote her such a cool, deliberate, prudent reply, as brought my bird from her aerial toppings, pop, down at my foot, like Corporal Trim's hat."

This letter is not a pleasant one, especially if, as Mr. Wallace believes, it refers to Miss Chalmers. It will be seen that Currie has left one sentence imperfect, and that Burns had already begun to grasp the lady round the waist before his "ambiguous" words frightened her. But he boasts that he managed to bring her down at his foot, being "an old hawk at the sport." How does this apply to Miss Chalmers, who declined Burns's offer of marriage, and would hardly have forgiven any other proposals? In any case, I do not think much wrong is done to Burns in applying his phrase to other events in his life which had a more disastrous termination. May I remind Mr. Wallace that Burns called himself "an old fox" when hiding from "the holy beagles" after Jean Armour's trouble?

Lastly, I am challenged to speak more clearly about Mary Campbell. In writing of her I carefully abstained from going beyond what was already published; and if Mr. Wallace thinks he will draw me into making accusations against the heroine of what Mr. Scott Douglas described as "Mariolatry," he is much mistaken. It is all very well to say I am "entitled to disturb or overthrow any tradition, however venerable, if it is based on falsehood or error"; but I have no wish to attack Mary Campbell, nor to be the butt of an army of enthusiasts. Mr. Wallace refers to a mysterious note in which I discuss whether there were two Mary Campbells, which he says is apparently irrelevant. May I suggest that he probably knows enough of the matter to be aware that the discussion is only apparently irrelevant? I shall here merely say that the existence of a second Mary Campbell, if it can be established, may be found of advantage by the admirers of "Highland Mary"; and that it was solely in her interest that I noted the possibility that the "Mary Campbell" who was living in the parish of Dundonald by 1783 was a different person.

I have said that it is difficult for anyone born in England to speak of Burns as a poet; it is clear that I might have added—as, indeed, Mr. Wallace suggests—that the impatience on the part of the poet's professed admirers at anything but thoroughgoing admiration makes it equally difficult to speak of his life. I console myself with the fact that the Scotch papers, almost without exception, have not taken any offence at what I have said, and that the Glasgow Herald, in particular, has spoken of the edition as "a most satisfactory one in every respect."

G. A. AITKEN.

Southport: August 18, 1893.

Mr. Aitken having frankly confessed the serious blunder he has made in connexion with "The Jolly Beggars," I have only a few words to say in reply to his letter.

1. It was because I have read the whole of "The Court of Equity" that I am of opinion that Mr. Aitken should either have followed the example of Mr. Scott Douglas in declining to give that remarkable example of Fescennine art, or should have given it entire. "The Court of Equity" is simply a very cleverly constructed mudpie: but take away the mud, and ———?

2. Can Mr. Aitken supply "abundant contemporary evidence"—as distinguished from posthumous gossip—that would be accepted in any court of justice in support of the statement that Burns came home from a tavern "benumbed and intoxicated"?

3. Mr. Aitken is altogether in error when he says that I "assume" or "believe" that Miss Peggy Chalmers is the heroine of the "old hawk" portion of Burns's letter to James Smith—as much in error as when he describes me as being "very angry," and as having "dragged forward" this lady. All I assume is that this heroine has been popularly believed to be Miss Peggy Chalmers. In proof of this I refer him the pages of his favourite, Scott Douglas, and to Mr. Stevenson's celebrated essay on Burns. Mr. Aitken misses my point. He declared that Burns boasted of being an old hawk at the sport of betraying unsuspecting innocence. I naturally referred to the letter in which the "old hawk" boast occurs. And what do I find? That Burns claimed to have brought to his feet a lady who has hitherto been generally understood to be Miss Peggy Chalmers. Is it not conceivable—nay, is it not morally certain—that this fearful and wonderful "sport" was neither more nor less than the ordinary legitimate, ante-nuptial ars amoris: that Burns, in his "old hawk" passage, simply tells how he made love to Miss Peggy Chalmers with a view to marriage? Mr. Aitken draws my attention to the fact that Burns had "begun to grasp the lady round the waist." "Grasping a lady round the waist" may be a very shocking thing; but I have something more than a suspicion that "abundant contemporary evidence" could be adduced in support of the belief that the practice is still resorted to by lovers before, and with a view to, marriage.

4. Mr. Aitken says I am mistaken if I think to draw him into making accusations against "Highland Mary." I do not seek to draw him into anything. I merely say that, if he has facts to adduce in opposition to the "white rose" theory of Burns's relationship to Mary Campbell, he should make direct statements, not throw out hints—such hints as that "the existence of a second Mary Campbell, if it can be established, may be found of advantage by the admirers of 'Highland Mary.'"

WILLIAM WALLACE.

RACIAL DWARFS IN THE ATLAS AND THE PYRENEES.

London: August 15, 1893.

It is amusing to note the great anxiety which Mr. Stuart Glennie evinces to destroy my credibility. For that purpose the ACADEMY did not suffice as a medium for adequately circulating his acrimonious criticism, and he has also utilised Nature. I therefore trust he will not further increase ("at least to any great extent") the number of the papers which he enlightens as to myself.

As he no doubt has a profound respect for Mr. Budgett Meakin, who has been my ablest and most persistent critic, I quote the following extracts from his paper, the Morocco Times of January 26, 1893.

"THE ATLAS DWARFS."

"An English resident, speaking the language, who has just come from the foot of the Greater Atlas, gives us important and valuable information about the stunted mountaineers who inhabit certain portions of that range hitherto unvisited by Europeans. . . . Messrs. W. B. Harris and Cunningham Graham have also, without reaching the limits of our present informant, met with traces of the same most interesting people. [He then tries to account for their small size by a theory new to science, that living up in the mountains had dwarfed big Berbers into pygmies a good deal smaller than Andaman islanders! Mr. Cunningham Graham writes to me he believes they are racial; and, as I have stated, Schweinfurth Pasha thinks they are merely ordinary African dwarfs.] They may yet prove to be connected with Mr. Haliburton's little friends of the Dra Valley, some hundreds of miles away on the other side of the Atlas chain.

"The traveller whose story we have to tell was within two hours of the holy shrine of Mulai Ibrahim, the patron saint of Southern Morocco, a shrine where it is believed by the credulous Moors that many miracles are daily wrought on the bodies of the sick and ailing. . . . Being in the neighbourhood of this celebrated saint's tomb, our friend naturally made inquiries from the natives around, and requested them to guide him to the place. This he found them unwilling to do, notwithstanding tempting offers, the Kaid of the district with his soldiers being on the alert to prevent any further advance into the mountains. Checked thus, he made other inquiries, and found the facts elicited harmonious, although coming from widely different and independent sources. One of the facts most interesting to him was that a number of small men and women were constantly to be seen in and about the saint's tomb, which they visited from a distance of one, two, or even more, days' journey from the other side of the mountains. When he questioned the truth of this, many natives around him swore by Allah that they had seen them with their very eyes. Our informant, on asking the reason why, if there were such people, they were never to be seen on the plains, and why the rest of the world was ignorant of their existence, was promptly told that a fine of 100 dollars was imposed upon every unfortunate dwarf who was caught out of his recognised district. . . . This naturally aroused his curiosity to a high pitch; and upon his servant—a trustworthy and intelligent Moor, who speaks English and is well known to us personally—volunteering to go and spy out the land in company with one of the Kaid's servants, arrangements were made that the two should start early next morning. It was about noon next day when these two spies returned. They brought with them some of the sacred dust from the tomb of Mulai Ibrahim, and also the following wonderful story.

"They reached the tomb after crossing the line of mountains just above their employer's camp, and a level plateau on the other side, situated about half-way up the grand and majestic mountain at the back. . . . They had also seen there little men dressed in ordinary mountaineer garb, with women small and pretty, handsomely dressed and decked out with jewelry and other ornaments. These they afterwards saw bathing together promiscuously in the sacred stream à la nature. They brought back with them a string with a knot tied in it, by which they had taken the height of one of these interesting little men, which, on being measured, proved to be about 4 feet 6 inches in length. The height and build of the women were declared to be proportionately smaller and lighter."

Mr. Meakin kindly sent the Moor to me, and I found the interview an interesting one.

Mr. Harris, in December last, met at Amzmiz with a very remarkable and exceptional instance of little rebel tribesmen, whose ancestors had probably inhabited that district before the arrival of the Arabs, and had been for more than a thousand years in contact with Islam. Most probably a majority of them are Moslems. Some of them wore beards as Moorish Moslems do. Mr. Harris, who found them hated and dreaded by the Moors, came to the conclusion that he had before him a type of the rest of the dwarf tribes in Morocco, though nearly all of the latter live in very isolated and secluded localities, where they are safe from Moslem influences. In 1890-91 a large mass of evidence was given by natives of Southern Morocco, that these dwarfs generally are not Moslems, and do not go to Mecca; but that they worship Didoo Isiri, a statement incidentally confirmed last spring by my finding at Cairo two Darfur dwarfs, who seemed to be horrified at my mentioning the awful name of Didoo, just as the Irish and Welsh and some Spanish peasants shudder when they hear any one pronounce the name "fairy."

Mr. Harris, in a letter to the London Times of September 14, 1891, said of a native of Akka, "He could not in any way explain the extraordinary reticence of the Moors in speaking of them" (the dwarfs).

In his letter of January 10, 1893, speaking of the mass of statements of natives on these points (which in no way affected the main question at issue, as to the existence of tribes of dwarfs in the Atlas), Mr. Harris says: "Although perhaps our visit to the Atlas may tend to prove the existence of small people, it will certainly have a damping effect on the many romances woven up with their existence." I felt on reading this that, if it should meet the eyes of my critics, they would not hesitate to apply the word "romances" to my statements; but Mr. Harris protested against such an idea, and assured me that he did not think of me when he wrote the sentence.

Mr. Harris's closing remarks clearly show what he thinks of my labours and myself, and Mr. Stuart Glennie therefore takes care not to quote them.

"Having now clearly shown that tribes of abnormally small stature inhabit the upper peaks of the Atlas, there yet remains to be proved the question of the pygmies of Wad Dra, and many most interesting subjects 'pertaining to their existence. The fact that Mr. Haliburton's statement of the existence of a small race in the Atlas Mountains met at the time with much denial and a considerable amount of scoffing, and has now been shown to be true, renders it not improbable that in time the rest of his researches into the questions of Southern Morocco may equally be confirmed." [The italics are my own].

SCIENCE.

The Ancient Manuscript of the Yasna with its Pahlavi Translation (A.D. 1323), generally quoted as J² and now in the possession of the Bodleian Library. Reproduced in Facsimile, and edited, with an Introductory Note, by L. H. Mills, D.D. (Henry Frowde.)

By the publication of this collotype facsimile of the oldest known MS. of the Yasna with Pahlavi, the University of Oxford enables any public library to place in the hands of its readers a copy of that MS. which, for all conceivable scientific purposes, is as useful as the original, and far more easily handled. The Clarendon Press is to be heartily congratulated upon the success with which it has reproduced all the peculiarities of the original, together with the traces of the vicissitudes to which it has been exposed during its long life of 570 years. A few incidents in this life are mentioned by Dr. Mills in his Introductory Note. He tells us how the MS. was written at Cambay, and completed on January 26, 1323, by a copyist of many other MSS., some of which are still extant. Its history for the next 390 years is still unknown; but before 1720 it was brought from Broach to Naosari by the learned Dastūr Jāmāsp Asā who died in 1753, aged 56, leaving, it is said, a thousand Oriental MSS. to be divided among his descendants. Four generations later, about 1855, it was found among a heap of other books by Dastūr Jāmāsp Minocheherji, one of his descendants, who showed it to Haug in 1863 and kindly lent it to me for collation in 1876. Subsequently it was sent to Tübingen to assist Prof. Geldner in his new edition of the Avesta Texts, and to Dr. Mills at Oxford to assist him in his work on the Gāthas. It was finally presented to the University in 1889, and the facsimile has been prepared partly for the purpose of supplying the donor of the MS. with accurate copies of his valuable present.

There has been some difficulty in ascertaining the exact date of the original MS., owing to a complicated error in its colophon. The last page of the MS. begins with a liturgical direction occupying its first line, and intimating that the preceding formula, overleaf, is to be recited twice. Its second line is another liturgical direction, which may be translated as follows:—"The day, just as the dedication of the ceremony happens to be, is stated; may it be with the will of the sacred beings." The next four lines contain the date and the name of the copyist; but the date is ambiguous, being merely "Vohūman month Fravardin year 692 of Yazdakard," the word "day" having been omitted. After some interval the same copyist added nine lines more, completing the page, with a paler ink, in which he repeats the year and his name, and mentions the name of the person for whom he had written the MS., invoking blessings upon him and upon his own father. At the same time he evidently noticed the omission in his former colophon, as he interlined the word yōm "day," with the same pale ink, after the name Fravardin. So, according to his own emendation, he completed his MS. in the Vohūman month, on the Fravardin day, A.Y. 692, which would have been December 9, 1323; and this was the date I accepted in 1877, when stating, in the second edition of Haug's Essays, that this MS. was dated twenty-two days later than its sister K², whose date corresponds with November 17, 1323. But, as Dr. Mills has explained, there seems now little doubt that the copyist interlined the word "day" in the wrong place, and thus complicated his first error by making another.

If the word "day" had been put before the name Vohūman, the date would have been written in the usual order of day, month, and year, which is adopted in fifty-four colophons out of fifty-nine that I have examined, the remaining five being more or less irregular; but not one of them has the date written in the order of month, day, and year, as suggested by the emendation of this copyist. Again, the liturgical direction in the second line occurs also in K², being followed, but not preceded, by the word "day," which shows that the word is superfluous in the second, but ought to begin the third line in J². The explanation of this complicated error is that the copyist was beginning to write his colophon in the second line, when he discovered that he was omitting the final rubric of the liturgy. Having already written the word "day," he added the rubric, intending to carry that word down into the third line, but he forgot to make the necessary mark for that purpose. Months afterwards, when he added the last nine lines, he noticed that the word "day" was missing in the date, and then inserted it hurriedly in the wrong place. This theory also removes a third difficulty, because it allows the reasonable time of 9 months and 25 days for the writing of K², instead of only 22 days for the writing of J². To set against this removal of difficulties we have, of course, to assume that the copyist wrote his final colophon in a hurry and just before giving up possession of his MS., so that he had no opportunity of discovering the error of his emendation.

With regard to the time that elapsed between the completion of the MS. and the writing of the second colophon, we may reasonably guess that it was at least ten months, because the last five lines of the second colophon occur also, in pale ink, in the last Pahlavi colophon of K², which MS. was completed nearly ten months later than J². Whether the next folio of J², now lost, contained any information regarding the MS. from which J² was copied is certainly doubtful, as it would be unusual to write any colophon of an earlier MS. after that of the later copyist.

Pahlavi scholars, when they turn over the folios of this facsimile, should thankfully remember that it is to a suggestion made by Dr. Mills to the former owner of the original MS. that they owe their opportunity of becoming so intimately acquainted with its appearance and details. Perhaps they may feel inclined to join me in asking when the time will come for all public libraries to learn that it is their duty, not only to take care of their MSS., but also to provide other libraries with facsimiles of such as are unique, or highly important, on some fair and settled system of exchange.

THE SCIENCE MUSEUMS AT CAMBRIDGE.

WE quote from the twenty-seventh annual report of the Museums and Lecture Rooms Syndicate the following details of additions made during the past year.

To the Herbarium have been added:—plants collected in Samoa, Fiji, New Britain, Duke of York's Island, and New Zealand, by Baron A. von Hügel; plants from Corsica and a series illustrating vascular cryptograms, collected by the late Dr. Churchill Babington; plants collected in Tropical Africa by Mr. H. H. Johnston; and British Rubi and plants from Alpine Europe, collected by the late Prof. Hort.

In the department of Invertebrate Zoology, a prominent place must be given to Prof. D'Arcy W. Thompson's donation of Crustacea, Pycnogonida, &c., from Davis Straits. The large size which is obtained by some of these Arctic forms renders them particularly valuable for exhibition. Messrs. J. J. Lister and E. A. Shipley have presented a collection of animals dredged in the Clyde area, the most interesting of which is a fine specimen of Neomenia carinata. This, with specimens of Chaetoderma nitidulum presented by Prof. Leche, of Stockholm, fills an important gap in the series of Mollusca.

A collection of insects in tubes of spirit has been commenced, with the object of illustrating metamorphosis. This collection already amounts to several hundred tubes. It is, however, difficult to obtain specimens to display the various stages of growth and metamorphosis; and Mr. D. Sharp (the curator in zoology) will be very much obliged to any one who will help to the extent of even a single species. He particularly wants specimens to illustrate the metamorphosis of the various orders and families of insects. The most suitable forms for the purpose are insects of large size, such as are found abundantly in many tropical countries.

In the department of Vertebrate Zoology, special mention is made of a collection of deep sea fishes, &c., dredged by H.M.S. Investigator, in the Bay of Bengal, presented by Mr. A. Alcock, naturalist to the survey, and consisting largely of species newly described by him. This is the second collection he sent, the first having been unfortunately lost at sea.

The collection of Mammalia has been enriched by a valuable series of post-glacial bones from Barrington, Cambs. The following have been selected for exhibition:—portions of two skulls of Bison priscus, portions of two lower jaws of Hippopotamus amphibius (including a young jaw with milk teeth), a lower jaw of Elephas antiquus, antlers of Cervus megaceros, and part of the jaw of Felis spelaea.

The chief event of the year, as regards the Bird Museum, was the presentation by Mrs. W. B. Farr of the magnificent collection of skins of Indian birds, formed by her late husband, controller of railway accounts in Bengal. This consists of more than 1300 specimens, representing about 322 species, of which no fewer than 121 species were previously unrepresented in the University Museum: among them the extremely rare Central Asiatic bird (Ibidorhynchus struthersi), the tiny hawk (Hierax entolmos), and Ithaginis cruentus. The whole collection of birds in the museum now consists of about 21,500 specimens, representing 5700 species: that is, about half the number of species at present known. The Farr collection further contains a considerable number of well-preserved nests with eggs, some of which have been placed in a show-case.

Dr. H. Gadov, the Strickland curator, further reports that Mr. Theodore Sauzier, on behalf of the Government of Mauritius, has entrusted him with the description of an interesting collection of fossil reptiles, chiefly large terrestrial tortoises obtained in that island, and that nearly all the types and many duplicates have been presented to the museum. The same gentleman, last year, presented a collection of fossil bones of birds from Mauritius.

In the department of Human Anatomy, the most noteworthy addition to the museum collection during the past year has been the splendid series of Egyptian skulls obtained through the kind offices of Dr. Budge. This raises the number of Egyptian skulls to about 500, and affords a solid basis for the determination of some vexed questions concerning the affinities of the Egyptian race. Another remarkable addition is the skull of a Tasmanian, which has been presented by Mr. J. Bonwick. As this race is extinct, the difficulty of obtaining any of their crania is very great; and as they have been supposed by Dr. E. B. Tylor to have been in some sort the last representatives of palaeolithic man, they are as interesting as they are rare. Among other additions recorded are two skulls from Nagyr, presented by Mr. Conway; six skulls from different parts of the Austro-Hungarian Empire; and twenty-six skulls from excavations in the counties around Cambridge. The cranial collection is now the second largest in Great Britain; and, as the ethnological value of such a series depends directly upon the number of comparable specimens, Prof. A. Macalister appeals to members of the university who are scattered over the world to furnish him with additional specimens, so that he may boast of the most perfectly-equipped school of physical anthropology in Great Britain.

As regards the Pathological Laboratory, Prof. C. S. Ray reports that one of the chief new departures at present being organised is the preparation of such protective vaccines as have been hitherto found of use against infective diseases (excluding smallpox) of man and the lower animals, and which cannot be safely produced except in such a laboratory as this. In view of the probable spread of Asiatic cholera on the Continent this summer, a commencement has been made with the preparation and employment of Haffkine's vaccine, the mode of preparing which was demonstrated by Dr. Haffkine himself at Cambridge during the Lent term.

In Geology, Mr. Marr and Mr. Harker have been engaged during their vacations on investigations into the petrography and palaeontology of the North of England, and have devoted much time to the determination of the specimens obtained and their arrangement in the museum. Dr. Traquair has kindly gone through the collection of fishes, which has recently been largely added to, and has determined many of the genera and species hitherto unnamed in the museum. Mr. Woods has spent much time in mounting and cataloguing the additions to the type fossils, the most important of which are:—carboniferous plants, Devonian Mollusca, Palaeozoic Phyllopora, and Jurassic Gasteropoda. He has also begun the revision and the preparation of a new catalogue of the students' series of fossils, towards which the necessity of keeping a larger collection of duplicates is strongly felt. Mr. Seward has given much time to naming and making a catalogue of the sections of fossil plants prepared by the late E. W. Binney. Mr. Reynolds has assisted in determining and drawing up a list of the Pleistocene Mammalia of the district. The carboniferous fossils have been undergoing complete revision and re-arrangement; and the catalogue of the whole collection, which numbers several thousand specimens, will be finished next term.

In Mineralogy the number of specimens added to the collection was very small. Of these, some interesting galena crystals with pyrrargyrite from Klausthal, anglesite from Sardinia, and talc were the most important.

In Chemistry, Prof. Liveing regrets that he is unable, for want of funds, to develop the teaching of metallurgical chemistry, and this the more because it is a subject of great importance in connexion with engineering. He records, however, the acquisition of a splendid specimen of tin-stone, presented by Sir C. Clementi Smith, Governor of the Straits Settlements.

As to Mechanism and Applied Mechanics, apart from subscriptions amounting to £4600 towards the development of the laboratory, several valuable gifts of apparatus have been received. Mr. Alexander Siemens has presented an alternate-current dynamo; the Hon. C. A. Parsons a small steam turbine and dynamo attached; Canon Habbersty a hand planing machine for metal; Mr. A. A. Common a Wheatstone bridge and other electrical apparatus; and Prof. Nicolson, of McGill College (formerly demonstrator), an instrument of his own design for investigating the action of cutting tools. The directors of Whitworth & Co. have intimated their intention of presenting a Whitworth measuring machine and a set of standards of length.

Finally, it must be observed that almost every one of the professors animadvert upon the inadequacy of their class-rooms and material appliances, caused by the impoverished condition of the university chest.

SCIENCE NOTES.

PROF. HUXLEY has been elected president of the Palaeontographical Society, in succession to the late Sir Richard Owen.

LAST week's number of Nature contains some account of the arrangements for the meeting of the British Association, to be held next month at Nottingham. Mr. R. T. Glazebrook has been appointed president of Section A in the place of Prof. Clifton, who is unable to be present owing to serious family trouble. In Section D, Mr. J. J. H. Teall has chosen as the subject of his presidential address, "The Doctrine of Uniformitarianism as illustrated by recent Petrographical Research." Sections C and D will jointly discuss "Fossil and Recent Coral Reefs," both in respect to their origin and in relation to the part which corals have played in the formation of the earth's crust. Sections C and E will also hold a joint meeting for considering the mutual relations of geology and geography. Mr. Henry Seebohm, as president of Section E, proposes to treat in his address of the Polar basin, laying stress on some generally forgotten facts, and summarising our knowledge of the margin of the Arctic Sea. Mr. W. M. Conway will give an account of his mountaineering experiences in the Karakorum range. In Section F, the subject of Prof. Nicholson's presidential address will be, "The Reaction in favour of the Classical Political Economy." In Section H, of which Dr. H. R. Munro is president, Dr. Hans Hildebrand will contribute a paper on "Anglo-Saxon Remains and the Coeval Remains in Scandinavia," opening a discussion on the distinguishing characteristics of Celtic, Anglo-Saxon, and Scandinavian remains in this country; and Mr. Arthur Bulleid will present a report on the prehistoric lake or marsh village recently discovered by him near Glastonbury.

THE forty-second meeting of the American Association for the advancement of Science was to be held this month (August), at Madison, Wisconsin, under the presidency of Mr. William Harkness.

THE collection of stapelias, made by the late Thomas Westcombe, of Worcester, has been presented to the Royal Gardens at Kew, together with a number of notes, descriptions, and coloured drawings.

THE fifty-fourth anniversary meeting of the Botanic Society was held on August 9 at the gardens, Regent's-park, Mr. Charles Brinsley Marlay in the chair. The Duke of Teck was re-elected president and Mr. H. Lindsay Antrobus treasurer for the ensuing year. From the annual report it appeared that the number of new fellows elected was nearly the same as last year, and the various exhibitions and fêtes had been successfully carried out, the exhibits, both in number and quality, being above the average. The evening fête had been the largest hitherto held. The scientific work of the society had suffered no diminution. Nearly 700 students of science, art, and medicine had received free orders of admission of from one to three months during the year, and the facilities offered to schools, classes, and scientific societies generally had been largely taken advantage of. Among new clients in this branch were many of the students studying botany in the London board schools. The special plants successfully cultivated for the first time this year include the mangroves, and an ant habitation plant (myrmicodes), within whose spiny, tuberous roots the common red ants of the gardens have made themselves quite at home.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

PROF. RICHARD WÜLKER, of Leipzig, has had a photograph taken of all the eighty-six leaves of the Anglo-Saxon codex, known from its present home as the Vercelli Book, which, besides some half-dozen homilies, contains the two long poems of "Andreas" and "Elene." Provided that one hundred subscribers of £1 each come forward before the end of the year, the publishing house of Veit & Co., of Leipzig, undertake to issue a facsimile by the phototype process, half the size of the original, but exceedingly clear, as shown by a specimen page. Putting aside German scholars, surely there must be a sufficient number of Englishmen, in this country and in America, interested to possess a faithful reproduction of the only Anglo-Saxon MS. of importance which happens to be in continental hands.

MR. EDWARD W. BOWEN has sent us a copy of the dissertation submitted by him for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at Johns Hopkins University. It is a pamphlet of seventy-eight pages containing an exhaustive historical study of the e vowel in accented syllables from Anglo-Saxon to modern-spoken English (Baltimore: Murphy). We quote from the Introduction:

"After brief reference to the origin of the e vowel in the Germanic languages, its sources and development in Anglo-Saxon are investigated. Copious examples are given, with their cognates in Old High German, Old Saxon, Old Norse, and Gothic. The West-Saxon dialect, as containing most of the literature of the early period of the language, receives special attention. But for the sake of completeness, the e-sound in the Kentish, Mercian, and Northumbrian dialects is investigated, so far as they exhibit variations from the West-Saxon norm.

"The section on Anglo-Saxon is not limited to the symbol e, but includes also the symbol æ, and the diphthongs ea and eo; for all these vowels and diphthongs yield, in Middle English, long e. So, also the vowel a and the diphthongs ai and ei are considered in the section dealing with Modern English, because these symbols came at one time in the modern period to have the value of the vowel e.

"The treatment of the middle English period is in a manner similar to that of the Anglo-Saxon. A representative text of each of the dialects is selected, and made the basis of investigation with regard to the e-sound. The Ormulum, as representing the East-Midland dialect, and being more in the line of the subsequent development of the language, is considered at length. After an examination of the several Middle English dialects, attention is drawn to late Middle English, especially to the dialect that gave rise to standard English, as represented in the Chaucerian texts and in public documents. In this section, it is shown how there were two distinct long e's, and what their respective sources in Anglo-Saxon were; and how the domain of long e in Middle English was extended from other sources than English.

"A brief review of the transitional period is given, as forming a connecting link between Middle and Modern English; and then the modern period is considered. Here it is shown what the two e sounds (open and close) of Middle English developed into during the two centuries of the modern period; what other vowels and diphthongs, as a and ai, came to have the value of long e; and further, how even these latter came to have another sound than the pure e sound. It appears, therefore, that the pure phonetic e sound (open and close), from being quite a common sound in Anglo-Saxon and far more common in Middle English, came to be less common in early Modern English, and to be of very rare occurrence in living English of the present day."

At the conclusion, Mr. Bowen summarises the results of his historical study in fifteen propositions, for which we regret that we have no space.

FINE ART.

ART BOOKS.

MR. HENRY WALLIS must not be surprised if his latest work is regarded as being part of a series; but as a matter of fact, it is quite distinct from those beautifully illustrated and learned commentaries on Persian and allied Ceramics which have already associated his name so closely and honorably with these most interesting and beautiful wares. The title of his fresh publication is Typical Examples of Persian and Oriental Ceramic Art; and it will consist of fifty chromo-lithographic plates of vases, &c., "distinguished for their artistic excellence and serving as authentic documents" in the history of his favourite subject. The text will be further illustrated by engravings, and will be published in parts, each of which will contain two chromo-lithographs. The issue is limited to two hundred and fifty copies. Samples of the work in the shape of the first two parts have already been published, and make assurance doubly sure that it will be of great value from both the artistic and the historical points of view. In the first part, we have two rich lusted bottles of the time of Shah Abbas, belonging to Mr. F. Du Cane Godman, and Mr. Henry Wallis. In the second we go back to the thirteenth century, which is represented by a very fine lusted vase with female figures in panels, which belongs to Mr. C. A. Dana, of New York. A plainer vase from the South Kensington Museum is the subject of the other plate in the second part. The plates have been admirably executed by Mr. Samuel J. Hodson. The illustrations in the text are, as usual, from drawings by Mr. Wallis, whose publishers are Messrs. Lawrence & Bullen. The third and fourth parts of the work will contain representations of a Damascus Jug and a Rhodian Candlestick, both belonging to Dr. Drury Fortnum, who will write the accompanying text, and of a Damascus Jug belonging to Sir Frederic Leighton. We are glad to see that the second part of Mr. Wallis's work on the collection of Mr. Godman is also in preparation. It will deal with the thirteenth century tiles.

THE Rev. Henry Housman has published an interesting pamphlet of Notes on the Willett collection of pottery in the Brighton Museum, the substance of which originally appeared in a local newspaper. The author has developed in detail the principle which Mr. Willett avowed in forming his collection—that the history of a country may be traced in its homely pottery. He has, therefore, followed the order of the catalogue, dealing separately with the cases representative of loyalty, hero-worship, costume, sport, religion, literature, &c. He describes many of the specimens, quotes the inscriptions on them, and explains the circumstances under which they were made. The earliest seems to be an earthenware scone from Hampton Court, with the initials of Queen Elizabeth; the latest, a representation of the Tichborne romance. A large cup gives a coloured picture of the cricket-match played at Lord's in June, 1790, between the elevens of Lord Winchelsea and Lord Darnley; the players are using curved clubs, and the wicket has only two stumps. Mr. Housman has evidently taken pains to identify the figures and legends, which makes it the more surprising that he should ask: "Who knows or cares anything about 'Wenman and Dashwood,' with their mottoes 'Old Interest for ever, no double return.'" This contest was the most memorable one in the political history of Oxfordshire. Lord Wenman and Sir James Dashwood stood for the county in the Court or Old Interest at the general election of 1754, when all four candidates were returned by the sheriff.

DISCOVERY OF EXTENSIVE EVIDENCES OF ROMAN OCCUPATION IN BERKS.

WE quote from the Times the following letter, written by Mr. Walter Money, the well-known antiquary of Newbury:

"Mr. Hewett, of North Field Farm, Long Wittenham, a village four miles south-east from Abingdon, having very kindly acquainted me with the discovery of some ancient pottery on his farm, I have made an inspection of the site, and acquired ocular proof of the existence of unquestionable signs of Roman occupation, extending over an area of at least sixty acres.

"The site, or what appears to be that, of an extensive Roman town or station occupies a beautiful situation on the south bank of the Thames, a short distance north-west by west of the well-known Wittenham Clump, and almost immediately opposite Dorchester, the Roman 'Durocina,' on the Oxfordshire side of the river, and not far from the Anglo-Saxon cemetery explored with such interesting results by the late Mr. J. Y. Akerman some years ago.

"It was due to the abnormal dry season which has prevailed that Mr. Hewett's attention was arrested by the increased fertility of the crops in certain parts of the field, which in outline indicate in a most distinct manner a block plan of supposed foundations of buildings and boundaries of roads, of such a vast extent and variety of form as to be at first sight almost bewildering.

"Thinking he would test the nature of these indications, Mr. Hewett sank a small shaft in the ground at what he, with singular intuitive perception, thought a favourable spot, and had the good fortune to find that the opening was exactly over the crown of a Roman well, which was reached at a depth of about eight feet. It was in almost a perfect state of preservation, the oak curb being still in its place, and also the coarse rough blocks of Clifton rock-stone with which the sides are lined. From the sandy deposit below the water Mr. Hewett took out four whole Roman vases or ampullae, of various sizes, and some of them of very elegant workmanship. A small vessel of red ware was also found that had probably been used for some article of a Roman lady's toilet. The base of a Samian bowl, with the potter's mark, 'AVITVS. F.' was also found in the superincumbent soil, besides a large variety of fragmentary Roman pottery, several pieces of which exhibit high artistic merit. Some of these pieces are of blue-grey colour, and are apparently made from a band of clay which is found in the bed of the old river, where the stream has been diverted between this spot and Appleford.

"In another part of the field a large quantity of white substance, which Dr. Voelcker, the eminent professor of chemistry, who happened to be in the neighbourhood, pronounced to be lime, was met with, between layers of sharp grit and sand. From this hole over 100 bushels were taken out in one day.

"No traces of brick or stone foundations have been brought to light in sinking the one or two small trial holes, although there are innumerable pieces of pottery, charcoal, fused iron, human and animal bones, with other articles usually associated with Roman occupation, strewed over the surface of the ground; many coins of this period have also been turned up by the plough from time to time, and a considerable number from this locality are now in the possession of a local collector.

"The evidence derived from the discovery of the Roman well and pottery supplies a practical corroboration of the view that this is the site of a Roman station of some importance, anciently directly connected with Dorchester by a fordway over the Thames, and at another point with the former important landing-place at Burcote, in which direction a broad roadway can be traced from a principal 'street' traversing the field from east to west.

"Near the centre of the field the outlines of a very large building of basilican form can be discerned, and also of circular structures of some kind, which we may venture to assume stood on this spot; and it is just possible that if these erections were constructed of 'wattle and dab,' the local materials, the decomposed dibris may have produced the superior fertility to which we are indebted for the production of the singular evidences of occupation to which allusion has been made.

"This discovery is of no ordinary archaeological interest, and is so fruitful in questions for future solution that it would be unsafe to hazard any further speculation, until we are better acquainted with the ground-plan defined so distinctly by the waving corn, which occupies a considerable portion of the field at the present time.

"Meanwhile Mr. Hewett has employed a professional surveyor to make a plan of the ground, in order that, after harvest, we may be enabled to learn something more as to the character of these supposed vestiges of the early conquerors of Britain, who undoubtedly had an extensive settlement in this locality."

CORRESPONDENCE.

A NEW ROMAN INSCRIPTION AT LANCHESTER.

Ch. Ch., Oxford: August 9, 1893.

The following inscription was recently found at the Roman station of Lanchester, near Durham, about 200 yards north of the fort. I have to thank Dr. Hooppell for a photograph. The altar is about 5 feet high by 2 feet wide; the letters are 2½ in. high in the first two lines, 2½-2½ in. in the lower lines.

MANGABI
ET N
. . . . AVGNPR
SAL.VEX.SVEBO
RVM.LONGOR.VO
TVMSOLVRVNTM

Deae Garmangabi et N(uminibus) [Emperor's name erased] Aug(usti) n(ostri), pr(o) sal(ute) vex(illationis) Sueborum Lon. Gor(dianorum) votum solverunt m(eritis) or m(erito).

The lettering and various details suggest the first half or middle of the third century as the date of this inscription. The erased emperor is apparently Gordian. Erasures of his name are all but unknown; but the Gor. below seems to prove this case. The goddess appears to be new; one may possibly compare the Rhenish dedication, Deae Idban. gabie (Ihm, Bonner Jahrb., lxxxi. 28). The Suebi are also rarely found in the Roman army, at least under this name; they have no place, except as laeti, even among the many German elements of the army under Diocletian and the Constantines. Possibly the name was too vague for ordinary use. The punctuation of the next six letters has been doubted; on the photograph I read LON.GOR. Obviously, Lon. refers to the Roman name of Lanchester, and Gor. stands for Gordianorum; so that the title of the troop would be like that of the Cuneus Frisionum Aballavensium Philippianorum (Eph. Epigr. iv., p. 130), and similar regiments of this and later date. We may well believe that the name of the place began with Lon, though we must sadly admit that we are not thereby justified in confidently identifying it with the Longovicium of the Notitia, to which Lancaster has still a claim.

It is a curious coincidence that one tribe of the Suebi were the Longobardi, according to some ancient writers.

F. HAVERFIELD.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. JOHN MURRAY has in the press a new edition of his Handbook to Rome, brought thoroughly up to date and in great measure re-written. The sculpture galleries are described by Dr. A. S. Murray, of the British Museum; and the account of the picture galleries has been revised by Sir A. H. Layard.

The forty-seventh annual meeting of the Cambrian Archaeological Association will be held at Oswestry, next week, under the presidency of Mr. Stanley Leighton. Among the places to be visited are Chirk Castle, the churches of Pennant Melangell and Llanhraiadar-yn-Mochnant, the hut circles of Craig Rhiwarth, the stone circle of Cerrig-y-beddau, Valle Crucis Abbey, the so-called pillar of Eliseig (on which the inscription is no longer legible), and Castell Dinas Brân. Papers are to be read on Oswestry Castle and Llansilin Church. The local committee have printed a programme, with abundance of illustrations, and notes by Mr. Wilfred Cripps on the church and corporation plate that will be exhibited.

THE prizes selected this year for the Art Union of London will be on view throughout next week at the gallery of the society, 112, Strand. The picture chosen by the winner of the prize of one hundred guineas is Mr. J. T. Nettle's "A Big Drink," one of the two animal pieces by this artist exhibited at the recent Academy. The print given to every subscriber this year is after Sir John Millais' diploma picture; next year it will be an etching by Mr. Macbeth, after Mr. H. W. B. Davis's "Summer Time."

MEDALS have been awarded by the jury selected to pass opinion upon the paintings exhibited at the Chicago World's Fair to the following British artists: For oil paintings—Mr. Alma Tadema, Mr. George Boughton, Mr. Frank Bramley, Mr. Fred. Brown, Lady Butler, Mr. Alfred East, Mr. Melton Fisher, Mr. Stanhope Forbes, Mr. Goodall, Mr. Alfred Grey, Prof. H. Herkomer, Mr. Colin Hunter, Mr. H. Lathangue, Sir Frederic Leighton, Mr. W. Logsdail, Mr. Monat Loudan, Mr. Seymour Lucas, Sir John Millais, Miss Clara Montalba, Mr. Henry Moore, Mr. David Murray, Mr. A. Peppercorn, Mr. John Reid, Mr. Solomon J. Solomon, Mr. Adrian Stokes, Mr. Edward Stott, Mrs. Annie Swynnerton, Mr. Chevallier Tayler, Mr. William Titcomb, Mr. G. Weatherbec, Miss Wood, Mr. W. Wyllie, and Mr. Charles Wyllie. For water-colours—Mr. H. Coutts, Mr. Birket Foster, Miss Kate Greenaway, Sir John Gilbert, Mr. W. Hatherell, Mr. Henry Henshall, Mr. Henry Hine, Mr. Andrew Gow, Mr. Walter Langley, Sir James Linton, Mr. Henry Moore, Mr. Lionel Smythe, and Mr. F. Walton.

M. JOUBIN, a former member of the French School at Athens, and now curator of the museum at Constantinople, has been appointed to conduct excavations on the site of Clazomenae, in Ionia.

THE August number of the Geographical Journal (Edward Stanford) contains a paper by Mr. J. Theodore Bent, containing the first fruits of his recent archaeological visit to Abyssinia. Starting from Zula, the ancient Adulis, on the Red Sea, about twenty miles south of Massawa, he followed the old trade-route to Axum. On the way, he identified the sites of Koloe and Ava, which are mentioned by the Greek geographers. At Koloe, there are only ruins of the Greek period; but at Ava (now Yeha) Mr. Bent was fortunate enough to discover seven Himyaritic inscriptions of the best period of Sabaeen work, which have been sent for decipherment to Prof. D. H. Müller, of Vienna. He also brought back impressions of three Himyaritic inscriptions at Axum, of later date. The architectural character of the ruins at the two places is similar, though here again Ava is the earlier. At both is found the rude stone monument of Arabia (the bethel or bathle of the Phoenicians) in all its stages, from the unhewn rock to the highly-decorated monolith, leading up by numerous stories to the emblematic home of the great sun-god. At the base of the monoliths are altars, which were evidently used for sacrifice. Prof. Müller reads one of the inscriptions from Ava as "His house Awa," and connects it with the worship of Baal-awa, which is common in Southern Arabia.

THE death is announced of Prof. Carl Müller, director of the Düsseldorf Academy, who has long held the first place in Germany among painters of sacred subjects of the old school.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

FROM Messrs. Robert Cocks & Co.:

A Woodland Serenade and Ave Maria by Angelo Mascheroni. These songs are clever and ear-catching. The one has mandoline, the other violin and organ, accompaniment ad lib., and both are dedicated to Adelina Patit. Warning, by Frances Allitson, is a tasteful song. Under the Thorn-tree and 'Tis the Hour, by Mary Carmichael: two well-written, effective duets; we prefer the second. Three Scandinavian Songs, words by Constance Bache, music by Henri Logé: three light, graceful compositions. Largo and 4^{ème} Gavotte à l'ancienne mode pour violoncello, par David Popper. The music is thoroughly good and grateful to the player.

FROM Messrs. Chappell & Co.:

More than All to Me and Fairyland, by F. H. Cowen: two light, graceful ballads. My Dreams and On Lido's Waters, by F. Paolo Tosti. These songs are in the composer's familiar sentimental style. A Garland of Ivy, by Florence Aylward, is an unpretentious song; the harmonies of the accompaniment are pleasing. Romanza per violino, by A. Piatti, is a refined drawing-room piece; the writing of the solo part is most effective, and only of moderate difficulty. C'est Moi, waltz by Algernon Rose: a graceful piece of music, which has pleased dancers in both hemispheres.

FROM Mr. Charles Woolhouse:

Requiescat, by Noel Johnson. Matthew Arnold's fine poem is set to simple but highly expressive music; the pianoforte accompaniment, with its rhythm, now quiet, now pulsating, is most effective. To Spring, words by William Blake, music by William Rea. This choral piece has considerable merit; the thoughts are expressed with ease, and the music, indeed, flows on so smoothly that the skill is not at first perceived. Where Claribel low lieth, for treble and alto voices, by Clarisse Mallard, is a tasteful two-part song. Remembrance, for violoncello, with pianoforte accompaniment, by W. E. Whitehouse, is an effective and grateful piece. Carl Weber's Practical Pianoforte School for Beginners may be highly recommended.

LITERATURE.

The Works of William Blake—Poetic, Symbolic, and Critical. Edited, with Lithographs of the Prophetic Books, and a Memoir and Interpretation, by E. J. Ellis and W. B. Yeats. (Bernard Quaritch.)

I HAVE read these three volumes thrice. I have also read again Gilchrist's Life; nearly all the previous editions of Blake; the various essays of Rossetti, Smetham, Thomson, Mr. Swinburne, and other noteworthy writers; and, in short, all authorities, criticisms, defences, attacks, elucidations, and so forth, with which I am acquainted. I have ransacked such books as the Lives and Letters of Palmer, Linnell, Bell Scott, Smetham; I have studied, so far as was possible to me, the characters of such as Calvert and Finch. I might have been preparing myself, not to write a brief review, but to stand a long examination. Finally, I confess myself incompetent to speak upon the three vast volumes of Mr. Ellis and Mr. Yeats. I can but do three things: state of what the volumes consist, their novelties, discoveries, contentions; state my own unauthoritative impression of their achievement; and state certain frames of mind and conditions of understanding profitable towards a fair estimation of Blake.

The first volume contains a Memoir of Blake. It gives the established facts of previous biographies in a compendious way; but its chief feature is the record of hitherto unpublished matter from Tatham's manuscript, together with fresh letters and marginalia by Blake. Then follows an account of Blake's first literary career before his consecration to mysticism. A new feature in this is the publication of a curious extravaganza, notable in many ways, called "The Island in the Moon." For the first time, also, the celebrated "Manuscript Book," of which we have heard so much, is minutely examined, the true texts of its greater poems given, and the whole fairly laid before the reader. The rest of the volume contains twenty-two essays and expositions of Blake's symbolism, from its widest to its minutest significance. The second volume contains a "line for line" interpretation and harmony of Blake's writings, including those upon art: a complete commentary upon his scriptures and evangels. The third volume gives the text of Blake's complete works, reproduced, most of them, in facsimile, with lithographs of Blake's illustrative designs. Each volume has an admirable portrait of Blake, one being given for the first time. The work fills some fifteen hundred large pages.

It is clear that the editors have enriched our positive knowledge of Blake, his life, and his works. To name but two additions, they have discovered that by blood and birth Blake was an Irishman, an O'Neil; and they have, not discovered, but for the first time assorted and published, the MS. of "Vala," by far the loveliest and strongest, at least for the "mere" literary man, of Blake's prophetic books. Whatever may be thought of the writers' conclusions and views, they have given us all the materials for forming our own judgments. All Blake is here, to his scraps and fragments. The labour of the work must have been immense, and its reward is sure. It is probably the toil and difficulty of so great a collaborate labour that is responsible for the disfigurements of the book. Its misprints, errors in spelling and syntax, inaccurate words and phrases, all very numerous, to say nothing of the more important mistakes in transcription and quotation, are serious indeed, but not to be taken for signs of bad scholarship and workmanship. Engrossed with the significance of their work, embarrassed, may be, by the mutual duties of dual authorship, the writers have neglected the mint, anise, and cummin, intent upon doing weightier matters: nevertheless, they should not have "left the others undone." And, for a last word of censure in this kind, they must pardon me for saying that, like most mystics, from the loftiest to the lowest, they appear to have, not a contempt, but an impatience of "pedantic," classical, academic, accuracy. Neither Mr. Ellis, nor Mr. Yeats, is unknown in literature: they have done admirable things, full of distinction; and if, in this their arduous and monumental work, they have sometimes sinned against the canons of accurate composition, their sin is venial indeed, compared with my ignorance of mysticism, in which they are patient scholars, or even accomplished masters.

Was Blake mad? It is a question always with us; some say, "Hopelessly mad"; others, "Not vulgarly mad," but mad in a superior way, like—well, like St. Paul, and Swedenborg, and Behmen, and St. Theresa, and Tauler, and perhaps Coleridge, and possibly Pascal, and probably Paracelsus. "Blasted with excess of light," may be, and too full of "that fine madness," common, as Plato knew, to poets: not a man for the strait waistcoat and the padded cell, but certainly touched somewhere, liable to strange delusions, possessed or obsessed by wild fancies and visionary dreams: a victim of his own imagination. If we ask for proof, we are told, first, his life was most eccentric; secondly, his writings are frantic. So firmly is this opinion held by some, that an eminent physician, in all good faith, once published the astounding statement that Blake "became actually insane, and remained in an asylum for thirty years." Most devil's advocates of Blake's insanity are content with the milder view, already indicated. Now, this much is certain: that plain, commonplace, sober men, well acquainted with Blake in ordinary intercourse, saw in him one of themselves; that clever, shrewd, intelligent men thought him odd, but quite rational; and that men of high powers in art and literature, scholars and sages of various schools, unanimously pronounced him sane. The evidence of his contemporaries is great in amount, and unvarying in substance. No one knew Blake, and thought him mad. So far as Blake's life is concerned, the question resolves itself into one of facts. Do the known facts indicate that Blake was, in Fitzgerald's phrase, "quite mad, but of a madness that was really the elements of great genius ill-sorted; in fact, a genius with a screw loose?" Do facts compel us, in Dr. Malkin's indignant phrase, to "pursue and scare a warm and brilliant imagination, with the hue and cry of madness?" An honest study of the facts must lead to this conclusion: that it would be far easier to prove the madness of Shelley or of Lamb, from the recorded facts of their lives, than the madness of Blake. The two or three wild stories, of the "Adam and Eve" sort, have been universally discredited: whilst the general tenour of Blake's life is known to have been prudent, laborious, courteous, gentle, charitable, sober, calm. But he used strange language: he talked of hired villains making attempts upon his life, not to say, his wife also. It is precisely upon such points that Mr. Ellis and Mr. Yeats are invaluable. They tell us what Blake habitually meant by such phrases: how "life," to him, was freedom of the spirit in the world of eternal imagination; how any influence depressing, or thwarting, his artistic aims was a murderous influence, destroying the life, which he lived not by bread alone, and which consisted not in the multitude of his possessions. They show us that Blake used these terms with precision: how living Reynolds and dead Rubens were to him hirelings and villains alike, meaning that their sense of art was a blighting and wasting and deadening influence. Nothing is singular and isolated in Blake: a violent phrase strikes us, and we find it habitually used by him with one identical precision of meaning from first to last. But the very sign of most madness is the solution of all continuity and consistency in thought: talk to a madman, one of an originally fine intelligence, and you will find him methodical in his madness for an hour, and then incoherently irresponsible and flighty. There is none of this in Blake: no breaking down of the reason, no breaking out into frenzy and incoherence. But the prophetic books, say some: that mass of chaotic, confounded, and confounding nonsense, where splendid poetry alternates with unmanageable rubbish! If that be a true account of them, Blake was mad; but how few readers, from Mr. Swinburne downwards, have been at the pains to master them. Assuredly, I had not; but I have never presumed to call them unintelligible, because I did not understand them. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Yeats have been at these pains; and, all thanks be to them, no one can any longer so speak of the prophetic books. For they have studied them through and through: they have endured the toils of analysis, comparison, investigation; and they have made it clear, they have made it certain, that Blake had one meaning, one purpose, throughout. Take all the seemingly grotesque nomenclature of his enormous myths, Enitharmon, Los, Golgonooza, Bath, Felpham, Oro, Canterbury, Battersea; see how each name is employed throughout the books; compare its meaning here with its meaning there; examine the bearing of one myth upon another, of this narrative with that; you will be forced to acknowledge that these vast stories, vast powers and personifications, "moving about in worlds not realised," are thoroughly consistent and harmonious. You will also see that Blake, exercising his liberty of vision, discerns his actors in various relations and positions: one power will appear under many aspects; but you will never find him inextricably confusing his myths. I only claim that a careful study of Blake's text, and of these commentaries, will show that Blake's prophetic books, if mad, are admirably methodical in their madness; that he was not under the spell of chance dreams and monstrous imageries, turbidly and rhapsodically thrown together as by some unbalanced faculty. Test the books as you would test the Iliad, or Hamlet, or Faust. Some allowances you must perforce make; but the general result will be a conviction that one great imaginative mind, precise, determinate, consistent, presided over their construction. I do not claim to have mastered them; that demands some years of patient study. I do claim to have applied to them the most prosaic tests, and never to have found them wanting. Ask a novice in Platonic philosophy to collate the various passages of Plato, in which the word "idea" occurs. He will say, with all due diffidence, that he discovers one prominent usage and meaning of the word, together with certain passages in which it appears to vary somewhat, yet not to the overthrow of Plato's general consistency. Just that is my position: no scholar in Blake, I have still tested these commentaries by ordinary methods, and found that, upon the whole, they disclose to me one persistent purpose in Blake's prophetic books. True, I cannot presume to say, in a few words, what that is. Blake is not Plato or Aristotle, a man whose philosophy is a common possession of many ages, easily sketched, because all can fill up the gaps and interspaces. I can but say that Mr. Ellis and Mr. Yeats seem to me, one out of many readers, to have proved their point, the rational consistency of Blake's conceptions: in fact, that he had a system. When I read in the "Jerusalem," that "the Faeries lead the Moon along the Valley of Cherubim," I am personally content, in my sloth, to admire the vague beauty of the picture; but I know that Faeries, Moon, Valley, Cherubim, have definite meanings, above or underneath their pictorial charm. Blake's life, Blake's writings, Blake's art of design, are shown incontestably by Mr. Ellis and Mr. Yeats to have a single, simple coherence, a perfect unity: he lived, wrote, designed under one inspiration, obedient to one service of the imagination, without extravagance, without absurdity.

But why this symbolism, this apparatus of mystical mythology? Why not say what you have to say in plain language? Mill and Mr. Spencer use plain language, and yet their conceptions are difficult. What is the profit of this somewhat suspect and perplexing phraseology, this pseudo-systematic machinery? Surely, after all, Blake was a splendid fanatic, an innocent charlatan, half deluding and half deluded? Why not say Space and Time, if you mean them, instead of using crackjaw names of fantastic personages? Mr. Ellis and Mr. Yeats contrive to use fairly lucid English to explain it all: why did not Blake in the first instance?

In reply, we may refer to the chapter upon the "Necessity of Symbolism," perhaps the finest piece of writing in the whole work. It probably escapes many readers and critics, that any wholesale condemnation of Blake applies also to the literatures and writers whom they revere. Most of us, nominally, are some sort of Christians. What of Job, Isaiah, Ezekiel, the Song of Songs, the Apocalypse? Waiving all vexed questions of inspiration, it remains true that the Biblical writers, Israelite and Christian, did not always use plain language; they wrote visions, allegories, parables. The early Christian exegesis was frankly mystical. Moab, and Edom, and Egypt, and Babylon did not mean Moab, and Edom, and Egypt, and Babylon, but the spiritual significance of those names, exemplified in history. In the name of honesty, let us make a clean sweep of all this, if at heart we revolt against it; orthodox, or heretic, or neither, we need not be superstitious. Let us be honest positivists or materialists, and reject all mystical fables, however ancient and venerable. After all, if much of Blake seem ludicrous, undignified, unpoetical, Blake does not stand alone in that, but he is openly modern, a man of his day, not afraid of its terms. Ancient mystics are saved by their antiquity. Sincerely, if Gilead be admissible, why not Gloucester? If Gog and Magog, why not Urizen and Orc? Bibliolatry, and a false reverence for antiquity, have deadened alike our spiritual appreciation and our spiritual humour.

But the whole question, ultimately, is this: are we bound within the limits, and by the bonds, of the five senses? If not, and metaphysics for the most part say no, what is the ruling principle? Blake, like so many others, found it in imagination, the power of the spirit, soul, mind, at their highest. Like any Kantian, he drew distinctions between reason and understanding; like any Coleridgean, between fancy and imagination; and, like any Spinozist, he saw all things sub specie aeternitatis. The "thing in itself" haunted him, he refused phenomenal facts; he pondered upon the nature of things, as Lucretius calls the universe, and upon bygone, though not obsolete, systems. "He loved St. Theresa." His students know how much else he loved, how wide and deep was his mystical erudition, his "science of being," his ontology. He found his end in a reaction, almost Manichean, against nature, the material world: against nature, he set up art, the power that divines and sees. Like any theologian, he discerned a "fall of man," a severance and division of his powers, a perpetual war: and, in imagination, he saw that royal faculty which interprets to fallen and distracted man the material witness of his natural senses. That is to say, imagination supplies to nature its interpretative symbols. And here we join hands with all poets. For, though we should begin with drawing elementary distinctions between metaphor and simile, and end by reading the history of aesthetics from Plato and Aristotle to Lessing and Hegel, we shall not comprehend the incomprehensible mystery of poetry. Why did Wordsworth fall from the highest altitudes to the deepest depths, utterly unconscious? Why does the quest after rhyme sometimes lead to the highest beauty of thought, the rhyming words mutually charged with spiritual significance, though the poet was ignorant of it? One may read scores of treatises upon poetry, learned, imaginative, from Aristotle to Sidney, from Sidney to Shelley, and remain wholly unenlightened. Blake delighted in the doctrine of correspondences, foolishly attributed to Swedenborg as a discovery, but the most ancient wisdom of the world. It may flippantly be termed, saying one thing when you mean another; more truly it means, seeing that one thing is the sign and symbol of another. Imagination at work among the common things of human experience, describes and discovers their divine counterparts: the world is the shadow of eternal truth, and imagination their go-between. Though in Blake, as our authors explain to us, this doctrine or theory took a special form and feature, systematised itself peculiarly, it is the property of all imaginative writers, each in his degree. Thus, to take a living author, the magnificent Odes and Essays of Mr. Patmore are largely unintelligible, apart from the doctrine of symbolic correspondences, as utilised by a Catholic. Assuredly here is the essence of poetry: the perception of spiritual resemblances. Blake chose to take these resemblances, and to personify them, and to embody or envisage them, and to make them in his prophetic books as real and live as Hector and Helen: he saw significance in the points of the compass, he found nothing common or unclear, he was utterly fearless in applying his doctrine to visible and actual things. To a prosaic man he would talk of the weather or the Ministry with all imaginable courtesy and practical address; but in himself, at least with his friends, to his wife, he talked of the eternal world of imagination in which he lived, discerning everywhere its types and images in this. Now and again, he burst out telling of that world before company unfit; and strange stories went about, how Mr. Blake said the sun was the Greek Apollo and the Devil, but the real sun cried "Holy, Holy, Holy." Most of us are content to find adumbrations of eternal truth and absolute being in material things. Blake, greatly daring, dared to proclaim that not the material image, but the eternal thing signified, was the reality. Many men think that Voltaire's and Johnson's jesting refutations of Berkeley are not only amusing, but adequate: such men will see nothing in Blake. A most imperfect poet, best remembered by the praises of Browning and Rossetti, has these lines:

"The essence of mind's being is the stream of thought;
Difference of mind's being is difference of the stream;
Within this single difference may be brought
All countless differences that are or seem.

Now thoughts associate in the common mind
By outside semblance, or from general wont;
But in the mind of genius, swift as wind,
All similarly influencing thoughts confront.

Though the things thought, in time and space, may lie
Wider than India from the Arctic zone;
If they impress one feeling, swift they fly,
And in the mind of genius take one throne."

Garth Wilkinson, in the epilogue to those strange poems, "Improvisations from the Spirit," writes: "Writing from an influx which is really out of yourself, or so far within yourself as to amount to the same thing, is either a madness or a religion. I know of no third possibility." Here is a man, drunk with mysticism, though no mean master in science, confessing the two alternatives; it is impossible to study Blake, without seeing that his inspiration was religious, spiritual, not fanatical and insane. Further, this perception of spiritual correspondences and analogies has often led to the wildest moral licence. Blake, understood literatim et verbatim, is unconventional enough, but never irresponsibly, enthusiastically so. As Mr. Dowden puts it: "An antinomian tendency is a characteristic common to many mystics; it is rarely that the antinomianism is so pure and childlike, yet so impassioned, as it was in the case of Blake." Behmen is poetical enough, but exceedingly vague; Swedenborg is lucid enough, but exceedingly prosaic; Blake is both poetical and—laboriously studied—lucid. Take away his nomenclature, his mythical imagery, and substitute its actual meaning; he reads like "The Dark Night of the Soul," by St. John of the Cross, and many another masterpiece of Christian mysticism. We are always hearing that the epic is out of date and impossible. Blake wrote epics, an epic including epics, upon very high matters, and he has paid the penalty. Had he cast his work into another form, into his excellent and vigorous prose, he would have won applause: as it is he recorded the truth, as his literary imagination gave it to him, and the world, the little English world that knows of him, stands aghast. Yet Blake is far more intelligible than Emerson, because far more precise. Precision, said Palmer, was his word. As Arnold maintained against Carlyle, speaking of the second part of "Faust," a fitful, vague adumbration of many things is detestable. Blake knew that "grandeur of ideas" was founded upon precision of ideas, and was definite to the verge of absurdity.

I am painfully aware that I have not reviewed these volumes, the fruit of so much labour, but it is to my credit that I have attempted to review them. Reviewing implies an equal or superior knowledge in the reviewer to that of the reviewed: probably no living man knows as much as, or more than, Mr. Ellis and Mr. Yeats know about Blake. Reviews should be passably intelligent, but are not expected to be omniscient. Few priests are theologians; few moral and dogmatic theologians are ascetic and mystical theologians; as Fielding's Partridge loved to observe, non omnia possumus omnes. The ordinary reviewer can but bear witness that in these volumes readers will find all things useful and essential to the study of Blake. They will find much to perplex, distress, annoy them; references to all manner of occult societies, practices, doctrines, believers, which they will firmly hold to be humbug. Let me assure them that an understanding of Blake is independent of such things, be they humbug or no. Prolonged acquaintance with literature, as with life, inclines one to reserve judgment upon most questions of the kind: it becomes positivists only to be positive, at least in denials and negations. At least, these volumes show a strong and fine character: a man, from first to last, breasting and facing all adversity, contumely, and opposition; a man living the life of a sage and dying the death of a saint. Thoroughly to master his works you must learn a partially new language, and a wholly new mythology. Say, if you will, "Life is not long enough," and say no more; do not, without knowledge, ridicule or attack a great and generous Englishman. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Yeats have demonstrated that many a distinguished writer, of no little name and fame, has failed to realise the meaning of Blake, has merely seen this or that aspect of him, and magnified or depreciated it; they at least have seen him steadily, and seen him whole. And their presentation of him agrees with the testimony of his own friends. Palmer wrote to Mrs. Gilchrist in connexion with her husband's Life of Blake:

"No bright thoughts have come to me since my boy left us, but animated by reading the MS. something did strike me, which may be worthy of consideration—a preface (however short) by Mr. Carlyle. I never saw a perfect embodiment of Mr. Carlyle's ideal of a man in earnest but in the person of Blake. And if he were to write only thus much, 'This was a good man and true,' thousands would be talking of Blake who otherwise would not care twopence for fifty Blakes put together."

And Smetham, no prejudiced devotee of Blake, declared: "If a man can see and feel that which makes Blake what he is, he can see and feel anything." But to write of Blake is as if one had to write of Wordsworth for the first time: what theories of poetry, what imaginative ideas, would one have to discuss! That battle is long over and done: and Blake is a far inferior subject. Great poet, artist, mystic—he was none of these perfectly, none of these quite originally. It is important that his place should be established, but his place is not with the supreme. Coleridge said of the mystics, that they "kept alive the heart within the head," that they were to him "a pillar of fire throughout the night during my wanderings through the wilderness of death." Blake is among the greatest of the mystics; but the greatest mystics have not been among the greatest writers. They are a class apart, select, elect, precious, but not perfect artists, and too often either the idols or the playthings of fools. The greatest writers are mystical, not mystics. Pure mysticism, though skilled interpreters, as Mr. Ellis and Mr. Yeats, may make it plain to us, is still too far away to be the staple and substance of common literature.

In conclusion, we have here two poets capable of original work far above the ordinary level, devoting themselves, their brain, time, labour, to a complete and worthy presentation of Blake. It is a work which only they can presume to judge, who have themselves given time and trouble to editing and annotating a great writer. To students of mysticism, esoteric or superficial, they have given an invaluable treasure; to lovers of good literature, the same. If, now and again, they seem to have outrun the mystic's licence to be obscure or audacious, at least they have always written fine English. Though concerned in the least mundane affairs, the cloudiest "magnalities of religion," they have condescended to biographical details, textual considerations, practical information; and their work will remain among the works of those who have conceived an honourable enthusiasm, and devoted their best pains to the presentation of their raptures in a thorough and reasonable way.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

The Land of Home Rule: an Essay on the History and Constitution of the Isle of Man. By Spencer Walpole. (Longmans.)

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE'S name is well and honourably known to all students of recent history. Of those who have undertaken to write the annals of the nineteenth century, there may be some whose style is more fascinating and whose pages are more popular with the general run of readers; but there are certainly none whose work is equal in solid merit. Besides this, we have had from Mr. Walpole's pen an excellent biography of Lord Russell, of which the only fault, if it be one, is that of too great compression; and his present official position as Governor of the Isle of Man has suggested to him a theme which, if not so intrinsically important as the subjects on which he has previously been engaged, is yet one of considerable interest, and hitherto almost entirely untrodden. As Mr. Walpole remarks: "The little island, which forms the subject of the present work, cannot boast that it reflects in its annals the history of mankind, but it may at least claim that it has witnessed many of the changes which have affected the destinies of the larger countries around it. Like them it has seen the irruption of successive races, who have all left their mark on the character of its people and on the names of the country. Like them or like the larger island of Great Britain, it has successfully preserved the independence which its ancestors secured for it: it enjoys such advantages as autonomous institutions can confer on a people, and it has retained these privileges while neighbouring and larger communities have been deprived of them."

By the way, Mr. Walpole has here fallen into a slight inaccuracy of expression. It is surely incorrect to talk about the "ancestors" of an island, and yet our author certainly seems to do so in the penultimate sentence of the above passage.

Mr. Walpole starts from the very beginning, and commences with an account of the primitive inhabitants of the island, so far as they can now be identified. There can be little question that Man, like the rest of Britain, was inhabited by a Pre-Celtic population, whose race affinities are hardly yet quite determined. Mr. Walpole follows Prof. Rhys in assigning them to the Iberian race, and identifying them with the Silurians of South Wales and the Picts of North Britain. These views are, it is true, not yet universally accepted among scholars, but the authority on which they rest is sufficiently weighty to justify their adoption by a writer who makes no claims to original research in these intricate antiquarian matters.

There is no doubt, however, that at the dawn of the historic period the island was peopled by Celts of the Goidelic or Gaelic branch, whose language still survives in certain parts. There is a crop of legends relating to this period of Man's history, and to the introduction of Christianity, which tradition ascribes to St. Patrick; but we cannot be certain of anything till we come to the sixth century, when we can discern with tolerable clearness that the possession of the island was disputed between the Dalriadic Scots of Argyllshire and the Northern Welsh. In the end, as so often happens, both competitors had to give way to a third party; and in the early part of the seventh century Man was annexed to the kingdom of the great Northumbrian Bretwalda Edwin, and "fell for the first time under Saxon [Mr. Walpole should surely have said Anglian] dominion."

When at the close of the century Northumbria lost its supremacy, the island again changed hands, and once more passed under the sway of the North Welsh princes, whose rule lasted till 913. It was about the latter date that the Northmen, who had already settled in the Western Isles of Scotland and the East of Ireland, made Man one of the chief seats of their power. The first Norse ruler is said to have been a certain King Orry, whose name is famous in Manx legend and tradition. As with Alfred in England, all the later institutions of the island were ascribed to him; and no doubt there is much that is fabulous in these accounts. The following legend certainly might with some plausibility be alleged to prove that this ancient Viking was only a "solar [or stellar] myth." "The story goes that Orry on landing was met by a few of the inhabitants, who inquired of him whence he came, and that pointing to the Milky Way he replied, 'That is the way to my country.'" However, there seems no reason to doubt that this monarch was a real historical character, and it is certain that under Norse rule the island played a much more prominent part in British history than either earlier or later.

Man now became part of an extensive maritime dominion which stretched as far north as the Hebrides, and for at least two centuries the "Kings of Man and the Islands" commanded the most powerful naval force in western waters. In 1156 this empire was broken up, only the southern islands, or Sudreys (Sodorenses Insulæ) remaining united with Man, "and to this day the fact has given the title to the Manx bishop, who is Bishop of Sodor and Man—in other words, of Man and these islands."

The general overthrow of the Norse power in Western Scotland after the defeat of Haco of Norway by the Scotch King Alexander III., at Largs, led, in 1270, to the union of the island with Scotland; and at this point the interest of its history becomes merely local. After remaining an appendage of the Scottish crown for about a century, it was wrested from this sovereignty by adventurers from England; and after some vicissitudes it passed, in 1406, under the rule of the house of Stanley, who held it as vassals of the English crown for 330 years, when it passed by female descent to the Athole family, by whom it was sold to the British crown in 1765, when the island came for the first time under direct English rule, though a long controversy afterwards arose about the terms of the bargain, and the claims of the Duke of Athole were not finally settled till 1805.

Of greater interest than these external events is the constitutional history of the island, which has been very carefully traced by Mr. Walpole. The framework of Manx institutions appears to date from the time of the Norse dynasty. The Scandinavian settlers, following the universal custom of their race, held great assemblies in the open air, the meeting place of which was known as the Tynwald (Thing Vollr or Parliament-field). This name has been transferred to the Manx legislature itself, which for centuries has been known as the House of Keys. The etymology of the word is very obscure, but it is evident that the Keys are the same body which was anciently called the Taxiaxi. Their number seems to have been always (as now) twenty-four, but their functions and mode of appointment have been greatly changed. They were in ordinary times a judicial rather than a legislative body, and were usually nominated by the lord's officers, but "on special occasions, when laws of more than ordinary importance were proposed to them, they were sometimes elected by the people." This, however, was only at irregular intervals, and for a long time it ceased altogether, vacancies being filled up after the island had fallen under direct British rule by the House submitting two names to the governor, who made his choice between them. This practice continued till 1866, when the Keys became an elective body. There is also an Upper House or Council, which consists of five crown officials and three ecclesiastical members, the latter being the Bishop, Archdeacon, and Vicar-General. Laws are made by the two houses, and sent by the Governor to the Home Office for the royal assent; but they do not come into force till they have been formally promulgated at the Tynwald Court, held annually after the ancient Norse fashion in the open air—an interesting survival of primitive democracy.

The Manx people seem to get on very well with their autonomous institutions. "There is probably no part of her Majesty's dominions which gives her responsible advisers less cause for thought and concern."

Mr. Walpole does not, as might be supposed from the title of his book, directly enter into the great subject of political controversy at present occupying the attention of the imperial parliament; but the words with which he concludes his pages can hardly fail to suggest what his views are on the question:

"Whatever what may be the result of autonomy in other places, it has made of the Manx a loyal, orderly, easily-governed community. Their virtual independence may be denounced as an anomaly; constitutional writers may demonstrate that dependent legislatures are likely to become inconvenient or to break down; but anomalies, when they are attended with no evil consequences, have a tendency to survive, and autonomous institutions, at any rate in the Isle of Man, display an increasing capacity for work."

Memorials of Serjeant Bellasis. By Edward Bellasis, Lancaster Herald. (Burns & Oates.)

THIS handsome volume is not exactly superfluous. Probably "two or three columns in the Dictionary of National Biography" contained all that anyone wanted to know of Mr. Serjeant Bellasis; but he lived in such an interesting time, he himself was so amiable and so excellent that it is pleasant to read about him, and the book cannot be neglected in any future history of English Religion in the nineteenth century.

Edward Bellasis was born in 1800, of good kin in every sense. His father was a moderately distinguished pluralist clergyman, who died when he was two years old; he was idle at school, but conscientiously resented being described as "a bad boy"; his mother, we can well believe, found him "engaging" from the first. When he was a young man, he gave occasion for the remark that the young men of that period behaved much better to old ladies than their predecessors. He was at first intended for an attorney; but was called in good time to the bar, and composed an ingenious and candid exercise on the theme that an honest man may honestly say all that can be fairly said upon the wrong side. He was so amiable and so conscientious that he acquired a large parliamentary practice. He was rather unlucky when he was opposed to Serjeant Mereweather and Prof. Airy in the Dee standard case. He brought a model to be worked by a handle before the committee; Mereweather pretended to think it a musical instrument, and then added, amid general laughter, "I see, it is my learned friend's fiddle-de-Dee." He was more fortunate in enforcing the £100,000 penalty upon the Great Eastern Company when they broke their promise to avoid cutting a seven-mile ditch through the middle of the country of Lord Petre's hounds. He and Hope Scott shared an amusing experience. They were counsel for a nephew and an uncle on opposite sides of a Scotch Bill; each insisted on conferring with his counsel on the Sabbath, and each stipulated that he should not be betrayed to his kinsman. He took the degree of the coif in 1844, because he was the senior among the juniors of the Parliamentary Bar, and was afraid that, without the protection of rank, a large influx from other courts would take away his business. He had little business in the ordinary courts, except after his conversion, when he defended Newman in the Achilli trial, and shared with Hope Scott in the forlorn hope of saving as much as possible of the Shrewsbury estates for a Roman Catholic successor.

Like many of his contemporaries, Serjeant Bellasis owed his first doubts of Protestantism to continental travel. He went abroad in 1833, and soon convinced himself that, in Belgium and elsewhere, the majority knew their religion better, and practised it more consistently, than in England. In Lancashire, in 1843, before the great Irish invasion, he found the moral and general conduct of the Catholic population "superior, not to say very superior, to that of our own people." Moreover, as early as 1840, he made the less common reflection that the Protestants reviled the Papists and the Papists did not revile the Protestants, and concluded that the side which did not render railing for railing was probably right. He was scandalised at the severity of the bishops to such Tractarian clergy as were in their power, and was one of the principal persons concerned in drawing up a plea from lawyers in favour of toleration, which Newman thought so important that he wished to reserve it for another occasion which never came. In the crisis of the Gorham judgment, Bellasis took a line of his own: he stoutly refused to join the surviving Tractarian leaders in a movement for substituting clergy for lawyers in the trial of spiritual causes, and was received into the Church of Rome in the interval between two pamphlets on the so-called Papal Aggression. Like most sensible and religious men, he wanted a ready-made religion which he could practise without discussing it. When Upton Richards talked to him of improving the Church, he answered, "I want the Church to improve me."

He had no sacrifices to make: his Scotch connexion was quite unaffected by the change; his second wife, whose delicate health had obliged her to leave the children to his training, hesitated to follow him at first; but when she saw that they wished to go to church with papa, she wandered alone into a church in South London on Palm Sunday; and their pleasure at detecting the palm-branch in her muff, and recognising the smell of incense, opened her eyes. His life as a Roman Catholic was prosperous and edifying in every way. As he had foreseen, he was a greater personage in a narrower circle, and his sensibility to his own shortcomings was only the keener. His one trouble was that he was afraid that he did not exactly love God: he was always getting his daughters, who were nuns, to pray that he might, and trying to convince them that they could not love him as much as he loved them. At last he fell back upon the authority of St. Alphonsus Liguori, that parental love is the strongest of passions—as if a celibate saint could know.

Science and a Future Life. By Frederic W. H. Myers. (Macmillans.)

If the reader of this book expects from the lettering on the back a vigorously scientific treatise on the great subject, he may be disappointed to find a Falstaffian disproportion of bread and sack. Only the opening paper in the book is strictly on the question; the rest consists of various essays, reprinted from the Nineteenth Century and the Fortnightly Review, on such varied topics as the Duke of Albany, Tennyson, and the Condition of France. The series, however, has a certain unity of purpose, which the author desires to emphasise by placing first the paper giving the title to the volume.

Mr. Myers always writes well and gracefully, and with full knowledge of his subjects; and those who know the writer by his able little Life of Wordsworth, and his essays on classical and modern questions, will require no information on the views herein expounded with his usual sincerity and grace. More firmness of touch—more blood, as Gluck wished for in the opera-writers of his day—the general reader may desire, if at times he thinks the tone unduly that of the literary man in the laboratory. From Paley's "twelve men of probity"—the men that were weekly empanelled in the pulpit of the eighteenth century to confute like a British jury the attacks of the Deists—to our own days, when the very pineal gland that the Cartesians regarded as the seat of the soul is now treated as the pathological trace of a visual organ of some invertebrate ancestor, is a long step. The spirit-rapping that the greatest living scientist of the day but lately denounced as beneath even the gossip of old women in a cathedral town, is now gravely, under the title of telepathy, brought to bear, as evidential support, on the efficacy of prayer and the communion of saints! We are not so sure, as Mr. Myers seems to be, that the historical evidence for Christianity is decaying, and that experimental psychology is a fifth and final gospel.

The very curious and interesting quotations by Mr. Myers from Darwin in his paper on that great man it would be unfair to quote: the reader will do well to turn to them, for this essay, if slight in texture, is yet etched in firm and clear lines, and to many will be the most acceptable of the series. After repeated efforts to grasp the bearing of the remarks on Tennyson as a prophet, and the modern exponents of cosmic law, we fear most readers will find a sense of confusion. The pessimism of the writers seems to have reacted on Mr. Myers, and to have made him "sad as night for wantonness." The gospel of it all is no less unsatisfactory than conflicting. On the one hand, Death is disguised as an alias—"his truer name is Onward"; on the other, we are invited to an Earthly Paradise where religion and science disappear, and even poetry withers, but where man "is left with the decorative arts, open-air exercise, and abundance of beautiful and innocent girls," where the future of the race is a kind of "affectionate picnic." The Sentimentalist and the Socialist may claim to atone for renouncing the future world by eagerness to brighten the present day; but we fear the practical man, when disenchanted, like Menander's Parmenon, with the Watteau-like pastorals of the poets of cosmic law, will say that science matters not to man and "will not stay." Indeed, the prospect is not alluring for those with no regard for the decorative arts and the artistic graces. The Manchester school, which turned the country into a manufactory with the literature of the day-book and ledger and the morality of profit and loss, found Mr. Froude rightly eloquent on behalf of those who had neither country houses nor yachts in the Solent; and supply and demand are curiously disproportionate in this affecting landscape. We cannot imagine Carlyle or Schopenhauer as therein at their ease.

Much the strongest paper is "The Disenchantment of France," where the writer brings out the electric condition in which that country now is: how, like a sort of European Nilometer, she has ever been the first to risk, in corpo vili, the political and social experiments made in her wake by other nations. The decadent certainly in literature, with Maupassant, Goncourt, Huysmans, and Bourget, reigns supreme, and the "victorious analysis" of the Salpêtrière wards seems to have even inaugurated the moral reign of the homme sensuel moyen, who takes life without an arrière-pensée. Mark Pattison used to think that, since the days of Casaubon, French intellect had been afflicted with atrophy and degeneration of tissue, while the advanced wing of Celtic ethnologists regard France as in her old Caesarean stage, reverting to the primal or Iberian type after having evolved the Aryan influence. Renan held that his countrymen were essentially averse to poetry and to all kinds of mysticism, and that the French mind was for this earth only, and estimated with mathematical precision the dimensions and proportions of this life with no second thought beyond. How far a disillusioned nation can feel as a whole the benumbing influences of determinism, like the kindred effects of fatalism in Mohammedan countries, Mr. Myers expounds with great clearness in its bearing on the population of France and her position as a military power. With her present rate of increase, the grand nation will in fifty years be the sixth, and "in 150 years she will have sunk almost beneath consideration in a world of Russians and Germans, Anglo-Saxons and Chinese." The contrast of Catholic Brittany and free-thinking Normandy should give the psychological-decadent pause, for the acceptance of the Cosmos on Stoic terms is not in harmony with any of the present tendencies of French thought.

There is an air of earnestness, yet withal of sadness, all through the book. Whether telescoping and microscopy are exhausting their powers and the great scientific generalisations are running dry is, as Mr. Myers says, uncertain. The true pioneers of science he regards as very guarded now in their prognostications. The general reader of the last ten years has not forgotten the Bathybius Haeckelii, and will note with satisfaction a hopeful conclusion in the recent Romanes Lecture of Prof. Huxley. Those who think the old ways not yet broken up, and the historical faith untouched, will consider Mr. Myers in his conclusions unduly despondent, and Prof. Huxley from his data unnaturally hopeful. They will continue to believe the voice "heard in ancient days" as not merely for "this passing night"; yet in differing from Mr. Myers they will find much pleasure and instruction in his last volume.

NEW NOVELS.

As a Man is Able. By Dorothy Leighton. In 3 vols. (Heinemann.)

The Crime of Maunsell Grange. By Frederic Breton. In 3 vols. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

Mervyn Hall. By Francis R. Roberts. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The Temptation of Dulce Carruthers. By O. E. C. Weigall. (Cassells.)

Lucky Lines. By Jessie M. E. Saxby. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

Joel Marsh; an American, &c. By Avery Macalpine. (Ward, Lock & Bowden.)

The Orchid Seekers. By Ashmore Russan and Frederick Boyle. (Chapman & Hall.)

THERE is an abundance of talent in As a Man is Able, but it has not been put to the wisest purpose. The writer is one of the best of the many authors who apparently imagine that the spirit of Ibsen has obtained what diplomatists call "an undoubted paramountcy" in fin-de-siècle fiction, and that, therefore, they must give tragic endings as well as pathetic middles to the stories they produce. Certainly the end of As a Man is Able—the self-effacement of Beatrice, the poisoning, and, finally, "the prostrate form of a woman with a glorious wealth of hair like burnished copper falling around her as her shroud, her exquisite lips parted in a childlike happy smile, and the beautiful hazel eyes closed in the sleep that knows no awakening"—is melancholy enough. Vere (or Dick) Vandeleur is a well-drawn, if commonplace, weakling. That after being profoundly in love with Iris Hope and inducing her to live with him, he should have become still more profoundly in love with and should have married the Beatrice who commits suicide, is probably quite natural. That Beatrice, when she discovers that her Dick is morally married to Iris, who has nursed her back to life, should step aside to make room for the woman she has unconsciously supplanted, is also perhaps natural—is, at least, not altogether incredible. But it seems alike unnatural and incredible that a woman of the high character of Iris should have consented to live in any relation but absolutely legal wedlock with any man. In short, there is a flaw in one at least of the links of the chain which ends in the tragedy of Beatrice. For the rest, As a Man is Able is a very carefully-planned and very well-written story. There are not too many characters in it, and all are admirably sketched—notably, the good-hearted and good-natured man whom Vere Vandeleur is exceedingly desirous that Iris Hope should take as a husband when he himself has tired of her.

It would be the easiest thing in the world to pick holes in The Crime of Maunsell Grange on the score both of incredibility of incident and of lack of originality in the plot. It may be doubted if the injured but feeble and senile husband who figures so prominently in the story was physically capable of the crime which brings another man to the verge of ruin; and it is undeniable that the typical (in English eyes) Frenchwoman, who, as a matter of fact, takes no thought for the seventh commandment and is a drunkard, has, especially in these later years, become a good deal of a bore. On the other hand, The Crime of Maunsell Grange has the supreme virtue of being readable from first to last. Besides, there are three exceptionally good characters in it—the unfortunate hero and the two stepsisters, to whom he makes love in turn. The reader will approve generally of Aylward's choice: Félicie is at least a natural child, while Azrael is not serious enough to make a thoroughly good and complete woman. In fact, she is such a prig and so devoid of courage that she deserves to die an old maid, and not to become the wife of a sensible clergyman. Although we have far too much of Sirène and her cognac, it must be allowed that the contrast between her first husband who, with all his faults, is a gentleman, and her second, who is intensely vulgar, is admirably brought out. The incidents with which the story is profusely sprinkled, such as the mysterious murder of Hébert and the combat between him and his rival for the affections of the unsatisfactory Azrael Charlton, are also well managed, and, while sensational, are not unduly so. Altogether, The Crime of Maunsell Grange is a really excellent example of what we rather shamefacedly regard as "Railway Reading."

In Mervyn Hall, a neat volume of some 300 pages, Mr. F. R. Roberts provides an attractive and not too long drawn out banquet of horrors. Given a wicked uncle bent on compassing the death of a nephew who fortunately is so weak and selfish as not to merit any sympathy; Shiney Bill, a quite Shaksperian murderer; an adventurer who ascertains the relations that exist between the uncle and Shiney Bill; a distressed young woman and a good young man engaged (in a vague way) to that young man, and one may easily divine the rest—except, perhaps, the death of uncle Trevelyan of heart disease, instead of toppling over a parapet when he is confronted by a detective. There is a stage rapidity about the action of the story which is pleasant rather than otherwise, and the scoundrels are all artistically compact of unscrupulousness. The girl of the story is not much to speak of, and her lover is still less; but this is probably true of all girls and lovers in melodramatic novels of this kind.

The Temptation of Dulce Carruthers, which has already appeared in a popular magazine, cannot be better described than as a good "girls' story." The heroine is a young woman of more than ordinary musical culture, who makes a rather nice little mistake, and repents also in the very nicest way. In other words, she throws over Jack Mordaunt for Lord Melvell. But at the eleventh hour she declines to marry her second fiancée, and disappears into the ranks of the teaching profession, only, of course, to be re-discovered by Jack Mordaunt, who equally of course from being a poor doctor has become a well-to-do gentleman. Most of the characters in this story, both male and female, are quite ordinary folks—and all the more likely to be popular on that account; but there is some force (even if it be unpleasant force) of character in Lady Spenhouse, whose chaperonage of Dulce all but leads to disastrous results. Dulce's own brief but brilliant career as a "beauty" is also skillfully sketched.

In Lucky Lines, Mrs. Jessie Saxby has produced what is perhaps her "strongest" story. There is far more character in it than in any of its predecessors, and it is even possessed of a plot of considerable ingenuity. At all events, the interest of the reader in a mysterious bag with its marvellous contents is thoroughly sustained. Shetland character is sketched to much more purpose than it has been in recent fiction. The portraits of the two leading men, Yaspard and Magnus, and of the two leading women—it would scarcely be correct to style them heroines—Helen and Aunie, seem to belong to the category of speaking likenesses. There are plenty of sensational situations in Lucky Lines—shipwrecks, boat-upsettings, hairbreadth escapes—but there is no strain of exaggeration in any one of them. Nor, although it is obviously the purpose of Mrs. Saxby to uphold certain of the minor Christian virtues, such as patience and resignation, does she thrust it too much on her readers. She is to be congratulated on the decided literary advance she has made in Lucky Lines.

There is genuine character—it is difficult to use a better word—in the volume of stories to which the first, "Joel Marsh, an American," gives the title. But there is also a repellent element of sadness; not one ends altogether satisfactorily. There is an air of artificiality about certain of the stories in the centre of the book, such as "Virtue, an Etching," and "A Passion of Capri." But the first and the last are absolutely American, and are in every way admirable as a picture of remorseless fanaticism—in this case rebelled against, though in a futile way. "A Sacrifice to Faith" is perfect; even Mr. Rudyard Kipling has given us nothing "stronger." But far and away the best story in this volume is that which gives its title to it. Joel Marsh, as a whimsical American who is a benefactor to his species and especially to that forlorn member of it, William Eaton, has no superior—perhaps has not even an equal—in the whole range of the humorously pathetic literature of the States.

There is a vast deal of good workmanship—scientific no less than literary—in The Orchid Seekers, which is a story of adventure in Borneo; and the boys for whom it has been written will rise from its perusal not wiser perhaps, but better informed, than they were before they began, provided they have the patience to read it through. But will they have the patience? Mr. Russan and Mr. Boyle, it is only too obvious, must, if they are to collaborate successfully, learn the supreme art of condensation. It is evident that they are thoroughly acquainted with every branch of their subject or subjects. Their hairbreadth escapes, their bloody combats with sanguinary Dyaks and treacherous Chinamen, are quite as good as their botany, geography, and ethnology. The Enthusiasm of the Blue Orchid is manifestly as entrancing as any other of the enthusiasms of the day, and a good deal purer. But it is quite impossible to finish this book at two sittings, much less in one; and this is a serious, if not a fatal, objection to any work intended for boys. But no doubt Messrs. Russan and Boyle will do better and less next time. They exhibit all the material—especially full and well-digested information and literary conscientiousness—that good story tellers are made of.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Theory of Wages; and its Application to the Eight Hours Question and other Labour Problems. By Herbert M. Thompson. (Macmillans.) This is a small book, but ambitious. "The economic statements are for the most part those accepted by the economists of to-day"; but it has been the writer's aim "to put together in a concise form the considerations essential to the case scattered through the manuals of Political Economy" (Pref. viii., ix.). In rejecting both the Wages Fund and the Iron Law, Mr. Thompson is certainly orthodox; and his criticism of J. S. Mill's illustrations of the doctrine that a demand for goods is not a demand for labour, harmonises with the general opinion among the orthodox that Mill's reasoning at this point is not free from obscurity. He accepts Prof. Marshall's dictum that we ought to speak not so much of Causality as of Reciprocity; earnings, interest, wages, and prices are "varying proportions of a varying product," "mutually determining" one another, rather than forming a chain of causes and effects. But there he leaves orthodoxy and Prof. Marshall, and propounds a view (supposed long ago dead) that rent too is one of the mutually determining elements. Against Ricardo and nearly all post-Ricardian economists without exception, he maintains that rent enters into price: "rent and prices are mutually determining elements" (p. 63). "Rents having fallen, commodities can be produced more cheaply, because a smaller proportion of their price has to be allocated to the payment of rent" (p. 64). Mr. Thompson's position may perhaps be put in this way. The theory of a Wages Fund made wages to depend positively on capital; the residual theory makes wages to depend negatively on rent, interest, and profits, so that what these leave, labour secures. Both assume that rent is never a cause, but only an effect of the shares of employer and capitalist, if not of labourer. Mr. Thompson holds that even rent is not residual, but the shares of landlord, capitalist, employer, and labourer are all interdependent, and all equally affect price. It appears, however, that he only means that "price can be ultimately analysed so as to trace therein the respective rewards granted to the various agents of production" (p. 10). In other words, if the farmer gets £300 for his wheat crop, part of that sum will be spent by him in paying his rent, as well as part in paying his labourers' wages. In fact, from the farmer's point of view, rent enters into the year's expenses. This homely truth is not in conflict with the classical theory of rent. But neither the farmer's heavy expenses for rent, nor his heavy expenses for labour, nor his outlay for anything else, will enable him to force his own price on a reluctant market. The relation of cost to price deserves more thorough treatment than it gets in the present book; it is rather assumed than proved that (1) aggregate rents affect the aggregate cost of the wheat supply, and (2) the aggregate cost determines the aggregate price. Mr. Thompson in his concluding chapters proceeds largely by means of diagrams, and the diagrams might be convincing if (as so often in economical books) the figures were not arbitrary and made to move this way and that at the will of the author. His general conclusions in regard to the position and prospects of working men and working women seem temperate and just.

Woman's Mission. A series of Congress papers on the Philanthropic Work of Women. Edited by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. (Sampson Low.) This volume is the product of many pens. Descriptive accounts of philanthropic work, contributed by some thirty or forty notable women, form its main substance, each writer treating of her own field of activity. To these the editor has added numerous summarised reports of charitable work that is being carried on both by public institutions and by private enterprise. Containing as it does the impressive and hope-inspiring record of a vast accumulation of strenuous effort, set on foot by Englishwomen in the cause of suffering humanity, the book should prove as welcome to readers over here as to their Chicago kinsfolk, for whose great festival it has been specially compiled. Isolated deeds of mercy, and guardian angels who perform them, come within the experience of most of us; but without something like a connected survey it is not easy to realise the multiplicity of the healing processes that are being daily brought to bear on our innumerable social sores. Nor, perhaps, does the vaguely informed mind always yield a due measure of recognition to the thin rills of endeavour that take their rise over the somewhat stony ground of narrow pietism. We must follow the stream as it grows and widens, to see how successfully the imperious claims of earthly existence and by holding their own beside those of the shadow world beyond the grave. It would take long even to name the barest headings of what is being done: to tell how the lives of little children are upheld and sweetened, how young lads and girls are safeguarded from temptation, and stimulated to self-improvement; to describe the homes of rest for the disabled, the watchful protection of dumb animals, the devices for bringing work and workers face to face, the rescue of the fallen by helping hands. We can only advise women to get a sight of this interesting volume, and study it for themselves. It will even serve to guide such as, having leisure to bestow, are doubtful how it may be best employed. One omission we note with regret—the partial organisation of Women's Trades Unions has not been included in the compiler's array of philanthropic achievement. Yet philanthropy never renders more solid service than when it strives to secure for unprotected workers fair terms and the due reward of toil. The necessity for adventitious aid will diminish only in proportion as the respective claims of employed and employers come to be equitably fixed and dealt with.

Outlines of the Principles of History. By J. G. Droysen. With a biographical sketch of the author. Translated by E. B. Andrews, president of Brown University. (Boston: Ginn.) The late Professor Droysen, of Berlin, is well known as one of the leading representatives of the German school of philosophical historians, and this little volume is very typical of their ideas and way of regarding history. Its phraseology seems at first strange and almost bewildering to an ordinary English reader, but still it contains much that is suggestive to the careful student. The following extract will give a fair notion of the style and matter of the book:

"It is the mistaken pride of the human mind to bolster the circles of what it directly apprehends upon its own angular constructions as their norm or confirmation; while, in fact, these constructions are only effort upon effort gradually to trace a line outside those circles. We deny the spherical lines of faith because our thought cannot exhaust them with its right-lined figures any more than that boy of Augustine's, eagerly as he might bail with his shell, could dry the hole which he had dug on the shore, when the sea was always ready to pour into it."

One of the best parts of the book is devoted to a weighty criticism of Buckle's History of Civilisation, concerning which Droysen remarks with great truth:

"The confusion of which Buckle is guilty is obvious. Because he neglected to examine and sound the nature of the subjects with which he undertook to deal, he proceeds with them as if they did not have any nature or character of their own, and so did not need a method of their own; and the method which he does apply in this department, so foreign to it, avenges itself by making him put up with commonplaces, instead of the calculable formulas in which it elsewhere expresses its laws—commonplaces which may have a certain propriety for to-day and yesterday, but which, in face of history's milleniums, in face of the great social formations of the middle age, of beginning Christianity and of the Greek and Roman world, appear entirely unmeaning."

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE hear that Mr. Grant Allen is thinking of preparing for publication a volume of poems, most of which were written a good many years ago.

THE Rev. John Owen, rector of East Anstey, has written a companion volume to his Skeptics of the Italian Renaissance, dealing with such representative French thinkers as Montaigne, Ramus, and Pascal. It will be published, early in the autumn, by Messrs. Sonnenschein.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will publish on Monday next, under the title of From the Five Rivers, a volume of short stories by Mrs. Steel, author of "Miss Stuart's Legacy," the serial now running in Macmillan's Magazine. They are descriptive of different phases of Indian life, and none of them have before appeared in serial form.

MESSRS. OSGOOD, McILVAINE & Co. will publish immediately an historical romance, in two volumes, by General Lew. Wallace, who has the reputation of being the most popular author in the United States. Under the title of The Prince of India, it describes the capture of Constantinople by Mahommed II.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will publish in the autumn another collection of Mr. F. Anstey's contributions to Punch, with the original illustrations by Mr. J. Bernard Partridge. This will be entitled "The Man from Blankley's: a Story in Scenes, and other Sketches."

MR. JOHN MURRAY announces for early publication a little book by Prof. William Knight, of St. Andrews, entitled The Christian Ethic. The object of the author is to explain from history the type of character and conduct which is the distinctive product of the Christian religion, as contrasted with the other moral systems of the world.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish in the course of next month a translation of Prof. Luigi Cossa's Introduction to the Study of Political Economy. The translator is Mr. Louis Dyer, who, in co-operation with the author, has revised the work and brought it down to date, and has also added a subject-index.

DR. HENRY BARBER has in the press an elaborate work on British Family Names: Their Origin and Meaning, which will be published by Mr. Henry Gray, of Leicester-square. After a general introduction, the author first deals with those surnames which are derived from places, trades, offices, tribes or clans, nicknames, Christian names, &c. He then discusses those which are ancient patronymics, arranging them under Old Norse, Frisian, Anglo-Saxon, and Norman. For this portion of his book, he has made much use of the Icelandic Landnamabok, and of the Domesday Survey. Finally, he gives an alphabetical list of about eight thousand modern surnames, classified under their various origins.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co will publish, towards the end of September, a new novel, by Mr. Frankfort Moore, entitled A Gray Eye or So. The same author's recent novel, I Forbid the Banns, has already reached a fifth edition.

THERE will shortly be published, in the series of "Cornell Studies in Classical Philology," a treatise by Dr. G. W. Botsford, extending to about 350 pages, upon The Development of the Earlier Athenian Constitution. It will set forth the genesis of Greek political institutions from their primitive Aryan forms; and it is intended not merely for the specialist in classical history, but also for the student of sociology.

MR. H. JOHNSON, editor of On Sledge and Horseback to Outcast Siberian Lepers, which has already reached a fifth edition, is preparing a short Life of Miss Kate Marsden. The volume will be issued simultaneously in England and America, the Record Press being the publishers in this country.

MESSRS. JAMES NISBET & Co. are about to publish a book on Betting and Gambling, by Major Seton Churchill, as a companion to "Forbidden Fruit for Young Men," by the same author.

THE Lambeth Palace Library will be closed for the usual recess for six weeks after Wednesday next, August 30.

THE Gypsy Lore Society, late of Edinburgh, is now being revived in Hungary, with the Archduke Joseph as patron, Mr. Charles G. Leland as president, and Mr. D. Mac Ritchie as hon. secretary. The organ for publication is the Ethnologische Mittheilungen, of Buda-Pest, edited by Prof. Dr. Anton Herrmann.

WE learn from the New York Nation that the Congress of Brazil has refused to ratify the copyright treaty with France, which was negotiated so long ago as January, 1891. The chief argument against the treaty was thus formulated in the report of the committee of Congress:—

"Our journalism, which is the main factor of popular instruction, would be deprived of the inexhaustible source whence it seeks the material necessary to the fulfilment of its civilising and patriotic mission."

And again:

"Treaties, as a rule, are of advantage only to the strong nations, serving them as a pretext, thanks to the niceties of interpretation which they keep in reserve, to over-ride the most elementary principles of international law, and to subject weak nations to humiliations."

MR. ALFRED ANSCOMBE (of 28, Carlingford-road, Green Lanes, Tottenham) has sent us the second of his privately printed Chronological Tracts. The first, it may be remembered, dealt with the date of the obit of St. Columba, and aimed at refuting those who would apply a cycle of eighty-four years to the computation of the British and Irish Easter. The present one treats of St. Gildas of Ruys and the Irish regal chronology of the sixth century. First, we have the year of the obit of St. Gildas fixed at 554 instead of 570, as commonly accepted; next, the ferial chronology of Tighernach is compared with the chronology of later authorities, with the result that the reign of Ainnire has to be antedated by some nineteen years, so as to allow of St. Gildas's visit to him in 549; then, the chronology of the eclipses in the earlier part of the Annals of Tighernach is examined; and, finally, the epistle of St. Gildas to the kings and clergy of Britain is dated in 499, and early in that year rather than late. We may add that Mr. Ancombe promises a third Chronological Tract for October, upon the computation of the schismatic Easter of the ancient churches of the British Isles.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE September number of the United Service Magazine will contain the following articles: "The Protection of our Mercantile Marine in time of War," by Vice-Admiral P. H. Colomb; "The Rulers of India," by Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff; "Regimental Histories," by Col. J. F. Maurice; "The Settlement of the Franco-Siamese Question," by Lord Lamington; and "The Peace of Europe," by Dr. Karl Blind, giving an account of the Pan Slavist propaganda.

AMONG the contents of the September number of the English Illustrated will be "A Talk with Mr. Clark Russell on his Sea Novels," by Mr. Raymond Blathwayt. The Hon. R. Lytton contributes a paper on "Cricket," and Mr. Frederick Dolman an article on Mr. Chamberlain's collection of orchids, illustrated from photographs; while "Q." writes on "Living English Poets."

THE Magazine of Art will contain an article, by Mr. Wilfrid Meynell, on "Portraits of Cardinal Manning," which is illustrated with eleven reproductions, including the oil paintings by Messrs. Richmond, Watts, and Oulless, and the dry-point by Mr. Mortimer Menpes.

THE Art Journal for September will contain an illustrated paper entitled "Indoor Venice," by Lady Colin Campbell, and another by Prof. R. A. M. Stevenson on the collection of pictures owned by Mr. Justice Day. The plates for this number will be "Cromwell at Ripley Castle," by R. Lehmann, which forms the text of an article by Miss Kingsley, and Fred. Walker's "Harbour of Refuge," with a note by Mr. F. G. Stephens.

THE September number of the National Review will contain the following articles:—"The Behring Sea Award," by Mr. Staveley Hill; "Judas," by Admiral Maxse; "An Englishwoman in Tibet," by Miss Taylor; "The Rupee Difficulty," by the Hon. Evelyn Hubbard; and "Ethics of Field Sports," by Mr. W. Earl Hodgson.

DR. KARL BLIND will contribute to the forthcoming number of the New Review a paper entitled, "Shetland Folklore and the Old Faith of the Scandinavians and Teutons," dealing with survivals of Nature worship.

ON August 30 will be published the first number of a new volume of Chums, containing the commencement of two serial stories, viz.:—"Twixt Earth and Ocean; or, Lost on Du Corrig," by Mr. Standish O'Grady; and "Under the Shadow of Night," by Mr. D. H. Parry. An interview with Lord Charles Beresford will appear in the same issue.

THE Lichfield Diocesan Mission Council has decided to start an illustrated weekly children's paper, to be called Brave and True. It will be edited by the Rev. A. Whymper, of Nottingham, and published by Messrs. Bemoore & Sons. The first number will be ready in September.

MISS E. EVERETT-GREEN is about to contribute to the Christian Pictorial a serial story, entitled "Locked on the Inside."

THE scarcity of new books is so great that the National Observer proposes to fill its literary section this week with reviews of old ones, done in several styles from the point of view of to-day. The list includes "In Memoriam," "Ivanhoe," the first two volumes of Macaulay's History, "Boxiana," and so forth.

TRANSLATION.

PETRARCH TO DEATH (AFTER SONNET CCLXXXII).

It lies with Death to take the beauty of Laura, but not her gracious memory.

Now hast thou touch'd thy stretch of power, O Death;

Thy brigandage hath beggar'd Love's demesne
And quench'd the lamp that lit it, and the queen
Of all the flowers enapp'd with thy ragged teeth.

Hollow and meagre stares our life beneath
The querulous moon, robbed of its sovereign:
Yet the report of her, her deathless mien—
Not thine, O Churl! Not thine, thou greedy Death!

They are with her in Heaven, the which her grace,
Like some brave light, gladdens exceedingly And shoots chance beams to this our dwelling-place:

So art thou swallowed in her victory.
And me her beauty whelmed in very sooth,
On me that last-born angel shall have ruth.

MAURICE HEWLETT.

NOTES ON TWO RECENT EDITIONS OF WORDSWORTH.

I.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF WORDSWORTH'S POEMS.

IN the notice of Prof. Dowden's edition of Wordsworth's poetical works contained in the Athenaeum of August 12, there occurs a sentence which appears to me loudly to demand explanation. The review as a whole is manifestly the work of a writer of culture and research, who for the most part expresses his views on matters of criticism with a genial candour as charming as it is uncommon; but we venture to think that most persons who know anything at all about the question will stare in perplexed astonishment when they come upon the following sentence:

"There is finally [i.e., in Prof. Dowden's edition] a chronological table which is a great improvement on those which have preceded it—tables, however, which, it is only just to remember, were necessarily of the nature of trial-lists."

By "the tables which have preceded it" the reviewer of course means (1) the chronological table printed by Prof. Knight at the close of the Preface to the first volume of his edition of the Poetical Works (1882); (2) the second, revised table first printed in the Transactions of the Wordsworth Society (July, 1885), and subsequently included in vol. viii. of Knight's Edition of the Poetical Works; and (3) the table prefixed to the poems in Macmillan's one-volume edition of 1888. Of these three tables, No. 3 is an almost verbatim reprint of No. 2.

In the observation quoted above, then, the reviewer clearly admits the inferior worth of Prof. Knight's chronological tables, and endeavours partly to account for and justify it by referring to the necessarily tentative nature of these lists. But what, we ask, is the true meaning of this term "trial-list"? Does it imply any uncertainty, any tentativeness other or greater than that which attaches to every chronological table drawn up under the conditions of partial and imperfect information? We cannot conceive how it can be explained to do so; unless, indeed, we are to take the reviewer's words to mean that Prof. Knight's tables are nothing better than rough-and-ready lists of poems to which haphazard dates have been assigned in rudely and randomly conjectural fashion, and which are intended merely to serve as a starting-point or basis of operations in the slow and laborious process of ascertaining and verifying the chronological order of the poems. Should this chance to be the particular force of the term "trial-list" as here employed by the reviewer, we are persuaded that Prof. Knight himself would be the first to repudiate a suggestion which would impute to his chronological lists any lack of authoritative certainty other than that inevitable under the circumstances of imperfect knowledge in which they were drawn up. The subject of chronology from the very first holds a prominent place in Prof. Knight's edition of the Poems; nor is there either in his Preface or in his earlier notes even the very faintest trace of dissatisfaction with or misgiving for the table given in his first volume. On the contrary, he anticipates nothing beyond the very narrow margin of error pardonable if not absolutely inevitable in a table of such extent and detail. His own words on the subject are:—

"As the chronological arrangement is not only important in itself, but also in its bearing on other features of this edition, a complete list of the poems thus arranged is given at the close of the Preface to this volume. It is perhaps too much to hope, however—even after every effort has been made—that perfect accuracy as to the date of each poem, in a list of between eight and nine hundred, has been finally secured." (Note 2, p. xvii., vol. i., Knight's Ed.). Words which assuredly indicate in the clearest manner that, in its author's eyes at least, the table given in vol. i. was far from being the mere rough-and-ready "trial-list" that the Athenæum reviewer apparently desires to represent it. Again, Prof. Dowden's chronological table, "improvement" though it unquestionably is, must yet be regarded as a "trial-list" so far as its conjectural dates—and they are not a few—are concerned. But this fact would never even for a moment be admitted by an impartial critic to afford the least excuse for any carelessness or lack of due research in the correction and verification of the dates; nor can such a plea be now advanced with any show of candour in excuse for or palliation of the teeming blunders of Prof. Knight's tables. Again, if Prof. Knight's second, revised table be merely "of the nature of a trial-list" (understanding that term in whatever special depreciatory sense the reviewer wishes to attach to it), how comes it that the poems in Macmillan's one-volume edition of 1888 are printed in the order prescribed by it without a single word of warning, explanation, or qualification to the student, for whose use the book is specially designed? (It is hardly necessary to explain that the chronological table prefixed to Macmillan's edition is almost word for word identical with that given by Knight in vol. viii. of his edition of the Poetical Works). Or how, indeed, comes it that Prof. Knight ventured to print the poems in his edition according to the order prescribed by a table which was merely

"of the nature of a trial-list"? Surely it was, to say the least, the height of folly to adopt an arrangement based upon a mere trial-list for an edition of the Poems which a great critic once pronounced "safe to become the standard and definitive edition of Wordsworth"! We fancy that we can discern between the lines of the reviewer's observations quoted above a good-natured desire to lighten the weight of blame attaching to Prof. Knight for the inaccurate character of his chronological work. But in such delicate matters zeal may easily outrun discretion; and the reviewer would do well to beware lest, while endeavouring to relieve Prof. Knight from the charge of laxity in the verification of his dates, he does not ultimately involve him in the far more serious charge of deliberately electing to arrange the material of what once promised to be an exhaustive and definitive edition of the Poems in the order prescribed by a mere rough and ready trial-list, a rude temporary makeshift the unstable character of which none could have known better than he who had hastily put it together to serve as something for the chronologist to work upon.

And now it is time for us to turn to the tables themselves, and endeavour to ascertain how far they fall short of the high pitch of accuracy which is reached in the chronological work recently given to us in Prof. Dowden's seven volumes. We have said that the subject of chronology holds a prominent place in Prof. Knight's edition of the Poems. In fact, not only does he prefix to each several poem of the eight volumes the date both of composition and of publication; not only does he frequently pause to discuss obscure or disputed questions of chronology in prefatory note or postscript; but he has, along with all this, made two successive attempts to construct a synoptical table containing "A list of Wordsworth's poems arranged in chronological order, as far as can be determined from accessible data." Of the earlier of these two tables—that prefixed to the poems of volume i.—we are relieved from the task of making any examination by Prof. Knight himself, who, within one twelvemonth from the date of its publication, repudiated it as no longer representative of the existing condition of our knowledge. It is to the second table—that which originally appeared in the Transactions of the Wordsworth Society (July 1885), and was afterwards printed at the end of volume viii. of the Poetical Works (1886)—that our attention must be mainly directed, because this is the last table published by Prof. Knight, who, had he suspected it of being seriously inaccurate or imperfect, had an excellent opportunity of recalling it in favour of a third revised table when he was preparing the Life of William Wordsworth for publication in 1888. It is true that in a note on page 21, vol. ii., of the Life he refers to certain errors still remaining in the second table; but these (as he seems to have thought) inconsiderable survivals he promises to correct in the volume of Selections by the members of the Wordsworth Society, which, he announces, is to appear in the autumn (of 1889). This table of the Transactions, then, and of vol. viii. of the Poetical Works—inasmuch as it was the last table issued by Prof. Knight—we are justified in regarding as (with the exceptions above-mentioned) his final and authoritative pronouncement on the question of chronology; and as such it has been reprinted almost verbatim by Messrs. Macmillan, who have placed it in the forefront of their one-volume edition of Wordsworth, to serve the double purpose of a chronological synopsis and a table of contents. To the examination of this second table, then, let us now betake ourselves without further delay.

In Prof. Knight's revised table of 1885-86 the poems are arranged in groups according to the (ascertained or conjectural) year of their production; the title of each poem being given precisely as it appears in the author's final edition of 1849-50, and the first line of the poem added below in smaller type. Where no title is found—as is the case with the majority of the sonnets, for example—the first line only is given. Over against the title—or the first line—there stand two dates, the year of composition and the year of publication; so that the table consists of a triple column, thus:

Composed.	Title	Published
1799	A Poet's Epitaph	1800
	"Art thou a Statist in the Van."

So much for the plan on which the table is drawn up. What concerns us, however, is not the symmetrical construction of the table but the question, What value should we attach to the dates it contains? With regard to one set of dates—viz., those which mark the year of publication, there ought to be, one should think, little doubt or difficulty. It ought, beyond all question, to be possible to state correctly at least the dates of the publication of each of Wordsworth's poems. Except a very few pieces which were inserted in journals, such as the Courier or the Morning Post, or contributed to some annual, such as the Keepsake, and one or two more, e.g., "The Eagle and the Dove," which first appeared in the volume entitled La petite Chouannerie, the poems, as a rule, made their earliest appearance in the pages of that long series of editions published during the lifetime of the author. These are every one accessible to the student; and all that need be done in order to fix the publication-date of a given poem, is to trace it as far backwards as it reaches through the series which, terminating in 1849-50, extends through 1845, 1843, 1842, 1838, 1836-7, 1835, 1832, 1827, 1822, 1820, 1819, 1816, 1815, 1814, 1807, 1800, and 1798 as far back as to 1793. Practically, of course, this tedious though absolutely simple process will not be often required by the student who has any acquaintance worth mentioning with the poems. It is only when he comes to the pieces of minor importance or narrower range of popularity that he will find it necessary to have recourse to the irksome but infallible search-process. But no matter how tedious and cumbersome the method, what conceivable excuse can there be for the neglect or evasion of it when the main object in view is the construction of an absolutely impeccable table of reference? Having premised thus much, let us turn to Prof. Knight's table, and test the accuracy of the publication-dates given therein by comparing them with the testimony afforded by the several editions of the Poems. The result may be most conveniently conveyed in a tabular form:

If this table of ours be correct—and we venture to think it will bear the strictest investigation—Prof. Knight has, in attempting to carry out the perfectly simple, though no doubt mechanical and tedious task of fixing the publication-dates of the poems, actually erred in more than fifty instances! Figures are sometimes eloquent things; here, for instance, they speak volumes, and comment, happily, is not required, since, if it were, it would be a most painful task. Let us therefore, now proceed without further delay to examine the remaining column of dates in Prof. Knight's table, viz., that containing the dates of composition. These dates, we may observe, are not by any means so easily got at as the dates of publication, and, in some instances, cannot be ascertained without a good deal of troublesome research.

Knight's date of composition.	Title.	True date of composition.
1799	"I come, ye little noisy Crew"	1798
1799	There was a Boy	1798
1799	The Simplon Pass	(P) 1804

To these fifty-one instances of Prof. Knight's inaccuracy in the matter of composition-dates, we must add seventeen sonnets from the Itinerary Series of 1837 dated by Prof. Knight 1837, but in fact written in 1841; and at least as many more from the poems grouped under the year 1827, of which not more than two or three can have been written in that year. This gives the very formidable total of eighty-five misdatings in the composition-date column of the table, as against fifty-four misdatings in the column indicating the date of publication.

It would be impossible to describe the process of investigating the dates of composition better than by quoting the account which Prof. Knight gives of it in the Preface to his edition of the Poems (vol. 1, pp. xiv.-xv.):

"It is only by comparing Wordsworth's own lists of dates with the contents of the several editions of his works, with the Fenwick Notes, and with his sister's journal, that we can reconstruct the true chronology. To these must be added the internal evidence of the poems themselves, incidental references in letters to his friends, and stray hints gathered from miscellaneous quarters."

It would have been well indeed both for Prof. Knight's reputation as an editor and for the efficiency of his book had he made regular and persevering use of the various subsidiary aids to the chronology of the poems which he here so clearly enumerates. But unhappily he seems to have lacked the plodding patience necessary for such a tedious and uninviting task. No doubt there are some items in the second errata list given above, for which Prof. Knight cannot justly be held accountable. For instance, the two sonnets referred by him to 1841 were actually written in the preceding year; but of this fact there existed—so far as we are aware—no evidence within Prof. Knight's reach until the publication of certain hitherto inedited letters of Wordsworth in the Cornhill Magazine of this year. But such cases are few and inconsiderable. In by far the greater number of instances Prof. Knight's mistakes are such as could easily have been avoided at the expense of a little research either into Dorothy Wordsworth's Journals, or else amongst the Wordsworth Correspondence, or even, it may be, into the internal evidence of the poem under examination. Had he read the Grasmere Journal carefully through, for example, he would not have fallen into the error of assigning the poem of "The Seven Sisters" to the year 1804; for Dorothy Wordsworth writes on August 17, 1800, "William read us the Seven Sisters." The same authority would have set him right as to the date of "Resolution and Independence," had he consulted it more carefully than he saw fit to do. On the other hand, by too blindly following the lead of the Grasmere Journal, he has failed to hit upon the exact date of the "Westminster Bridge" sonnet. That Journal contains frequent instances of erroneous date-entries; among the rest, it gives "Saturday, July 30, 1802," as the day on which Wordsworth and his sister left London by the Dover coach at half past five in the morning, and this date Prof. Knight was content to transfer, without examining it, to his chronological table. But in fact Saturday was not the 30th, but the 31st, of July; and so it happens that this unlucky sonnet, which has been misdated in every successive edition of the Poems since its first appearance in the two volumes of 1807, finds itself for the first time correctly dated on page xliii. of Prof. Dowden's memoir of the poet (Aldine Edition, vol. i., p. xliii). Again, the Grasmere Journal supplies us with the true date of the "Cuckoo" poem, and with that of the beautiful verses beginning "When, to the attractions of the busy world," which Dorothy Wordsworth calls the "Firgrove," or the "Inscription of the Pathway"; but in neither of these instances has Prof. Knight deferred to it. To proceed, the Coleorton Correspondence would have enabled Prof. Knight to assign correct dates to the Michael Angelo sonnets, had he taken the trouble to consult it; and from the same quarter the sonnets to the poet, John Dyer, and to Lady Fitzgerald—and possibly many other poems—might have been furnished with their respective actual dates. Our space is too narrow for any further continuation of this running commentary; but we must find room for the following example of Prof. Knight's extraordinary rashness of statement. In the prefatory note to the "Character of the Happy Warrior" (vol. iv., p. 1) he says, "Wordsworth left Grasmere with his household for Coleorton in November 1806, and we have no proof that he returned to Westmorland till April, 1808"; and he proceeds to fix the date of several poems on the assumption that Wordsworth did not return till the date last mentioned. Now, as a matter of fact, the Wordsworths returned from Coleorton to Grasmere in August, 1807. In October of that year De Quincey paid his first visit to Dove Cottage. In November Mrs. Wordsworth went to her brother at Stockton-on-Tees, whither Wordsworth followed her on December 1, the two returning together to Grasmere on Wednesday, December 23, 1807. The movements of Wordsworth and his wife during the last months of 1807 are fully reported in the Coleorton Correspondence, which Prof. Knight had before him when he was preparing the notes of his fourth volume; and the visit paid by De Quincey in October to the Wordsworth's Grasmere cottage home is recorded by him among his famous Reminiscences of the Lake Country, and forms by no means the least remarkable of that series of memorable episodes. It cannot be but that Prof. Knight has read De Quincey's narrative again and again, and he has himself prepared for the press an edition of the Coleorton Correspondence; and yet he tells us in his Introduction to "The Happy Warrior" that we have no proof that Wordsworth returned from Coleorton to Westmoreland between November 1806 and April 1808! What are we to think of this random talking? It were better not to speak our mind about it too openly, so we will content ourselves with borrowing an apostrophe from the late Post Laureate, and say, "O irresponsible and indolent editor!"

The truth is that Prof. Knight seems constitutionally incapable of strict accuracy of statement. He is not of the stuff of which editors should be made. Everywhere up and down throughout his eleven Wordsworth volumes do we find innumerable instances of slipshod inaccuracies and ludicrous blunders. He tells us (P. W. vol. v., p. 15) that the "Excursion" was included in the four-volume edition of 1820; that Wordsworth's letter to Barron Field (Life iii., pp. 150-156) was written on the changes in the text of the poems introduced into the edition of 1836 (!) whereas the letter is dated October 24, 1828; he explains Dorothy Wordsworth's entries in her Journal, "William wrote part of the poem to Coleridge" (December 26, 1801), and "William was working at his poem to C." (January 11, 1803), as though they referred to the "Castle of Indolence" stanzas, whereas they, of course, have both of them reference to the "Prelude"; he jumbles up the "Birth of Love" with the "Eagle and the Dove" in a manner indescribably funny. He says of the lines beginning "Yes! it was the mountain echo!" "in the edition of 1827, this poem was called 'The Echo'"; he gives the words, "Happy child who art so exquisitely wild!" as a quotation from the "Triad"; he says of "Alice Fell" that it was omitted from the editions of 1820 and 1832 only; and he says hundreds of other untrue things. His collation of the texts of Wordsworth is absolutely useless, so many are the omissions and so serious are the blunders and misprints which are to be found in the readings recorded. In a word, he has proved in the most incontestable manner his own absolute unfitness for the office of editor of Wordsworth's Poetical Works. In a recent paper in the Athenæum, his edition of the Poems is described as "monumental." A book may be monumental of several things: Prof. Knight's edition of the poems is monumental in this sense, that it is, and will long remain, a lasting monument to his utter (editorial) incapacity.

P.S.—I hope to give some account, in an early number of the ACADEMY, of the revised dates introduced into the volume of Selections by the Wordsworth Society, and also to deal with the subject of the collation of the text.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"FOUNDERS OF OLD TESTAMENT CRITICISM."
Rochester: August 21, 1893.

The supply of competent reviewers of books on Old Testament criticism is so limited that I wish to thank Mr. Benn for his reviews of such books in the ACADEMY. He is not, indeed, a specialist; but he has read and thought much on the general aspects of criticism, and he has a most refreshing eagerness in the pursuit of truth. This same eagerness, however, characterises his reviews, and sometimes leads him into unintentional injustice. Will he let me indicate some points in which he has, from this eagerness, misunderstood my recent book, Founders of Old Testament Criticism, reviewed in the last number of the ACADEMY?

1. I did not attempt the task of a history of Old Testament criticism, because the time has not yet come for such a work. A useful substitute for it might indeed be produced for English readers; but if well done, from an advanced point of view, it would not succeed, and it is only a young scholar who could afford to do it otherwise than well.

2. I did not profess to deal with "the founders," but with "founders," such as could be dealt with in "personal" as well as "critical" sketches. Some of the "founders" selected were only such from an English point of view; but have I not a right to include such men? We sometimes congratulate ourselves on the root which Old Testament criticism has taken in England. For my part, I cannot see this; it is being founded—it is not founded yet.

3. I do not remember that I have included any scholars (plural) "who attempted unsuccessfully to overthrow the edifice" of criticism.

An exception is indeed made for Hengstenberg; but I have pointed out why, from an English point of view, Hengstenberg must be regarded as to some extent a "founder."

4. Richard Simon and Astruc are not included among the "founders": first, because they are rather "pioneers" than "founders," and, next, because my book was not intended to be a large one, and these workers had been very fully dealt with by Prof. Curtiss. The first real scientific critic of the Old Testament is, in my judgment, Eichhorn.

5. Graf was not included, chiefly because it was not possible to give a personal sketch of that most meritorious, though not original, scholar. I had no intention of "covering this omission" by a reference to Westphal on Hexateuch criticism, though the first (not the second) volume of this young French scholar's work deserves (and has received from me) high commendation.

6. My object was to see whether the exhibition of true, as opposed to false, reverence would justify an honest and thorough criticism in the eyes of the orthodox. One must still wait to see this. I wish for reform, and not destruction, of the historical Church. It is not probable that I have anywhere said that the needs of "essential orthodoxy" were limiting conditions of historical speculation. Mr. Benn might read p. 286 over again.

7. I willingly accept the reviewer's criticism of my too allusive style. I do not like a diffuse style myself, and may run into the other extreme. Nor do I like "plain speaking" to scholars whom I respect even while I criticise them—to Prof. Davidson for instance. Most of my student-readers are acquainted with the Expositor and with the useful Critical Review, edited by Dr. Salmond. They know Elmalie's only too sympathetic sketch of the Professor of Hebrew at New College, Edinburgh; they have read the passage to which I refer, and are well aware of Prof. Davidson's custom of using ridicule in support of argument. I object to this custom, and think it unwise in the Professor, who has many weak points in his armour, to adopt it.

8. I would rather confide the defence of the Book of Esther, as a subject for "reverent study," to a learned Israelite, who had felt by sympathy the bitterness of the persecutions which his ancestors had undergone. All critical scholars who have held Church offices are liable to the charge of occasional inconsistency with their principles. But I have, long before Mr. Benn, opposed the separation between literary and historical criticism which some of our best English writers seem for the present to favour. The paragraph following that on Esther in Mr. Benn's review seems, therefore, to me inappropriate.

9. I have not "gone out of my way" to refer to Christian doctrine. Dr. Sanday, in a passage quoted by me, said that a Christian critic might well hesitate to desert the tradition of the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel on theological grounds. It would have been mean-spirited in me if I had not expressed disagreement with this influential and justly reputed scholar. The hindrances to the thorough study of the Old Testament in England come in no slight degree from New Testament students, who are, as it seems to me, behindhand in the higher criticism of the New Testament books. If I believe, as the result of many years' study, that the unique consciousness and religious position of Jesus Christ is supported by historical and psychological criticism of the Gospels, to express this belief is the fullest justification which I can give for an attitude towards criticism different in some degree from that of Prof. Sanday, and in a very much greater degree from that of most other Church scholars.

In conclusion, I have no desire to appeal against any verdict which the reviewer may be pleased to pass on this reply. I well know the imperfections in the form of my book, which I shall scarcely find time to remedy.

T. K. CHEYNE.

DWARFS IN THE PYRENEES.

French, Loch Tummel, N.B.: August 18, 1893.

I have read with interest the letters by Mr. Haliburton and Mr. Stuart Glennie on this subject; and if the question has not already been sufficiently discussed, I venture to add a few remarks of my own. My reason for doing this is that, whereas neither of these gentlemen, nor the Consul at Barcelona, nor, apparently, the majority of Mr. Glennie's correspondents, if not all of them, have seen any specimens of the dwarfs referred to by Mr. Haliburton, it has been my lot to encounter two or three of them. My information is very meagre, but it is to the following effect.

Some years ago I spent six or seven weeks in French Catalonia (Roussillon), in the Valley of the Tech. The time was winter, and I was there chiefly for the benefit of my health; consequently, my walks were limited in their range. One day, however, as I was following the path which, skirting the "foot-hills" of the Pyrenees, leads from Amélie-les-Bains to the small town of Arles-sur-Tech, I heard a hoarse cry on the hillside above me, and, on looking up, "was ware of" a grotesque dwarfish figure hastily descending a ravine that eventually joined my path. His height—for the dwarf was a male—was somewhere about four and a half feet. But as to that, and the exact shade of his complexion, which, I think, was decidedly darker than that of the surrounding peasantry, I have only my memory to trust to, and cannot speak with absolute certainty. As he drew nearer, I felt less and less inclination to make his acquaintance. He was obviously an imbecile, and his ugly face wore a sullen and even threatening expression. Such language as he possessed was presumably Catalan, of which I only knew a few words. So I let him go on his way without attempting to speak to him. If I remember rightly, he was carrying a pack of some kind, and had a staff in his hand, and he was making for Arles by a cross road. Some days later, I saw another dwarf of similar appearance, at a town farther down the Tech Valley. And on a third occasion, when I was driving with a Catalan gentleman in the same neighbourhood, we passed a male dwarf who may or may not have been one of those two. In answer to a question of mine, my friend merely dismissed him with some such word as crétin (it was not "crétin," however, though he was speaking French). He evidently did not regard the subject as interesting, and I did not pursue it further. But he impressed me with the idea that he did not understand this dwarf to belong to a separate race.

These, then, were presumably examples of the "goitreus de petite taille" indicated by Mr. Glennie's correspondent; for, although they had no strongly-developed goître, they were undoubtedly of the crétin type. But, on the other hand, they were dwarfs, and equally supported Mr. Haliburton's contention. For my own part, I should be disposed to say that they represented a racial type. I find it very difficult to believe that any inherited or acquired diathesis could transform some members of the handsome Catalan people into those imbecile dwarfs. Indeed, this consideration raises the whole question of crétinism. One ethnologist (whose name I forget, and I am at present too far from libraries to ascertain it) has boldly asserted that the crétin is simply a "throw-back" upon primitive man; and the occurrence of the type in certain districts would thus mean that primitive tribes had survived longer in those districts, and that the occasional appearance of a crétin in the general population signified an inheritance of some of that blood. Certainly, when I think of those Pyrenean dwarfs, and of others that I have seen in Switzerland and Hungary, they seem to me akin to each other, and not to the surrounding populations. This idea is interesting. Dr. George Macdonald has a gruesome story of a noble family in the north-east of Scotland, whose last representative, by a freak of atavism, did not resemble any of his ancestors for many centuries, but was "a primaeval savage" (locally described as an "etin"), a ferocious cannibal who, one day when his keeper was off guard, snatched a baby from its mother's arms and plunged it into the seething broth-pot. The same idea is present in another novel, which is based upon the humorous incident of a young married couple—white people, but of whom one had inherited negro blood through a remote ancestor—who were suddenly staggered by finding themselves the parents of a black child. Both this young "negro" and the Scotch "etin," therefore, while of immense rarity in the general stock, represented distinct racial types; and were not mere "sports" of nature. So, also, is the crétin, according to one ethnologist at least.

However, the question as to whether the Pyrenean dwarfs are racial or not could be settled to Mr. Stuart Glennie's satisfaction by a visit of two or three days. He would find the town of Gercna well worthy of a visit; and I fancy the Collado de Tosas is within "striking" distance of it; perhaps the Val de Ribas also. Or, one might cross from the French side, going up to Cérét from Perpignan by rail, and thence walking or driving for a couple of days. I do not suppose that there is any very large colony of dwarfs, crétins or not, in the eastern extremity of the Pyrenees; for the fact would then have been settled long ago beyond dispute. But the distinct accounts quoted by Mr. Haliburton, combined with my own casual experience, lead me to believe that there are still many representatives of an ancient dwarf type in that locality.

DAVID MACRITCHIE.

PROF. ZIMMER ON NENNIUS.

London: August 21, 1893.

May I point out that Gilla Coemain is the usual form of the name which Prof. Zimmer doubtless correctly prints G. Coemgin? I adhered to the form commonly found in English and French works on the subject, in order to avoid any doubt as to who was meant.

Your correspondent's correction of l. 33, col. 3, of 132 in my first letter, "earlier" instead of "later," is uncalled for. Prof. Zimmer's object is to determine a terminus a quo for the date of the North Welsh recension: Elbodug died in 809, and the redactor alludes to him in the past tense; ergo, the redaction must be later than 809. But the redactor may have lived half a century longer than Elbodug for aught we know to the contrary. Prof. Zimmer therefore considers carefully the nature of his references to Elbodug, and concludes from them that he wrote very soon after the Archbishop's death; ergo, that his recension cannot be "later" than 810.

Your correspondent's correction (same col., l. 55), "a predecessor of the Harleian and Vatican recensions" for "the prototype of the existing Harley recension" seems to me ill-advised. What requires emphasis is that the peculiarities of the existing Harley recension go back to the disordered condition of a particular MS. I may be wrong, but my words seem to me to emphasise this fact more than your correspondent's. I thankfully acknowledge his correction of the remainder of the passage. 3 for 2 is a misprint which I should have noted.

May I correct in my second letter, p. 152, col. 3, l. 32, that annoying misprint, "Cymrodor" for "Cymrodor"; also l. 19, "Ansims" for "Ansims"; and add after Gildas (l. 29), "or a fellow pupil or scholar of his"?

I should like to add that my only object in publishing summaries of Prof. Zimmer's investigations, which I am compelled to make for my own use, is to direct attention to and win fresh readers for the books themselves. I should be very sorry if anybody looked upon my summary as in the slightest degree doing away with the necessity of consulting the original.

ALFRED NUTT.

SCIENCE.

Birds in a Village. By W. H. Hudson. (Chapman & Hall.)

READERS of Mr. Hudson's delightful books on La Plata and Patagonia must often have wished that he would bring his poetic insight to bear upon British bird-life. In the half-dozen essays of which the present volume is made up, he has done so; and the result is that everyone will greedily wish for more.

The first paper, which gives its name to the volume, is so charmingly written, such a mixture of keen observation and clever assumption, that he who peruses it asks why he has never noticed these traits of the familiar birds of garden and hedgerow; and genius demands no further encomium. It resembles the reading of a poem which is faultless in form and spirit. The impression left upon the reader is that these thoughts and much the same expression of them have ever been in his own mind. Mr. Hudson is a very loving student of birds. No movement, no twitter, no cadence of song escapes him; and his analytic mind at once asks the reason of all these changeable habits. He is glad of a new problem in the economy of birds. Why does the reed-warbler when disturbed express such feelings as alarm, suspicion, solicitude, perhaps anger, by bursting into the same song? Why in some birds have the harsh grating sounds which imply emotions of a painful kind been lost? What has led in some species to the suppression of the fluttering on the ground and gasping, as it were, for breath when alarmed for their young ones' safety, which are so accentuated in the proceedings of other and perhaps kindred species? Such ornithological psychology as this opens a wide field of speculation. It is not likely that all will agree with Mr. Hudson's conclusions; but they can scarcely help admiring the subtlety and grasp of his intellect, and they will certainly be thankful for having their thoughts directed to a side of bird life which has hitherto been very inadequately treated.

The carefulness of Mr. Hudson's powers of observation is well seen in the few but telling phrases in which he hits off the character of a bird or of its song. Who does not recognise the tree pipit's habits in the following admirable description?

"He sang in the air, and, circling gracefully down, would alight on the branch, where sitting near me and plainly visible he would finish his song and renew it at intervals; then, leaving the loved perch, he would drop singing to the ground just a few yards beyond the tree's shadow; thence, singing again, he would mount up and up above the tree, only to slide down once more with set, unfluttering wings, with a beautiful swaying motion, to the same old resting place on the branch, there to sing and sing and sing."

It would be difficult to characterise a bird better in one line than Mr. Hudson describes starlings, "gurgling, jarring, clicking, whistling, chattering." Similarly, a line brings the flight of pigeons perfectly before the reader. Surely no apology is needed for another extract.

"We have too much of the sparrow. But we are to blame for that. He is the unskilled worker that nature has called in to do the work of skilled hands, which we have foolishly turned away. He is willing enough to take it all on himself; his energy is great; he bumbles away without ceasing; and being one of a joyous temperament he whistles and sings in his tuneless fashion at his work until, like the grasshopper of Ecclesiastes, he becomes a burden."

Mr. Hudson finds fifty-nine species in his village, and moralises over but a few; yet his readers feel that a new sense of bird-character has been revealed to them. Now a problem is set before them: Why is the wryneck scarcer than it was? What forbids many exotic birds from being naturalised in England? and the like. At another time he waxes vivacious over a paradox: over "that dismal croaker, the wood-pigeon"; or the few that find delight in reading the natural history of birds, while he is almost overcome with the thought of "an England without a wryneck." Then he breaks out into flashes of poetry, and gleams and coruscates like one of his own South American humming birds over a cluster of blossoms, until the reader is fain to take breath and ask if all this iridescence and glow is to be seen in an English hedgerow or a moss-grown orchard. Think of "the minute gossamer clinging to the fine silvery hairs of the flying summer and the cocoon that falls from the fruit-trees to float on the buoyant cottony down—a summer snow"; or of one of the moths that flit by in the evening:

"thus in his larval life does he symbolise some restless nation that makes itself many successive constitutions and forms of government, in none of which it abides long; but afterwards some higher thing, when he rests motionless, in form like a sarcophagus, whence the infolded life emerges to haunt the twilight—a grey ghost."

It will be seen that in Mr. Hudson a student of birds of very unusual powers invites attention to his work, not merely as samples of careful observation, but also as being a web of poetry flung around some of the more fanciful beings of nature's handiwork. His style is admirable: at the same time lucid and attractive. White of Selborne wrote of birds in the sober business-like method of the last century. In later days a multitude of lovers of birds have put their observations on record. The "Son of the Marshes" treats of the life-history of birds in their appropriate haunts; Mr. Fowler looks at them always as glorified round Oxford by its classical associations; they are minutely delineated by Jefferies as bright spots in his cleverly-painted landscapes; they ever suggest Darwinian teachings to Mr. Dixon; with Mr. Knight they lend a gloom or a glory to the country he is examining. No rules, no mannerism bind Mr. Hudson. His keen and subtle powers of observation are seconded by a playful fancy; while a rich imaginative halo is thrown round the bird he describes, which brings it into greater prominence, as it were, and strongly impresses its individuality upon the reader. He may agree with this effulgence of language and wealth of imagery, or he may not; but he can never find fault with Mr. Hudson's principles, the observations he has made in each case. To turn to another subject, every one must be thankful for his denunciation of the women who persist in wearing in their hats stuffed birds and their wings. In short, this whole book is delightful, and any kind of praise or commendation is superfluous.

M. G. WATKINS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE DISCOVERIES AT TEL-LOH.

Liverpool: July, 1893.

In the Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund for April there occurs an article from the pen of Major Conder upon the inscriptions from Tel-Loh, which contains such a number of errors that I would venture to ask permission to correct some of them.

In the first place, the writer states that the name of the city of which the palace of Gudea formed the centre was Zirgul. The name of Zirgul was once the reading adopted for the group of signs representing the city, but this has now been long abandoned. The real reading is Sir-pur-ra, expressed by a group which is capable of analysis as the "city of the bright flame." The name of the local god Ningirsa also affords Major Conder the opportunity for a fantastic analysis, by which he makes it to mean the lord of the Pyramid. The name of this deity has long been known to us. He is described as the son of Elilla: that is, the son of "the lord of the ghost land," the local god of Nipar, the older Bel of the Semitic Babylonian pantheon. His name means "the lord of the piercer of the flesh, or the piercer of the mass." He is the god of the fire-stick, and to him all the cones were dedicated as representing the fire-stick or the arani reed with which fire was kindled. Additional and conclusive proof of this is afforded by the bronze statues of the fire-god found by M. de Sarzec at Tel-loh. These represent kneeling figures (Decouvertes pl. 28) holding in their hands a cone, point downwards, exactly as the fire-stick was held. A similar figure was found at Khorsabad, where the fire-god is represented holding in his hands a similar cone. In the syllabaries we find that the ideograms for fire are explained, the first by wood and cross-fire, the second by "fire," "to revolve," "to kindle," all of which point to this use of the fire-stick in Chaldea in the days of Gudea. A fire-stick complete was discovered by Prof. Petrie at Kahun (Ten Years Digging, p. 189). In one of the mythological tablets the son of Ellila is called "the lord of the bright flame," and in a hymn to the fire-god he is called son of the god Gu'si, which is but a dialectal variation of Girsu.

* Of course there is a phallic symbolism here which cannot be dealt with: but on this point consult Steinthal's Appendix to The Mythology of the Hebrews by Goldziher.

The royal quarter of the city of Sirpurra was called Girsuki, or the "city of Girsu"; and thus we see how absurd is the rendering suggested on p. 169 of a line in the inscription of Urbahu, "To mother Istar, lady of the mountain, a pyramid temple I have made," the true reading of which is, "To the goddess Nin Kharsag (the lady of the mountain) mother of the gods, her temple in Girsuki I have made." So also another phrase in this simple inscription, "To Bau, the gracious lady, child of God, I have made the temple of Uruku," which should read, "To Bau, the pure lady, the daughter of heaven, a temple in Uruazagga (the bright city) for his lady he has made." In the first place, Anna is not the word for "god" and Uru azagga is not Ur, but, as M. Amiaud has shown, one of the quarters of Sirpurra. In fact, the utterly erroneous idea that Girsuki means a "pyramid" has sent the translator wrong throughout. I am loth to find fault with these so-called renderings; but if these are supposed to be the productions of English Assyriology in 1893, they will give continental scholars a very poor idea of our knowledge.

The text in which the names of Gudea and Dungi occur together is one of which I have no knowledge, but it seems to me very different from anything I have seen.

The plan on Gudea's Knee is not the plan of the palace; but, as the plan given by M. Heuzey in his work Un palais Chaldéen shows it, some smaller temple.

In the translation (?) of the inscription upon this statue we have some wonderful specimens of ingenuity. I will give one more example. Speaking of the offerings, Major Conder reads the passage:

"A measure of drink, a measure of food, half a measure of (stamped silver?) half a measure of (bronze?) the prince has offered in fulfilment of the vow, fulfilling the command of the Pyramid Lord as he spoke. Let him raise his voice. Let him write his utterance!"

This should read, as I make it out,

"One measure of Sheker (beer), one measure of food, half a measure of flat bread, half a measure of meal, as by order appointed. The patesi who shall revoke, or the command of Ningirsu change, or the offerings in the house of Ningirsu alter his order is vain."

One would at least expect that Major Conder would have been less inaccurate in the geographical details of these inscriptions; but here also we find many extraordinary errors. Many of them occur in the Hittite land, on which he claims to be an authority. The first is his rendering of the phrase Abba Si Numta, "the Upper Sea," really "the sea opposite the highlands," that is the Persian Gulf, where in Sinum he sees the Sinim of Isaiah, xlix. 12. This is equalled by his identification of the land of Magda in the "Mountains of the River Gurruda," with "the Medic mountain by the River of Gomer," from which bitumen was brought. As the Medes are not known in the Tigro-Euphrates valley until the time of Samsi-Rimmon II. (B.C. 823), nor the Gimerrai or Kimmerians until the time of Esarhaddon, it is somewhat premature to find them in the inscriptions of Gudea (B.C. 2800). Equally absurd is the identification of "the Mountain of Barsip," the mountain from which slabs (nalua) of stone were obtained, with the Bus Nimrud, a purely artificial construction which could not be quarried. The place meant is certainly Tul Barsip, the modern Kallat Nedjim, below the Sajur, whence the Assyrian kings obtained stone. Equally extraordinary is the identification, upon a pure false reading, of the names in Statue D. Magan Melughgha, Gubi and Nituk with Sinai, Meroe, Ethiopia, and Zoan or Zal. Of these Sinai alone is right, Melughgha, as Delattre has shown, is the region between Sinai and the Wady el Arish. Gubi is Coptos on the Nile, reached by Gudea's traders by the Kenah-Kossair road. Wherever Major Conder gets the authority for reading the well-known Nituk or Dilmun Tilmun, the Tilos of the islands of Bahrien, as Zal, I cannot tell.

I should not have made these criticisms had I not received several letters calling my attention to these extraordinary readings, and therefore I felt bound to notice them. I am quite willing to allow Major Conder to reign alone in the Hittite kingdom, but I trust that he will learn at least the elements of Assyrian before he attempts to translate (?) the oldest records of Chaldaea.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE August number of Natural Science (Macmillans) contains a paper by Dr. R. Bowdler Sharpe in which all ornithologists will be interested. He here tabulates in detail, with the help of an admirable coloured map, his views as to the zoo-geographical areas of the world, which he expounded in his recent course of lectures at the Royal Institution on "The Distribution of Birds." For America he is content to adopt the conclusions of Mr. J. A. Allen, though he does not entirely approve his nomenclature. From Mr. Allen also he accepts an Arctic realm or sub-region, common to the two hemispheres, the southern boundary of which probably follows the isothermal line of 50, and may be coincident with the northern limit of conifers. In the Eurasian sub-region, he is disposed to recognise no less than three provinces in Siberia, demarcated not by mountain-ranges but by river-valleys, and characterised not so much by different families or genera as by representative species. But the chief novelty in Dr. Bowdler Sharpe's paper is to be found in his treatment of the Ethiopian region. Here he proposes a new Sudanese sub-region, stretching across the widest part of the African continent, from Senegambia to the Red Sea; and also a new Victorian or Cameroonian sub-region, mainly based upon the collections sent home by Mr. H. H. Johnston, which seem to show a common avifauna in the elevated mountains of Central East Africa and in the peaks of the Camaroons. As to the Abyssinian sub-region, we suspect a misprint, when the text says that it "must be carried north of the Zambesi"; for in the map it stops at the Shoa highlands. The Indian and Australian regions remain as fixed by Sclater and Wallace; while it is suggested (following Mr. A. O. Hume) that the division of the Indian peninsula into provinces is probably determined by the mean annual distribution of rainfall. We may also mention another paper in the same number of Natural Science, by Mr. F. E. Beddard, entitled "Earthworms and the Earth's History." It is a most ingenious argument, from the distribution of genera and species of earthworms, in favour of Mr. H. O. Forbes's hypothesis (which was based chiefly upon the remains of extinct birds), that a habitable antarctic continent formerly existed, with arms stretching to New Zealand, Africa, and Patagonia.

MR. LUDWIG MOND has given a further donation of £100 to the research fund of the Chemical Society.

THE collection of diatoms made by Mr. Julien Deby, which consists of about 30,000 slides, in excellent order and fully indexed, has been purchased for the botanical department of the British Museum.

The Voices of Stars is the title of an astronomical volume, by Mr. James E. Walker, which is announced for early publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE committee of management of the School for Modern Oriental Studies (founded by the Imperial Institute in union with University College and King's College, London) have recommended to the trustees of the Ouseley Scholarships that the Arabic scholarship of 1893 should be awarded to Mr. H. Leitner, jun., of Woking. The scholarships of 1894 will be for proficiency in Hindustani, Persian, and Chinese respectively.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:

"A very successful meeting was held under the presidency of the Hon. Charles C. Bonney at the Art Palace, Chicago, on August 3, to hear Mr. T. G. Pinches read a paper upon "Unpublished Treasures" in his own special department of the British Museum. The subject had been suggested by Mrs. E. A. Reed, Chairman of the Section of Philology of the Women's Branch of the World's Congress Auxiliary. The paper gave a classified account of many Assyrian and Babylonian tablets of great interest, including texts referring to the ritual, as well as prayers, hymns, poems, &c., and one which the author called 'the Tablet of Good Wishes,' a text of a very uncommon nature. Among the explanatory lists spoken of was one apparently referring to the fight between Bel and the Dragon (Merodach and Kirbis-tiamtu) the weapons mentioned having, strangely enough, the divine prefix. The paper was listened to with great interest; and many of the audience put most intelligent questions to the lecturer at the close, showing great appreciation, notwithstanding the special nature of the subject."

"BOOKS ABOUT BOOKS."—Books in Manuscript: a Short Introduction to their Study and Use. With a Chapter on Records. By Falconer Madan. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

THIS seems to me distinctly the best volume which, up till the date of its issue, has been included in the useful and well-devised little series of "Books about Books," of which it forms a part.

Until recently, I have held that quite the best brief introduction to the study of illuminated manuscripts has been the "Two Lectures," of which the first was prepared by Mr. Richardson, read by Mr. William Tite, at the London Institution in 1857, and published in the same year, when the second lecture, dealing in excellent fashion with "The Materials and Practice of Illuminators," was added. Since that date, of course, many treatises on the subject have appeared, some of them more pretentious than sound and serviceable; and, only last year, the Cambridge University Press issued the admirable Illuminated Manuscripts in Classical and Mediaeval Times of Prof. Middleton, which—except in the one particular of its illustrations—leaves little indeed to be desired.

Mr. Madan's book is wider in its scope than Dr. Middleton's. Its subject is all Books in Manuscript, and all the methods and materials of their making; and, in conformity with the design of the series in which it is issued, it treats this extended subject in a manner distinctly popular, though a manner far indeed from being unscholarly. Its preface tells us that it is intended "to interest both the amateur who may possess manuscripts, but may lack the time or opportunity to go deeply into the subject, and the student who may wish to have a clear view of the character and methods of the study before entering on the details of palaeography and textual criticism"; and this excellent intention is excellently carried out in its couple of hundred pages. It is a volume that may be perused from end to end with pleasure by any reader of merely general culture and intelligence: it is one in which few students will fail to find something new to them.

After opening with an introductory chapter on the use of the study of manuscripts, and pointing out, very rightly, how admirably fitted such a study is to form a corrective to the careless habit of mind induced in most of us by the daily skimming of the facile printed column or page of our daily paper or weekly novel ('tis a daily novel, too, with some fair ladies that I wot of), Mr. Madan enters upon such a consideration of "Materials for Writing and Forms of Books" as at once discloses the author of the book as a trained and careful servant of a great academic collection, one thoroughly familiar with the best and most orderly methods of arrangement, and able to expound these methods and their results with admirable clearness and conciseness.

The history of the alphabet and of forms of writing next come under brief discussion; and we reach the chapter on "Scribes and their Ways," which will be a favourite one with the general reader, so pleasantly and so intimately—yet never with departure from the dignity of the scholar—does it disclose to our modern eyes the quaint interior of the mediaeval scriptorium and the tinselled figures habitually busied therein, as well as the later workshops of more commercially minded scribes. At this point, also, pictorial art comes to the author's aid, and presents to us—with a detail almost ludicrous in its literal exactitude—the figure of Secretary Jean Mielot at work upon the Miracles de Notre Dame, which he transcribed, at the Hague, in 1456, for his master, Philip the Good of Burgundy.

Chapter V. deals with "Illuminations," most briefly, necessarily, as it does so in only a dozen pages. But even in a space so severely limited one might have desired some clearer and more specific reference to the style which I may call "the style of cusped borders," the style typically represented—if I may refer to the example with which I am most intimately acquainted—by the Murthly Book of Hours, now in Lord Bute's collection. In manuscripts of this class we have, it appears to me, Gothic illumination in its most representative, its most dignified development. In the Murthly Manuscript (I refer, of course, to the book itself, not to the page-illuminations of a much earlier date which have been bound along with it, and which, in other aspects, possess peculiar interest) the figure-miniatures enclosed in the initial letters retain all that refinement, all that absolute selection of expressive line in features and draperies, which distinguishes the illuminations of the period of St. Louis, and of the years immediately succeeding his death; while the cusped stem-work of its borders exhibits that freedom of line—the hand all the while moving in willing obedience, in perfect harmony to severest law, never moving of itself, or by mere habit, but under exquisite control, able to pause and then resume its course at any point of its line—which is the crowning merit of perfect Gothic art seen in its early prime: work in relation to which even such lovely illumination as that of a manuscript like the Ashburnham Hours of Jeanne of Navarre cannot be said to mark essential artistic progress.

Mr. Madan very truly indicates that the taste for the later florid manuscripts of the beginning of the sixteenth century is waning; and the reason for this undoubtedly increasing interest in earlier work is simply that the study of illuminations is gradually becoming a duly recognised branch of a liberal aesthetic education—is less exclusively, than was once the case, in the hands of scholars and antiquaries, who are naturally liable to overestimate the value of mere elaboration of detail, of mere sumptuousness of colouring, and to disregard the higher artistic qualities of grace and harmony and perfect restraint, which are the true crown of art. But as illuminations come more and more to be studied from their purely aesthetic side, I cannot but believe that to all who are in touch with Gothic art, and perceptive of its most essential excellence, the last half of the thirteenth century and the first half of the fourteenth will come to be regarded as the period of most sweetly-flowering perfection, the time in which this art is found “stayed,” not “at,” but just before, “the fall of its first ripened rose.”

The chapters of Mr. Madan's book that follow deal with “The Blunders of Scribes and their Correction,” review briefly “Famous Libraries,” and particularise a few of the most “Famous Manuscripts,” telling, in passing, some of the “fairy-tales” of the manuscript collector—true, but almost incredible—like that of the sale of St. Margaret of Scotland's “Gospel-book,” six years ago, at Sotheby's, in open sight of all the world, for £6, and its identification for what it truly was—after it had reached the Bodleian—by a lady-visitor's chance recollection of a passage in Turgot's Life of the Saint and Queen to whom he was confessor.

The volume concludes with chapters on “Literary Forgeries,” where, again, we have true “fairy-tales” of marvels, on “The Treatment and Cataloguing of MSS.,” and on “Public and Private Records,” followed by various useful appendices. The bibliography of works dealing with the subject at pp. 175-181 will be found useful. It is to be regretted that the space at Mr. Madan's disposal did not permit him to add a list of articles on the subject that have been published in the Proceedings of learned societies, and similar not readily-discoverable quarters. These cannot be overlooked by the student, containing, as they so often do, most valuable and specifically detailed descriptions of individual illuminated MSS. For a list of this kind we must still turn to the second of the “Two Lectures,” which I mentioned with fitting praise at the opening of this review. The South Kensington Art Catalogue, so serviceable in such ways when one is dealing, say, with “Gems,” “Heraldry,” or “Coins and Medals,” contains, as yet, no classified section dealing with “Illumination,” and guiding students to isolated papers connected with the subject. In this part of his Appendix Mr. Madan might have found space to warn—in just three words—the student and possible buyer, that there is an uncoloured, or rather a partially coloured, as well as the normally fully-coloured, issue of the English edition of Silvestre's Palaeography; and surely the word “plates” at p. 180 is a misprint for “parts.” My own bookseller, at any rate, has failed to obtain for me separate “plates” of Delisle's great catalogue.

A few words must be said regarding the excellent illustrations of Mr. Madan's volume. So far as I am aware, they are the first attempt that has yet been made to illustrate by photographic means a quite popular manual dealing in considerable part with illuminations; for Messrs. De Gray Birch and Henry Jenner's Early Drawings in the British Museum was a handbook addressed to specialists in various departments. It must have required some courage on the part of the publishers of the present volume to offer to “the general” a series of illustrations which, in such of their most interesting subjects as Nos. II. and VI., are by no means free from that “smudginess,” that confusion of tones and want of just representation of varying weights of colour, which, as yet, is inseparable from even the most careful photograph transcript. The large public, it might well have been feared, would have greatly preferred the clear definition, the neat and seemly shading, of an ordinary woodcut. Woodcut reproductions may indeed afford most valuable aids to the study of the ornamentation of manuscripts; but these must be woodcuts drawn with a precision of hand and an insight into the essential qualities of their originals, rare indeed among the draughtsmen of our time, and then engraved with a fidelity which, also, is far from usual. Indeed, I can call to mind no woodcuts satisfactorily fulfilling such requirements except those drawn by J. J. Laing, and cut by the Misses Byfield, for the later editions of Messrs. Bradley & Godwin's Manual of Illumination, a book which I cannot too heartily recommend to those beginning the artistic study of manuscripts. The letterpress of that little volume is vital and unerring in its every word—either of theory or of specific reference—connected with the aesthetic aspects of its subject; and its illustrations, drawn from such manuscripts as the noble early thirteenth century Bible of the Advocates' Library, and the great thirteenth century Vegetius of the British Museum, from the French Choir-book of the same century, and from the fine fourteenth century Evangelium of our National Collection (Addl. MS., 17,341), will at once guide the student to work of the period of truest excellence.

One cannot but heartily welcome the beginnings in Mr. Madan's book of the popular illustration of the subject by photographic means. Much has already been done in the photographic transcript of illuminations by the Palaeographical Society since its foundation twenty years ago; but its valuable and scholarly publications are far from popular, and far from being specifically adapted for the use of the art student. The purchaser of these costly folio fasciculi—if his aims be exclusively aesthetic ones—will find himself overburdened with a plethora of classical and other plates whose interest is purely philological, plates which reproduce much penmanship that is quite wanting in those exquisite decorative adjuncts which in the middle ages so often made penmanship a dazzling delight to the eye. In consideration of the extreme value to architectural sculptors, wood-carvers, mural painters, and other classes of decorative artists, of a study of the finest mediaeval illuminations; and in view of the fact that the best and most fruitful study is that pursued, not in a gallery or reference-library, but in the quietude of our own homes, and from examples always referable to us in all our varying moods—I cannot but think it greatly desirable that the Society should re-issue, in a concentrated form obtainable by the art-worker, a limited series of such of the plates they have already published as would be best suited for his instruction. Doubtless, the negatives of these plates have been preserved: they might be issued, in the suggested form, at such an additional ratio of cost as would amply protect the interests of the members of the Society who have been subscribers to the entire published series.

But when a selected series of photographic transcripts have been provided for the home-study of the art-worker, all that is required will not yet have been done. For the adequate study of illuminations we must possess some approximately adequate reproduction of their colour; and all the transcripts of decorated manuscripts hitherto issued for the instruction of the modern ornamentalist that are known to me have failed radically in this particular. The reproductions issued by Mr. Quaritch have, indeed, marked a step in the right direction; but the work is one which, of necessity, can hardly be entrusted to private enterprise: it is one which should be undertaken by a Government Department. That the processes of colour-printing now in use render such adequate reproduction as I have indicated perfectly possible, is amply proved—to name no other examples—by the lovely plates of Eastern and of Mediaeval-European fabrics recently issued by the South Kensington Museum for the instruction of art-students. I cannot but hope that the exceeding care and delicacy which has already gone to the production of such plates, may ultimately be directed to the reproduction of pages from the finest manuscripts of the best periods of Gothic art: and, with the learned and widely-cultured author of Illuminated Manuscripts in Classical and Mediaeval Times at the head of our national museum of decorative art, I cannot despair of living to see this hope fulfilled.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DISCOVERY OF EXTENSIVE EVIDENCES OF ROMAN OCCUPATION IN BERKS.

Christ Church, Oxford: August 21, 1893.

The ACADEMY (supra p. 157) and many other papers have reprinted from the Times an account of some remains lately found at Long Wittenham, on the Berkshire bank of the Thames just over against Dorchester. I have visited the place with Mr. A. J. Evans, and believe that the remains may possibly belong to a British or Roman-British farm or farms. We could see no traces of any basilica, or of anything whatever which could be called "an extensive Roman town or station." It may be added that the Roman name of Dorchester is unknown: Durscina is an invention of Charles Bertram.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. JOHN MURRAY announces, as a companion volume to Fergusson's History of Architecture, a work by Mr. J. Tavenor Perry, entitled The Chronology of Mediaeval and Renaissance Architecture, being a date-book of architectural art, from the founding of the Basilica of St. Peter's, at Rome, by Constantine to the dedication of the new building by Pope Urban VIII. It will contain abundant illustrations, indexes of places and names, and a synoptical table showing the gradual development of the several styles.

AN industrial and fine art exhibition is to be opened at Bristol on Monday next, August 28. Besides collections of china, the picture gallery includes representative works by Sir Joshua Reynolds, Copley Fielding, and many living painters.

A COMMITTEE has been formed at Newcastle to place a marble memorial tablet on the house in Framlington-place where Dr. John Collingwood Bruce, the historian of the Roman Wall, lived and died. The hon. treasurer is Dr. T. Hodgkin.

THE windows in the Chapel Royal, Hampton Court Palace, are being restored to the style in which they were first constructed—that is, by Cardinal Wolsey. They were altered from their original character when the chapel was restored by Sir Christopher Wren in the reign of William III. Some of the original windows have recently been opened out while the organ chamber was being altered, and these will be used as a pattern for the rest.

THE following is the official list of awards to British artists at Chicago:

Oil Painting.—Mr. J. Swan, Mr. G. Clausen, Mr. W. Orchardson, Mr. Henry Woods, Mr. Peter Graham, Mr. James Lane, Mr. A. Gow, Mr. H. Fischer, Mr. Adrian Stokes, Sir John Millais, Mr. Frank Brangwyn, Mr. Henry Tuke, Mr. Alma-Tadema, Mr. David Murray, Mr. Arthur Hacker, Mr. Walter Low, Mr. Marcus Stone, Mr. Y. King, Mr. Alfred Parsons, Mr. Walter Osborn, Mr. W. Bartlett, Mr. Frank Dicksee, Mr. Henry Moore, Prof. Hubert Herkomer, Sir Frederic Leighton, Mrs. Anna Merritt, Mr. W. Hook, Mr. W. Oules, Mrs. Adrian Stokes, Mr. W. Carter, Mr. J. Waterhouse, Mr. William Logsdail, Mrs. Stanhope Forbes, Mr. Ernest Parton, Miss Clara Montalba, Mr. G. Wetherbee, Mr. G. Boughton, Mr. J. Black and White.—Mr. J. Weguelin, Mr. George Du Maurier, Sir John Tenniel, Mr. John Charlton, Mr. W. Overend, Mr. John Swan, Sir James Linton, Miss Kate Greenaway, and Mr. F. Hayden.

Sculpture.—Sir Frederic Leighton, Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, Mr. George Frampton, Mr. F. Pomeroy, Mr. John Ford, and Mr. John Swan.

Architecture.—Mr. George Aitchison, Mr. Rowland Anderson, Mr. George Ashlin, Mr. Aston Webb, Mr. Ingress Bell, Mr. James Brooks, Mr. Thomas Jackson, and Mr. Alfred Waterhouse.

Etching.—Mr. D. Cameron, Mr. Herbert Dicksee, Mr. Oliver Hall, Mr. William Hole, Mr. David Law, Mr. Leopold Lowenstam, Miss Ethel Martyn, Mr. Robert Macbeth, Mr. Mortimer Menpes, and Mr. Charles Watson.

Line Engraving.—Mr. Charles Sherborn.

Mezzotint.—Mr. Gerald Robinson.

Wood Engraving.—Mr. Biscoombe Gardner.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Musical Form. By Ebenezer Prout. (Augener.) This latest volume of the useful series on which Mr. Prout has been engaged for several years is not a whit behind the others in interest and intelligibility. On the subjects of which it treats, little is to be found in English musical literature, and our author had to consult large German treatises, a work involving much labour. These treatises, says Mr. Prout in his Preface, "cannot be considered light reading"; yet they have in no way affected his well-known bright and simple style of writing. For the chapter on Motives, the ultimate constituents of a musical sentence, and, indeed, also for other matters, Mr. Prout expresses "his deep indebtedness to the researches of Dr. Hugo Riemann," and he distinguishes this eminent German theorist as "the first to recognise fully the true nature of the Motive." Dr. Riemann has, in fact, brought about well nigh a revolution in the analysis of musical phrases and sentences; and Mr. Prout—though differing from him in many details as to the application of his principle—acknowledges its great importance. It throws such a new light on familiar passages—as, for instance, in some of Beethoven's pianoforte Sonatas—that some little time for reflection will be necessary before it can be fully admitted. For our part we agree with Dr. Riemann's principle, if only he will not regard it as of universal application. And this he can afford to do, if there be any truth in the old proverb with regard to rule and exception.

Mr. Prout devotes a chapter to the construction of simple sentences with regular rhythm, and then proceeds to the almost endless subject of irregular rhythms. We do not quite agree with the statement that the irregular rhythms are "in every case variations of the normal rhythm of four and eight bars." It seems to us that the music of the people (folk music) would lead one to doubt whether such rhythm should be regarded as the normal one. But Mr. Prout is no novice; he well knows the difficulties which the subject presents, and honestly says in this very chapter: "We are far from venturing to assert that the views propounded are the only correct ones." By the way, Dr. Calcott has some excellent remarks on and illustrations of irregular rhythm in his valuable Musical Grammar, published in 1817.

The chapters on Binary and Ternary Form are particularly interesting. Mr. Prout shows the former in its simplest expression, then expanded, and he reminds us that from this expanded form was evolved the modern Sonata. That is true, and as clear as it is true; but it seems to us that the change brought about renders the old term a misnomer. The modern Sonata form, with its exposition, development, and recapitulation section, cannot consistently be called binary. It is merely the name to which we are taking exception; Mr. Prout is quite clear in describing the old form and the changes through which it passed. He justly remarks (p. 184) that "it is an unfortunate thing that great difference exists among theorists as to the nomenclature of the different musical forms." The variation of species is, of course, the cause, but the nomenclature should, from time to time, be amended so as to minimise this misfortune. There is one little matter in this chapter about which we would say a word. Of the first sentence of the second part of the Mozart Adagio (p. 175) Mr. Prout declares that, with exception of the first bar, it is "formed entirely of new material." But surely bars four and five are evolved from the two opening bars of the movement? And do not the semiquavers recall the accompaniment of the major theme of the first part?

But space compels us to stop. The book tempts one to discuss at length. It is sound at heart; and any little detail to which one feels inclined to take exception remains a little detail, and does not affect the general scope of the book. One need not say that it is the best book on the subject in the English language, for, at present, it is the only one of its kind. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley's Treatise on Musical Form, a work of interest, differs in principle, and does not offer the same minute analyses. In Mr. Prout's volume the illustrations alone are quite a musical education.

LITERATURE.

Walt Whitman: a Study. By John Addington Symonds. (Nimmo.)

At length (from a critic who, alas! will write no more) we have an adequate estimate of Walt Whitman. Of extravagant estimates—in the way both of eulogy and of abuse—there have been too many. The eulogies, wanting in discrimination, were, at best, doubtful compliments, which tended to discredit their subject; while the indecent abuse dishonoured the writers themselves. Usually, faultfinders and worshippers understood Whitman equally little. Even persons who did understand him tolerably well found difficulty in giving expression to their thoughts. Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson's effort is a case in point. Whitman had had a great influence for good upon his life, having, as he confessed, shaken his "tabernacle of lies," and set him upon a "strong foundation of all the original and manly virtues." He wrote an essay on Whitman, but perceived in time the "pompous absurdity of its exaggeration"—thus escaping the fate of being classed among the foolish eulogists. He tried again, and this time produced what Mr. Symonds correctly describes as a "frigidly appreciative" study, which did not express his real convictions any better than the first attempt; yet which, strange to say, he printed and still circulates. Mr. Symonds, who, like Mr. Stevenson, was indebted to Whitman for giving a right impetus to his life, has happily been more successful. We may or may not accept his judgments; but his essay does, at any rate, express his own mind on the subject, and what he has to say must compel respectful attention. Of other sane and well-balanced criticism of Whitman, we nearly exhaust the list when we name Mr. John Burroughs's fine essay with the fanciful title, "The Flight of the Eagle"; Mr. Dowden's "Study," which, if now partly superseded, was serviceable in its day; and a few articles which have not been collected from the magazines and reviews. Dr. Bucke's Life of Whitman, an admirable text-book, with which the critic cannot dispense, is not and does not pretend to be critical.

While confessing his inability to extract a "coherent scheme of thought" from Whitman's writings, Mr. Symonds claims that he can trace "an order in his ideas." He finds, first of all,

"religion, or the concept of the Universe; then personality, or the sense of self and sex; then love, diverging into amative and comradesly emotions; then democracy, or the theory of human equality and brotherhood.

The world, man as an essential part of the world, man as of prime importance to himself alone, love and liberty as necessary to his happiness"— these, says Mr. Symonds, are "the constituents of Whitman's creed" (p. 12).

Proceeding to discuss these constituent parts, Mr. Symonds thinks he may define Whitman's "religion" as "a recognition of divinity in all things," a profound belief in the eternity of Spirit underlying all appearances; and he describes its essence as "an imperturbable optimism" (p. 19). No "problem of evil" troubles Whitman. If, as theologians aver, God made the world, then "God made evil as well as good." Perhaps it would be more correct to say that to Whitman what is called evil is evil only relatively. Certainly his unravelling of the theological position, as suggested by Mr. Symonds (pp. 19, 20), seems unnatural; for Whitman was the last man in the world to trouble his head about either theologians or their controversies, and Mr. Symonds admits as much. His attitude on the subject is expressed when he says:

"I think I could turn and live with animals, they are so placid and self-contained, I stand and look at them, long and long. They do not sweat and whine about their condition, They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins, They do not make me sick, discussing their duty to God." (Song of Myself.)

His conception of duty was to live in the present, and to accept all the facts of life without fear and without complaint. And when he declared himself to be the "poet of evil," as well as the poet of good, he meant that so-called evil was as much a fact as any other circumstance of life; while his idea of it, although not expressed in such set terms, was substantially that of Emerson, who affirmed it to be "good in the making." Men, said Emerson, "aspired to the highest," and in their sleep-walking to what they dream is highest. But wake them, and "they shall quit the false good and leap to the true." It is a common mistake of the present day, as of past days—a mistake which has led to infinite tyranny and persecution—that one man's good should be all men's good. The lover of whatever the fashion of the time pronounces to be virtuous, assumes too readily that all persons should fit his virtue, and that, if they do not fit it naturally, they should be made to fit it. Because he loves pious exercises or intellectual pursuits, he looks upon the frequenter of pothouses as an entirely despicable mortal. Yet to some, the frequenting of pothouses may be the one means of being true to their nature. The supporter of the proprieties falls into a still deeper error—an error of self-deception—when he fails to remember how short a remove he is, morally, from the objects of his censure. John Bradford, a man whose unquestioned virtue was not thus marred, writing from prison, declared, "God's merciful providence here is far above my worthiness. Worthiness? quoth I, alas! I am worthy of nothing but damnation"—a sentiment calculated to foster a healthy state of humility. Goethe, too, confessed he had never heard of a crime which he might not have committed; for he was not blinded by self-righteousness to the truth that existing goodness, such as it is, has grown from what is now regarded as evil, and that reversion is always possible in things moral as well as in things material. The actions termed virtuous and vicious are due in part to a perception, more or less clear, of what is the best possible; but in part they are only matters of taste. One man likes psalms, another beer; and it is possible each knows his own needs and his own limitations better than his neighbour can know them.

All this accords with the religious spirit of Leaves of Grass. The oneness of mankind, in failures and in possibilities, is the root and essence of the "comradeship" proclaimed by Whitman with such passionate earnestness. He sets out with the emphatic declaration:

"I celebrate myself, and sing myself;" but instantly gives it a universal application:

"And what I assume, you shall assume, For every atom belonging to me, as good belongs to you."

The idea is forcibly expressed in such a piece as "You Felons on Trial in Courts," where he asks: "Who am I that I am not on trial or in prison?" but where the statement is less emphatic, the spirit of it is still a pervading force. He is the poet of evil, he celebrates failure:

"Did we think victory great?
So it is—but now it seems to me,
When it cannot be help'd, that defeat is great,
And that death and dismay are great."

"When it cannot be helped," he says; and also, as would seem, when it can be helped and is not, when life goes to hopeless wreck, then there is room for pity, infinite pity, such as breathes through the piece called "The City Dead-house." But, in the spirit of comradeship, there is still no room for scorn.

This brotherhood in lowliness is not more real to Whitman than brotherhood in possibility and achievement. He salutes "Him that was crucified," the "brother of rejected persons, brother of slaves, felons, idiots, and of insane and diseased persons," as his comrade; and this is the principle of Whitman's gospel of democracy, which in various ways and under various aspects he proclaims everywhere. Its personal and passionate aspect is shown in the section called "Calamus," where he seems to cry out for love and permission to love. It is a broader application of the love which, in its special relation to sex, is celebrated in the preceding section, "Children of Adam." Mr. Symonds discusses this passionate aspect at length, and inquires how far it may be considered to be on the lines of, or to give sanction to, the sensual gratification of "physical desire." It is perfectly true, as Mr. Symonds says, that Whitman's language "has a passionate glow, a warmth of devotion, beyond anything to which the world is used in the celebration of friendship." At the same time, "the false note of insincerity and sensuousness is never heard," and, moreover, Mr. Symonds has "the strongest proof" in Whitman's private correspondence with himself that he repudiated the deduction of "sensual alloy" from his "Calamus." This being so, the discussion of what Whitman might have meant, but certainly did not mean, is perhaps unduly extended.

The section called "Children of Adam" has, of course, been the centre of the hottest controversy, being in the eyes of some the head and front of Whitman's offending, and, as others think, the most masterly and essential part of his work. Mr. Symonds justifies Whitman on the ground that "the attitude which he assumed as poet and prophet demanded this frankness." His originality consisted, he says, "in giving the idealism of poetry and powerful emotion to the blank results of modern science"; and it is "in the very nature of science" to "accept all the facts presented to its vision with indifference," caring only for the "elucidation of truth" (pp. 56, 57). The poet's function, according to Mr. Symonds, is to stimulate and to invigorate; and, being penetrated with the scientific spirit, Whitman was therefore, as he holds,

"justified in claiming the whole of healthy manhood and womanhood for his province. To exclude sex from his account of human nature would have been absurd, for it is precisely sex by which men and women are differentiated; sex which brings them into mutual relations of amateness; sex which determines the preservation and the future of the species" (p. 57).

And it was the inspiration which prompted him, first among modern poets, to penetrate the blank results of science with imagination and emotion, which "led him inevitably to a frank treatment of sexual relations."

Here, as formerly with theological questions, Mr. Symonds, as it seems to me, dives too deep in his effort to bring Whitman's motives to the surface. Whitman's temperament was hardly more scientific than it was theological. It was more artistic than either, and more religious than artistic. Not by devotion to scientific accuracy, but rather by his artistic perceptions, he was moved to make Leaves of Grass what it is; and his justification on the moral side was not the "wise impartiality" of science, but the religious conviction that everything is God-given. To optimistic religion as well as to science nothing is "common or unclean." Whitman's purpose was to reveal man as he is. Leaves of Grass was a biography of the human soul: a record of its voyage through life, of its gathered experience, its joy, its sorrow, feeling, emotion, thought. Of course, the supreme fact of sex must be there, and it was not Whitman's way to present anything by suggestion or inference. Those catalogues of his, of tools and occupations, which have laid him open to the jest of merry scoffers, are only examples of his invariable method of saying everything in full. No doubt, by giving undue prominence to his backgrounds he has done injury to his art. Still, he was an artist; and if we are to understand his method, this truth must be kept well in view. Mr. Symonds hardly makes enough of it. There is something artistic even in those catalogues. The unceasing alterations, which characterised every new edition of his book, betoken the spirit of the artist struggling toward a perfect form. Defects of proportion there may be, even now that Leaves of Grass has taken its final shape; but it cannot fairly be charged against Whitman that he has given the subject of sex undue prominence. His antagonistic critics have done so, no doubt, and the popular notion on the subject is derived from them. In "Children of Adam," as Mr. Symonds well says—

"Sex is once again recognised; not in its aspect of the boudoir, the alcove, the brothel, but as the base note of the world, the universal Pan, unseen yet omnipresent, felt by all, responded to by all, without which the whole vast symphony of things would have for man no value. By subtle associations he [Whitman] connects the life of nature, in dewy forests and night winds, in scents of fruits and pungent plants, in crushed herbs and the rustling of rain, drenched foliage against our faces, with impressions of the sexual imagination. He finds the choicest images to shadow forth the acts of sex" (pp. 63, 64).

In all which Whitman displays rare artistic power. And if sex must be included, so also must the varying phases of its passion. Hence the necessity for the piece called "Native Moments," as well as for any other leading piece in the section. Mr. Symonds thinks that, if we attempt to extract a coherent system out of Whitman's utterances, "we might be puzzled to explain the logical connexion of that poem with the rest of the section." He suggests that doubtless Whitman "recognised the right and the necessity of 'native moments' in that free play of the normal senses which he is upholding." To me it seems that what Whitman recognised was not so much the right and necessity as the reality. He was a seer and revealer, not, wilfully, either moralist or preacher. To him the supreme question was not, Is it a right or a necessary thing? but, Is it an actual thing? Sex being such an undoubted reality he gave it its proper place, first presenting it in what may be termed its external aspect—the physical facts of it—and leading thence by natural sequence into the region of passion, magnificently rendered in such pieces as "Spontaneous Me" and "One Hour of Madness and Joy," and—when passion becomes frenzied and delirious and loses itself in ungoverned lust—in "Native Moments." After this outburst, the section ends fittingly, in a key of restful calm.

Mr. Symonds's complaint against Whitman, not as poet but as man, is that he was "so omnivorous of praise, indiscriminate as to its quality, lacking the repose which belongs to the highest type of greatness." He charges him with having "collected and distributed trifling panegyrics of himself, culled from the holes and corners of American journalism. He showed small sense of proportion in criticism, and seemed to value people by the amount of personal zeal they displayed in the propagation of his views" (pp. 3, 4).

No doubt Whitman, as well as Margaret Fuller, betrayed "the presence of a rather mountainous Me," and made men's appreciation of him a test of their quality. Herein he was different from some others less, probably, in the amount of his self-esteem than in the degree of his candour. He was not versed in the tactical concealments which pass for humility. Surely, when we consider his early career, his craving for "responsive affection" cannot seem strange. A simple-hearted, unsophisticated, free-spoken person, finding himself by his own act (which he deems honest and cannot retract) outcast and scorned, may well thankfully accept sympathy from whatever quarter it comes. Moreover, knowing well that his work is not the worthless thing his enemies declare it to be, what more natural than that he should think those who appreciate it are discerning persons? Again, as time went on, the conviction seems to have grown upon Whitman that in some unusual sense he was the bearer of a message to mankind—the founder, or at least the harbinger, of a new religion or revelation. In this case, any recognition, however humble and obscure it might seem, would be endowed with some sort of divine sanction. Mr. Symonds complains that "the ways he chose for pushing his gospel and advertising his philosophy, put a severe strain on patience," and he asks: "Were Buddha, Socrates, Christ, so interested in the dust stirred up around them by second-rate persons, in third-rate cities, and in more than fifth-rate literature?" (p. 7.) The comparison is not quite fair, for, while Whitman's career, in all its detail, is visible, time has obscured those other lives in myth. It may, however, be said as to Socrates, that he was not a religious founder; as to Buddha, that we really do not know anything on the point; and as to Jesus, that his favoured admirers were fishermen and artisans, a mixed company, good and bad—second-rate persons mostly, few, if any, wise or learned. They were "common people" who "heard him gladly"; and that melancholy display, when he rode into Jerusalem, seems to indicate that their ignorant applause had, for the moment, overwhelmed him. Yet, at this distance of time, when his career is seen as a whole, what does that passing weakness matter? If Whitman is remembered nineteen centuries hence, it is probable that this self-assertion of his, which Mr. Symonds does not like, will be quoted, if at all, as evidence that he knew himself to be a prophet endowed with a divine mission.

That some of Whitman's disciples distinctly claim for him the character of a religious founder, is undoubted, and he seems to have half claimed it for himself. At the outset of Leaves of Grass, when he proclaims "oneself I sing," he speaks of himself as the type of the race. Later, however, his words cannot be interpreted in the same sense. In the chant "To one Shortly to Die," when he says, "Softly I lay my right hand on you," and "I do not commiserate, I congratulate you," it is evidently Walt Whitman, not the type of the race, but the individual, who speaks. The concluding section is even more significant. In the "Songs of Parting" the world is invited to witness the departure of its prophet, quite after the approved manner of world-saviours.

It is too early, by some centuries, to determine the justice of this claim. This much only we may say with confidence, that there is abundant proof of Whitman's quite extraordinary personal influence, and of his immense power for good over the minds of persons who know him only through his works. Mr. Symonds himself bears personal testimony on the point. Referring to the religion of Whitman, he says:—

"It shone upon me when my life was broken, when I was weak, sickly, poor, and of no account; and I have ever lived thenceforward in the light and warmth of it. . . . Had it not been for the contact of his fervent spirit with my own, the pyre ready to be lighted, the combustible materials of modern thought awaiting the touch of the fire-bringer, might never have leapt up into the flame of life-long faith and consolation. During my darkest hours it comforted me with the conviction that I, too, played my part in the illimitable symphony of cosmic life. When I sinned, repined, sorrowed, suffered, it touched me with a gentle hand of sympathy and understanding, sustained me with the strong arm of assurance that I could not go amiss; . . . and when strength revived in me, it stirred a healthy pride and courage to effectuate myself, to bear the brunt of spiritual foes, the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune" (pp. 34-35).

This is written, not by some gushing enthusiast, but by a man fully conscious of his responsibility as a writer and accustomed to measure his words. Whatever deductions from Whitman's work opposing critics may choose to make, such testimony as this must still stand, pointing to its positive merit and value to the world.

WALTER LEWIN.

Greece under King George. By R. A. H. Bickford-Smith. (Bentley.)

THIS book contains a solid mass of well-arranged facts and figures, which ought to be of great service to everyone who wishes to discover the real condition of Greece. In saying this, we do not mean to imply that the author is not capable of writing amusingly. When he remarks, in speaking of the sufficiency of the native plough, that in Greece "Nature smiles so when she is tickled, that she is never subjected to our rougher treatment"; or of the deficiency of beef in Greece, that "of the cattle at present in the country most are far too athletic for the table"; or of the Greek habit of exaggeration and fabrication in the statement of facts, that it is "a compound of vividness of imagination and subconsciousness of literary skill," our appetite is whetted for other sallies of the same kind. His book, however, is rigidly business-like and practical. It is primarily intended for investors and politicians, and for that diligent class of persons who can forecast the prospects of a people by studying their statistics. Even for them, we imagine, it will occasionally prove a tough morsel: as, for instance, where, in an account of the railway lines in Greece, the names of all the stations are included, and that, too, without any explanation of their position. The conspectus, however, which is here presented to us is very thorough, as will be seen from the headings of the successive chapters, which represent every topic connected with the administration, and with the social and political state, of the nation. Finance, of course, occupies a prominent position; and here it is reassuring, at a time when the credit of Greece, in more than one sense of the word, is, or is supposed to be, at stake, to be told that the financial situation is not only intelligible but hopeful. Mr. Bickford-Smith's information on this point is derived from a recently published pamphlet by a French writer, M. Beckmann, whose lucid mode of statement he compares to an Ariadnean thread, which guides us safely through the intricacies of this Cretan maze. He also states that the war budget of Greece is smaller than that of the other Balkan states. On the whole, it is satisfactory to find, as a result of the author's review of the entire subject, that steady progress is reported in every department.

To turn now to a few of the points of general interest which this book presents us with. The traveller who either dislikes the sea or desires to economise time, will be pleased to learn that the railway from the Piræus to Larissa is to be completed in 1895. The accomplishment of this work, however, may have much more important results for Greece herself than for her visitors. More than thirty years ago Von Hahn, the Austrian consul of literary fame, pointed out the advantages of Salonica as an entrepôt and place of embarkation for Alexandria on the route to India, because it is more than a hundred miles nearer to that place than Otranto, the southernmost port of Italy, and in the long run the line which has the shortest sea-passage must prove the most desirable. With this view he advocated the construction of a railway which should connect Salonica with Belgrade, and so with the rest of Europe—a work which has subsequently been carried out, and would have produced important results, had it not been for the supineness of the Turkish government. But the distance from the Piræus to Egypt is considerably shorter; and when the Larissa line has been finished, and that city has been connected with Salonica by another line, which would be its natural complement, there is no reason why the Piræus should not become a great commercial centre. The canal through the isthmus of Corinth, by means of which the circuitous route by Cape Malea is avoided, will tend to produce the same result. Mr. Bickford-Smith also furnishes some interesting statistics with regard to the influence of weather on crime in Greece. In that country the people do not hang and drown themselves in the month of November, as an ancient authority declares to be the case in England; but crimes of violence steadily increase as the summer advances, until they reach their maximum in August, after which they again decline. The reason of this is, that quickness of temper is as much the origin of acts of violence among the Greeks as intemperance is in England. From another set of facts we learn how an old and good custom may become mischievous in the midst of new surroundings. It is a traditional practice in Greece that an elder brother should not himself marry until his sisters are disposed of, and that a younger sister should not marry before an elder. This system worked well, so long as marriages were easily arranged, and the parties concerned had not learnt fastidiousness of choice, and too great readiness in asserting their own wills. But a freer system of living has altered the conditions; and now, our author tells us, the result is that "an over-sanguine eldest sister celibates the whole establishment." We may also note, for the benefit of collectors of postage stamps, that Mr. Bickford-Smith introduces a schedule of Greek stamps, with their value, dates, and colours. The work concludes with some sensible remarks on the subject of the development of sympathy between Greece and England, and the methods by which it may be best attained.

A History of the Theories of Production and Distribution in English Political Economy from 1776 to 1848. By Edwin Cannan. (Rivington & Percival.)

THIS is a useful contribution to the history of economic theories. English histories as a rule proceed not by doctrines but by periods, and it is chiefly in Germany and Austria that we have had "Dogmengeschichten." We have had Dr. Böhm-Bawerk's History of the Doctrine of Interest on Capital (on which Mr. Cannan bestows high praise, Preface p. vi.); and we have had Dr. Zuckerkandl's Theorie des Preises (not mentioned by him). Latterly we have had something of the sort in English, in Palgrave's Economical Dictionary; but the importance of the subject justified the treatment of it at length in a book, and even in a large book of 400 pages, like the one now before us.

Mr. Cannan's nine chapters may be arranged in four groups. The first relates to the notion of Wealth; and it is characteristic that the writer needs to go back some considerable distance before 1776 in order to do justice to his subject even in his own way. This chapter will provoke less controversy than the following four on "Production." It is probably the fifth (on "The Third Requisite of Production—Land") which will be most keenly criticised. It includes a history of the theory of population, about which Mr. Cannan attributes to Malthus a much greater vacillation in use of terms than can perhaps be fairly alleged against him (p. 135, &c.). It includes also a discussion of the genesis of the theory of diminishing returns. Mr. Cannan himself points out that the theory was clearly stated by Turgot in 1768. But it is a principle with him that English economists knew nothing of French economists even when the works of the latter were translated. So we are told (p. 183) that "Distribution," in its economical sense, first occurs in English in the Englishman Boileau's Introduction to the Study of Political Economy (1811), although Turgot's Réflexions sur la Formation et Distribution des Richesses had been duly translated into English in 1793 under the title "Reflexions on the Formation and Distribution of Wealth." We need not be surprised, therefore, that Turgot's untranslated statement of the theory of diminishing returns is supposed to have remained unknown:

"There is, of course, no reason to suppose that this passage had any influence on English political economy. The early nineteenth-century English economists deduced their doctrines not from study of the works of their predecessors, but from the actual experience of England during the war" (p. 148).

Surely Mr. Cannan speaks too absolutely. There is proof that even Ricardo and West not only studied facts for themselves, but read the books of their predecessors and contemporaries, who had done likewise. As for Malthus, Mr. Cannan grudgingly allows that he used words (in 1803) that imply the doctrine of diminishing returns; but we are told to believe that Malthus did so in a casual manner and without any sense of the importance of his own words (pp. 146-7).

The chapter on Land forms a good bridge between this second group of subjects and the third, which consists of the three chapters on Distribution, including Wages, Profit, and Rent. Mr. Cannan utters a warning against writers who try to compare "wages per head, profits per cent., and rent per acre." Adam Smith set the example, and his successors followed it blindly, "without troubling themselves to bring the theory of distribution into proper subordination to the theory of production" (p. 231). This case is very shrewdly argued; and yet many of us will feel that it is not quite fair to reproach old writers for not answering our questions instead of their own.

To avoid this fault ourselves when reviewing this book, we of course direct our attention carefully to the last chapter (ix.), entitled "General Review: Politics and Economics." Abstractly, Mr. Cannan considers that the theories of production and distribution, as stated by the authors that come under his pen, are inaccurate and often contradictory (pp. 379-83). But "if we try them by the historical method, and inquire how far they meet the practical needs of their time, they must obtain a much more favourable verdict" (p. 383). We then learn that Adam Smith stood alone in being, on the whole, a dispassionate student, desiring simply to add to the bounds of knowledge (p. 384). Not only Malthus but Ricardo wrote, we are told, to effect particular practical schemes; and the Ricardian doctrine of rent and profits "was an admirable engine for bringing the manufacturing and commercial class into favour, and exciting odium against legislation in favour of land owners" (p. 392). The practical schemes of Malthus and Ricardo actually gave colour to the writings of John Stuart Mill (p. 390), who wrote a generation after them, and who, we should have thought, would have found his own contemporary problems enough to engross his attention.

The moral drawn, in this concluding chapter, seems to be that economists in our time should attend to the economic aspects of the practical problems of our own time and not of another, and should not rely on the work of their predecessors. The earlier writers are (we are told) especially underserving of imitation in their views of wealth; it is always to them (however much they disguise the matter) a question of exchange-value. We, on the contrary, must look at material welfare, or "wealth" in a larger sense, and must not regard it as always or wholly measurable by any standard of exchange.

There seems to be much truth in this parting criticism. Yet we may regret that the sweep of Mr. Cannan's book did not include Exchange as well as Distribution, and did not leave out such theories as those of Prices and Currency. The book would then have fairly represented the history of the whole instead of a part of economic doctrine during the period it covers.

The Vision of MacConglinne: A Middle Irish Wonder Tale. Edited, with a Translation (based on Hennessy's), Notes, and a Glossary, by Kuno Meyer, with an Introduction by Wilhelm Wollner. (David Nutt.)

WE have learnt ere this to look to Prof. Kuno Meyer as an able maintainer of the great traditions of German scholarship in the way of Celtic literature. Elsewhere he has spoken of his indebtedness to Windisch; and Windisch leads one on to the remarkable group of his fellow-countrymen whose labours have had their masterpiece so far in the great Grammar of Zeuss. Here, indeed, is a reminder of European reputations, which might make one feel the sting in the saying of a native Irish scholar, who, talking of the decay of Irish industries, complained that even their philology was now "made in Germany." Nothing could be more wittily untrue, so far as this implies a dearth of native scholarship; but it serves to mark how much we really do owe in these things to our German allies. And here we have Prof. Meyer adding notably to our debt; for though he has his chair at Liverpool, we cannot, of course, take any native credit on that account for his work among us.

However, if this edition of the Vision of MacConglinne be mainly the work of two foreign collaborators, of whom Prof. Wollner, of Leipzig, who writes the introduction, is the second, the book by no means ignores its Irish origin. As the title-page tells us, the translation itself is based on that of the late W. M. Hennessy, to whom Prof. Meyer pays due tribute. Hennessy's version was published in Fraser's Magazine twenty years ago; and the present translator, it seems, had at first thought simply of reprinting it intact, or with the slightest modifications. But this proved not feasible for various reasons; and eventually a new translation was prepared by Prof. Meyer, "basing it on Hennessy's and adopting his rendering wherever it seemed accurate and forcible." In the Glossary to the Irish text, which is of course indispensable, all words not given in Windisch's Wörterbuch, with some few additions, are to be found, and full and extremely interesting notes add further to the book's effect. Moreover, not only have we the version of the tale as it exists in the Leabhar Breac, or "Speckled Book"; but we have appended a shorter version from a paper manuscript of the seventeenth century, which is in the collection of Trinity College. This shorter version, though later in date of actual transcription, is, in Prof. Wollner's opinion, really an older and purer form of the tale. The difference between the two texts is very suggestive; but we do not propose to go into it here. It is enough to take the Leabhar Breac tale, whose added fantastic conceits and flowers of style but serve to enhance its Rabelaisian humour and spirit of extravagance.

Readers of Dr. Hyde's collection of Irish folk-tales, Beside the Fire, will remember one of the most striking things in it, the account of the Alp Luachra, the uncanny beast of the newt kind, which took up its abode in a man, with dietetic results that may be imagined. In the Vision of MacConglinne we have something of the same motive, with a difference:

"Cathal MacFinginne was a good king, who governed Munster; a great warrior prince was he. A warrior of this sort: with the edge of a hound, he ate like a horse. Satan, that is, a demon of gluttony that was in his throat, used to devour his rations with him. A pig and a cow and a bull-calf of three hands, with three score cakes of pure wheat and a vat of new ale, and thirty heathpoult's eggs, that was his first dole, besides his other snack, until his great feast was ready for him. As regards the great feast, that passes account or reckoning."

In this predicament of Cathal's we may find, a little obscurely at a first glance, MacConglinne's opportunity. MacConglinne has, however, his own salvation to work, as well as Cathal's. He is already a great scholar, though a poor one; but at heart he is more than a scholar. He has the poet's impulse: "A great longing seized the mind of the scholar to follow poetry, and to abandon his reading; for wretched to him was his life in the shade of his studies." So he decides, one Friday night, to go and join King Cathal, then on a royal progress in Munster. Early on Saturday morning, having sold what little stock of books he had for "two wheaten cakes and a slice of old bacon with a streak across its middle," and disposed these in his book-satchel, he sets out. That Saturday he journeys all the way from Roscommon to Cork, where he repairs to the guest-house for the night. His arrival there, and the peculiar discomfort of the place, remind one not a little of the preliminaries of Rhonabwy's famous dream in the Mabinogion. Only there are added circumstances of wretchedness in MacConglinne's case; and his vision, of course, is utterly unlike Rhonabwy's, which is of the very quintessence of imaginative romance. The Vision of MacConglinne is the dramatic outcome of the sleep of a starved and miserable man, in which his mind revels in a grotesque superabundance of all favourite kinds of food. In this dream the dreamer sails in a coracle of lard upon a sea of new milk, and reaches a fort on the shores of a loch:

"New butter was the bridge in front,
The rubble dyke was wheaten white,
Bacon the palisade.

"Stately, pleasantly it sat,
A compact house and strong.
Then I went in:
The door of it was dry meat,
The threshold was bare bread,
Cheese-curd the sides.

"Smooth pillars of old cheese,
And sappy bacon props
Alternate ranged;
Fine beams of yellow cream,
White rafters—real curds,
Kept up the house."

There are nine such verses in MacConglinne's first narrative of his vision; but it is often rehearsed and often added to, ere it has worked its final purpose of helping to extract the demon of gluttony from Cathal. In the issue, it is recited by MacConglinne to a fitting accompaniment of real and fragrant viands, in the presence of Cathal, when he is in the last stage of inanition. This so excites the demon, which is of necessity a party to his hunger, that presently it is seen "licking its lips outside his head" in anticipation, until at last it darts forth to seize one of the pieces of meat which MacConglinne passes tantalisingly before the king's mouth. And so Cathal is cured.

Here is the baldest summary of what can only really be appreciated in the fulness and extravagance of its details, and in the extreme picturesqueness and humour of their presentation. And we have said nothing of the more imaginative side of MacConglinne, or of the place of his tale in folk-lore. For the latter we may be content to refer the reader to the capable introduction by Prof. Wollner, in which—and in Prof. Meyer's own notes—the scientific interest of the tale is very amply demonstrated. Its interest as a tale pure and simple, its fantasy and humour, fortunately lie plain for everyone, and need no particular science to discover.

It is, perhaps, worth adding that, of the two versions, the late W. M. Hennessey's is sometimes the more idiomatic, the present always the more accurate. Occasionally Prof. Meyer may seem to give doubtful readings, or to use too literary a rendering, as where he translates the line,

"Nídat culbde a comanmaad,"

(in some verses which Hennessey did not translate at all) into "Their names are no sweet symphonies";

but the whole is so carefully and thoroughly wrought, that the present is not likely, we imagine, to be traversed by any future translator. We should further add that the publication of the book at all, as Prof. Meyer tells us, is directly due to the zeal of Mr. Alfred Nutt, who has so often before this served as foster-father to such Celtic enterprises. Let us trust that the Celtic Renaissance will arrive soon enough to render to all who have collaborated in the book other than a sentimental return only!

IN point of effective writing there is no fault to be found with Mrs. Finch Brassey. Whether the author has not a little overshot her mark in the treatment of her central figure is more open to question. The story is wholly devoted to village gossip and tittle-tattle, the area of action being peculiarly restricted, since every incident in the book occurs within the parish of Whincliffe and its immediate neighbourhood. Novels of this sort are apt to burden the reader at first with a multitude of separate family names and interests; and in the present work it takes some time to get into one's head the precise position and circumstances of the Grahams, the Draytons, the Wentworths, the Combermeres, the D'Arcy Demains, the Grisedales, and so forth; but when the task is once achieved, there is this recompense, that the narrative never strays beyond them. Amid this group of quiet and, for the most part, eminently respectable persons, Mrs. Finch Brassey moves, executing her mission of perpetual interference and disturbance. She is a fast, flaunting woman, thoroughly demi-mondaine in habits and instincts, who by mere force of restless energy and self-assertion has contrived to domineer the unwilling neighbourhood. As a study she is a little overdrawn: she crops up with too persistent frequency, and spoils everybody else's game too audaciously to be a person whose social existence in a small country place could long be endured. And her attempt to entrap a rather dull-witted young man into matrimony, by writing him a letter accepting his offer (which had never been made at all), is altogether too shameless to be credible. Of the other characters there is little to be said; all turns out smoothly in the end, and an abundant number of marriages wind up the story.

There is nothing which can lay claim to any originality in By Right of Succession. When a country squire dies in the act of vainly endeavouring to impart some important secret to his daughters, and the daughters are forthwith turned out of the house as being illegitimate, the property passing into the hands of a distant cousin, a widow lady with a grown-up son, not a doubt can arise in any practised novel-reader's mind as to what will happen at the end of the third volume. In this case, Grace and Sibyl Gordon, the two young ladies with a slur on their pedigree, are despatched by the widow to a conveniently remote part of Germany; and nothing can be more intrinsically probable than that her own son, Austin Gordon, who is roaming the Continent with a pupil, should come across these two damsels, who have assumed the name of Evans, and lose his heart to one of them. The details of the narrative are worked out with commendable precision, and several effective situations occur, but the same want of originality we remarked upon in the plot appears also in the construction of the characters: Grace and Sybil Gordon, the self-denying and self-indulgent sisters, have almost exact counterparts in their cousins, Beatrice and Minnie Gordon, whom also they are alleged to resemble in features; and the Captain Grant, who marries Beatrice, is much the same type of person as Austin Gordon, who marries Grace. But allowing for these small defects, the tale reads easily and pleasantly throughout; it is entirely free from padding, and is never wearisome.

Mr. Mitford has earned a reputation for stories of South African life which should be well sustained by his latest production, The Gun-Runner: a romance of the Zulu war in its earlier stages, embracing the massacre at Isandhlwana and the defence of Rorke's Drift. His book is filled with interesting details of historical scenes and events, and it is written with a considerable degree of indignant feeling on behalf of "the finest and most intelligent race of savages in the world—now, thanks to the 'beneficent' policy of England, crushed and 'civilised' out of all recognition." The "Gun-Runner" himself is an Englishman, who, having been hounded from home and country by a nefarious plot hatched by his half-brother, has settled on the borders of Zululand, and being on terms of intimate friendship with his dusky neighbours, supplies them freely with rifles for use against his countrymen, when the latter menace them with invasion. The story is rather a gruesome tale of revenge, as the author, in an apologetic sort of preface, admits, and it ends somewhat disappointingly; but it is written with a good deal of vigour and imaginative power. The author also displays throughout an intimate acquaintance with the persons and scenery described; indeed, he expressly states that "the bulk of the Zulu chiefs and indunas who figure in the book are real characters, and, including the king, were, in times past, personally known to the writer."

The title of Mrs. Edward Kennard's book sufficiently explains its subject matter. To readers who are not enthusiastic sportsmen, the continual recurrence of marriages resulting from acquaintance made during runs across country may seem a trifle monotonous; but this is a point which will scarcely trouble the Nimrods and Dianas, whose only passion is the hunting field. In one particular the author is certainly to be commended: Sporting Tales are throughout free from Mrs. Kennard's favourite device, namely, the introduction of a stupid or brutal husband to serve as a foil for the superior intelligence and virtue of the woman who condescends to become his wife. The stories themselves are of too slight a kind to need detailed notice; they are of fair average merit, though marks of haste and carelessness may be observed here and there. Thus, when (pp. 262, 263) Mr. Sinclair overtakes Phyllis, and the latter wishes to avoid encountering his gaze, she might have done better than study the hedgerow "on her immediate right." This criticism of an author, whose knowledge of such subjects should be above suspicion, is, of course, offered with diffidence. In our simplicity we should have thought her purpose would have been more effectually served by gazing in the other direction; unless, indeed, it is a newly established end-of-the-century custom for a gentleman on horseback to approach a lady on horseback and woo her from the near side instead of the off.

In The Bow and the Sword we have a record of the adventures of Cambyse, father of Cyrus the Great, and his wife Mandane, daughter of Astyages, King of the Medes. The young married pair, after narrowly escaping destruction through the intrigues of Mardes, the chief adviser of Astyages, traverse Asia Minor, and visit successively Greece, Egypt, and portions of Arabia and Abyssinia, returning home by the Persian Gulf. The narrative purports to be a compilation from the historical record afforded by the Shushan cylinders; but opportunity has been taken to incorporate a good deal of information borrowed from Herodotus, Xenophon, and other Greek writers, with a plentiful introduction of Bible history. Among familiar historical characters which appear in its pages are Harpagus, Nebuchadnezzar, Pisistratus, Megacles, and Amasis, the successful Egyptian usurper. The incidents are related with a good deal of vividness and dramatic vigour, but the book will hardly bear comparison with romances of a kindred nature by more powerful writers—e.g., Whyte Melville's Sarchedon. There is a tacit assumption throughout of the reality of omens and dreams, and occult influences and supernatural agencies, which put the work beyond the pale of anything but a Christmas gift book, for which its binding and abundant illustrations amply fit it.

The Resident's Daughter is concerned entirely with Dutch life, the scene being sometimes placed in Holland, but principally in Java. Etty, daughter of Colonel Klovens, meets, on board an East Indiaman, Van Welven, a government official bound for Java, who marries her, and on his arrival is appointed to a post at Tjerawangan in the eastern part of the island. The narrative is spread over some twenty or thirty years, and has reference to the private life of the Van Welvens and their relatives or friends in Batavia and elsewhere. The "Resident's Daughter" of the story is a child of Van Welven by a former wife, a Javanese woman. The book is a homely and prosaic production, replete with descriptions of family bickerings and mild matrimonial intrigues, which will have to be written with a good deal more piquancy than the present author displays if they are to satisfy the demands of an exacting public.

The Spoilt Child is interesting as being the best known and best esteemed work of Peary Chand Mitter, "the father of Bengali novelists." The spoilt child of the story is Matilall, son of Baburam Babu, and the audacity of his behaviour is certainly astonishing. However, the Indian names are difficult to keep in memory, and as a mere story the book is often tedious. Its merit lies in the quiet humour and quaint illustrations with which the author em-bellishes his narrative, his intelligent advocacy of education, and his unsparing hostility to drunkenness, immorality, and polygamous or mercenary marriages.

St. Briavel's Rectory, further described as "The Story of a Quiet Welsh Parsonage," is a shilling novelette of very moderate merit. Family breakfasts, dinners, and teas, with the conversations accompanying them, form the subject matter of most of the book; and the only sensational event is a boating accident, in which one of the principal characters of the story has a narrow escape of being drowned.

JOHN BARROW ALLEN.

SOME VOLUMES OF VERSE.

An Enchanted Castle, and Other Poems. By Sarah Piatt. (Longmans.) It appears that the poems which go to make up this fragrant little volume have been collected from several small books of earlier dates. Never was there a more pressing need for good work to be put between two covers. The way of the reviewer is thorny when it is hedged in by this and that poet's poetry, but sometimes there is a golden gap through which he has view of a fair country. Mrs. Piatt's songs are the delightful outcome of a nature which is the home of all the emotions that become concentrated in poetry; and he is a poor dullard who can rise from the perusal of An Enchanted Castle, and say there has been no sweet price paid for his time. Mrs. Piatt is greatly gifted. She is capable of fashioning flawless lyrics; she knows the rare trick of properly poisoning humour; she is a mistress of the art of writing poetry for children that appeals to the father and the mother. It is no easy matter to quote from a book wherein the contents are of such equal value. Castles, birds, flowers, babies—all are here deliciously presented. It seems to us that "His Views of the Cuckoo" is a triumph of compressed simplicity.

"The little exile, whose sweet head
Wore yet the Atlantic sun,
Threw down his hoop; 'That's it,' he said—
'And it is only one!'"

"It can't behave like other birds
At home across the sea;
It tries to make ' (I write his words)
'You think it's more than three."

"That cuckoo's not a cuckoo, though,
I heard him murmuring;
'It isn't—anywhere, you know;
It isn't—anything!'"

"But, somehow, it is—everywhere
At once! and I suppose
It can't build nests, for it's—the air!
I know a boy that knows."

It is no exaggeration to say that every page of these ninety-six is graced by some airy beauty of expression or thought. All the poems seem to have been written out in the open, while children and birds made music for the author of these fresh and unconventional utterances. If sadness or regret are allowed to darken any of Mrs. Piatt's brighter dreams, they neither stay long nor cheat her of extended notice. If home sickness can always result in such a poem as "A Word with a Skylark," we cannot wish Mrs. Piatt in America again.

"If this be all, for which I've listened long,
O spirit of the dew!
You did not sing to Shelley such a song
As Shelley sung to you."

"Yet, with this ruined Old World for a nest, Worm-eaten through and through,
This waste of grave-dust stamped with crown and crest—
What better could you do?"

"Ah, me! but when the world and I were young,
There was an apple tree;
There was a voice came in the dawn and sung
The birds awake—ah, me!"

"O Lark of Europe! downward fluttering near,
Like some spent leaf at best,
You'd never sing again if you could hear
My Blue-Bird of the West!"

It is not patriotism that makes us cordially wish the second stanza away, but love of poetry. One word more and we are done. What does Mrs. Piatt mean by saying once or twice "when the dew is dim"?

Musa Consolatrix. By Charles Sayle. (David Nutt.) Whosoever should buy Musa Consolatrix will purchase some verse, some poetry, and a great deal of waste paper. There are 130 pages in the book, and only forty-six of these contain contributions from Mr. Sayle's pen. This is coming near to making a rood serve as an acre; and there is ground for a pretty squabble between the purchaser and the publisher, unless the volume has been advertised as containing only forty-six pages. We very well remember having read Erodidia a year or so ago, and it is pleasant to see Mr. Sayle's growth in excellence. His advance in direct and telling utterance is most marked, and he has cultivated purity of style almost to frigidity. Some of his lines are of a most potent significance; they are loaded with meaning, satisfying both the ear and the brain. Though there are but a few numbers here piped for us, Mr. Sayle has admitted more flaws than can be excused. It is not easy to forgive the use of "lyre" as a dissyllable, nor the rhyming of "lies" and "realise," while the vocative "O Omar" goes far toward ruining what might easily be an exquisite trifle. The first verse of "To F. P." contains a lamentable carelessness, but the big black sin is "In Memoriam." Nearly every line is an agony to the ear. How a scholar could deliver himself of such a jolting piece of awkwardness is, indeed, past comprehension. "A Game of Bowls" is excellent. It is addressed to the Jack.

"Light of step you fled away
Across the velvet grass that day.
Watching, we strove to follow you,
With skill of bias, two and two."

"Some have wandered far afield,
Mis-spent by an impetuous arm;
Others prosperously reeled
Into the circle of your charm."

"That lumbering fellow stands and stares,
Distant a foot's space, more or less,
And filled with self-sufficient airs,
Lives ignorant of happiness."

"This other, waiting still afar,
Turns his full gaze to where you are,
And mourns across the parting plain,
He cannot have his time again."

"Of me one half has gone astray,
And on the gravelled desert died—
The other half found out the way
And, dribbling, tumbled to your side."

This proves that Mr. Sayle has humour and great skill in expression. If anyone asks for an example of lovely poetry, we at once refer him to the last verse of "Puck."

Verses By the Way. By J. D. Hosken. (Methuen.) We suppose there is no critic in these days, howsoever strong his constitution, who does not shudder little or much when a new book of poetry is put into his hands. What makes him to tremble? It is the sonnet-sequence. There are but twenty-one sheep to Mr. Hosken's flock of sonnets, and in this limit there is subject for thanksgiving. Mr. Hosken has yielded to his evil angel. How much better would he have prospered had he listened to the good spirit calling him to simple songs!

We have looked forward to this book of verses, by the way, with unspeakable interest. The warm-hearted introduction by Mr. Quiller-Couch, devoured at express speed, added fuel to flame; and we began upon Mr. Hosken with avidity. Disappointment and confusion were our portion. The poet nowhere justifies the panegyric. There are some fine lines, some graceful verses, some touching thoughts happily mated with words; but an anxious search does not reveal a single perfect poem. Are we become impotent? Is there in this volume, as Mr. Quiller-Couch says there is, one gush of melody to take rank with that music of Shelley which we love? We think not; but we hope with all our might that for to-day our eyes are blind and our ears full with folly.

In the Shade of Ygdrasil. By Frederick Peterson, M.D. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.) Are the writers of American minor verse, taken in the lump, better than their English relations, or do the overseas publishers behave more warily than those in London? Probably in the midst of a practical, mechanical people the muse of song finds fewer open houses. One thing is certain: the volumes of verse that are visitors to our shores strike a better average than do the abundant books of rhyme that, coming from our own presses, exceed the hairs of the head in multitude. We have before us a case of poetry and physic going hand in hand; and the union is, for the most part, successful. Dr. Peterson has wooed brevity wisely. None of his poems drag their slow length along in the manner of Virgil's snake. As a consequence of this wisdom some very finished little songs are here printed, and most of the pages prove that the workmanship has been of the thrice-refining order. There are songs that are ugly, and songs that are silly ("The Bluebell's Chorus" is both), but on the whole In the Shade of Ygdrasil is poetically pleasant. "The sweetest flower that blows" deserves quotation.

"The sweetest flower that blows
I give you as we part;
For you it is a rose;
For me it is my heart.

"The fragrance it exhales,
(Ah, if you only knew!)
Which but in dying falls,
It is my love of you.

"The sweetest flower that grows
I give you as we part;
You think it but a rose;
Ah me! it is my heart."

We should like to call Dr. Peterson's notice to the "—ce it ex—" in the first line of the second stanza. These three syllables are hard to say, and the following aspirate does not improve matters.

Portraits. By Augusta Webster. (Macmillans.) It is doing no wrong to say that in Portraits Mrs. Webster shows herself to be a feminine Browning. The gentler impulses of womanhood, mated with undoubted powers of valuable utterance, result in a loss of fibre and a gain of smoothness. Here is no occasion for falling head over heels, tripped up by those sudden irregularities which Browning strewed in the reader's poetical pathway; here are no impossible lines, and few ugly ones. Mrs. Webster is a remarkable worker, and in these poems expresses, sometimes with nobility, the passion of poetry that is in her. Her wealth of simile is beyond the dreams of avarice: she is as much at home in a brick-and-mortar world as she is in the heart of a forest. To quote would but be to tantalise, so we must content ourselves by recommending those who do not possess an earlier edition of Portraits to make themselves acquainted with the third edition at once. "Faded" has never before appeared.

Selections from the Verse of Augusta Webster. (Macmillans.) When there have been advanced against Mrs. Augusta Webster a certain gentle garrulity and a quite undue affection for refrains, little room is left for the finding of faults. The refrain is as difficult to manage as a volcano. A little lava may be a glorious thing, but a lot is often vexatious; in the same way a refrain, sparingly and prettily introduced into such lyric as Mrs. Webster writes, comes as a touch of unexpected sunlight. But refrains wholesale do not exhilarate. We do not mean to assert that in this book there are refrains by the gross, but the trick is tried and suggested brokenly too often. Of the first five short poems, three are thus treated. But this book of Selections is, on the whole, a delightful bounty of song. Surely "We Two" could move even the unpoetical:

"We two that could not part are parted long;
He in the far-off heaven, and I to wait.
A fair world once, all blossom-time and song;
But to be lonely tires, and I live late.
To think we two have not a word to change:
And one without the other here is strange!
To think we two have nothing now to share:
I wondering here, and he without me there!"

This appeared twelve years ago among the English Rispetti. "Pilate," "The Manuscript of Saint Alexius," and "Yu-Pe-Ya's Lute" are the instances of Mrs. Webster's strength in length in the present volume; so both those readers who like their poetry in small doses, and those who can drain a "loving-cup" of it, have cause for lively satisfaction.

NORMAN GALE.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE understand that the first two volumes of Canon Liddon's Life of Dr. Pusey will probably be published early in October. The work will consist altogether of four volumes, and will have several portraits and other illustrations. The task of preparing it for publication, since Canon Liddon's death, has been performed by the Rev. J. O. Johnston and the Rev. Robert J. Wilson, warden of Keble.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co.'s announcements for the autumn season include: an edition de luxe of the "Cambridge Shakspeare," consisting of forty volumes super-royal octavo printed on hand-made paper and bound in Irish linen, to be issued at the rate of two volumes a month, beginning in October; an edition de luxe of Tennyson's "Maud," printed at the Kelmscott Press, with decorations by Mr. William Morris, and bound in vellum—of both of these the impression is limited to 500 copies, including those ordered for America; a re-issue of the illustrated edition of Tennyson's Poems of 1857, containing wood-engravings after Millais, Holman Hunt, Rossetti, Maclise, &c.; Miss Christina Rossetti's Goblin Market, with full-page illustrations by Mr. Lawrence Housman; Washington Irving's Rip Van Winkle, illustrated by Mr. George H. Boughton; Miss Mitford's Our Village, with a preface by Mrs. Ritchie and 100 illustrations by Mr. Hugh Thomson; and the Humorous Poems of Thomas Hood, with a preface by Canon Ainger and illustrations by Charles E. Brock. Of these latter, also, there will be limited editions, with the engravings printed on Japanese paper.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. announce an important historical work, in several volumes, to be called Social England: a record of the progress of the people, from the earliest times to the present day, in religion, laws, learning, arts, science, literature, industry, commerce, and manners. The general editor is Mr. H. D. Traill. The first volume, covering the period down to the accession of Edward the First, will be issued early in the coming season. Among the contributors are Prof. F. W. Maitland, Dr. C. Creighton, Colonel Cooper King, Mr. Hubert Hall, Mr. W. Laird Clowes, and several members of the historical school at Oxford.

MESSRS. CASSELL will also publish shortly a second series of the Diplomatic Reminiscences of Lord Augustus Loftus, in two volumes, covering the period from 1862 to 1879, while he was ambassador at the courts of Munich, Berlin, and St. Petersburg; and a book entitled With Thackeray in America, by Mr. Eyre Crowe, A.R.A., with numerous illustrations. The author accompanied Thackeray as his amanuensis during his tour through the United States in the winter of 1852-53.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. have in the press a re-issue, in three volumes, of the prose works of the late William Allingham, to be called Varieties in Prose. The first two volumes will have for a sub-title "Rambles," after the collection of papers published under the pseudonym of Patricius Walker in 1873. The third volume will contain Irish sketches, six essays, and a little play, "Hopgood & Co." In an introduction, Mrs. Allingham states that her husband had left the whole ready for publication before his death.

WE understand that Mr. Austin Dobson is preparing for publication a second series of Eighteenth Century Vignettes.

A NEW volume by Mr. John Davidson, the author of "Fleet Street Eclogues," will shortly be published by Messrs. Elkin Mathews & John Lane. It is to be called A Random Itinerary, and gives a poet's view of the things observed in the course of walks in and near London. A frontispiece by Mr. Will Rothenstein will add to the interest of the volume. The same publishers are also preparing a collected edition of Mr. Davidson's plays, which will contain, in addition to those in the formerly published collection, reprints, with some revision, of two scarce little dramas—"Bruce," a chronicle play, and "Smith," a tragedy. This volume will have a frontispiece by Mr. Aubrey Beardsley, in which certain well-known faces will be easily recognised.

ARRANGEMENTS have now been concluded for the issue of Sir Richard Burton's metrical translation of Catullus. It will be accompanied by a literal prose translation, by Mr. Leonard C. Smithers, who is also responsible for the introduction and notes. The book will be issued privately, and at a high price, with an etching after Blake's portrait for frontispiece. Subscriptions will be received by Mr. H. S. Nichols, 3, Soho-square.

SEVERAL posthumous works of Mr. E. A. Freeman are announced for publication this autumn. Messrs. Macmillan will issue two volumes of his Oxford lectures, dealing with Western Europe in the fifth and in the eighth century; while Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons will be the publishers of a collection of historical and archaeological papers, entitled Studies of Travel in Greece and Italy, also in two volumes, with a preface by his daughter, and a portrait. We may further mention that his History of Sicily is being translated into German by Dr. Bernhard Lupus, of Strassburg.

MISS MARIE CORELLI's new romance will be published by Messrs. Methuen early in October. Messrs. Lippincott, of New York, have secured the American copyright, and Baron Tauchnitz made arrangements for the continental edition some months ago. The work, which for special reasons will not be designated as a mere novel, is entitled Barabbas: a Dream of the World's Tragedy.

MR. GRANT ALLEN's novel, "The Scallywag," which has been appearing serially in the Illustrated London News, will be published next week, in three-volume form, by Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

MR. GEORGE EGERTON'S Keynotes, which Messrs. Elkin Mathews & John Lane are preparing for speedy issue, will form an entirely new feature in the list of this firm, who have hitherto avoided the publication of fiction. The modernity and sparkle of Mr. Egerton's tales induce Messrs. Mathews and Lane to hope that the public will welcome this departure.

A NEW novel in two volumes by Mr. Anthony Hope, entitled Half a Hero, is in the autumn list of Messrs A. D. Innes & Co. The interest of the new book will be found to be of a somewhat graver character than in the works by which Mr. Hope has made his reputation.

MR. ARTHUR INNES will himself publish, with his own firm, a volume of critical essays, which he has contributed to the Monthly Packet. The title of the book will be "Seers and Singers: a Study of Five Poets."

MRS. WILLIAM HARTOPP, a writer of graceful child-stories, has recently died. A posthumous book of hers will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin next week, entitled The Heart of Montrose and Other Stories.

MRS. MOLESWORTH'S story-book for this Christmas is simply entitled Mary. As for the two previous years, the illustrator will be Mr. Leslie Brooke.

THE next volume in the series of "Canterbury Poets" will be Contemporary Scottish Verse, with an introduction by Sir George Douglas. Among the authors represented are—Dr. George MacDonald, the Earl of Southesk, Prof. Blackie, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. R. L. Stevenson, Mr. Hugh Haliburton, and Mr. John Davidson. A special edition will be issued, with a photograph portrait of Mr. Stevenson.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish next week a lyrical drama entitled Baldur, founded on the well-known Norse legend. The author, Mr. H. Ormond Anderton, is the composer of an MS. opera, of which this is the libretto.

THE new volume of the "Book-Lovers' Library" will be a collection of modern verse about books and bookish subjects, entitled Book-song, edited by Mr. Gleeson White. An anthology of older verse on the same subject is to follow later on.

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co. announce the "Whitehall Shakspeare," in eight volumes, printed in large type, on antique laid paper, at the Chiswick Press. The text has been carefully edited, and a few notes will be given at the end of each play. As with all Messrs. Constable's books, special attention has been given to the matter of binding.

THE Leadenhall Press will issue early this month In Jest and Earnest: a Book of Gossip, by Mr. Joseph Hatton. It contains an "epistle dedicatory," making Mr. J. L. Toole responsible for most of the links that hold the more serious parts of the book together.

MR. PHIL ROBINSON'S new book, Country Sights and Sounds, will be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin next week.

M. ZOLA has attained the dignity of a full-dress biography during his lifetime. It is written by Mr. R. H. Sherard, and will have numerous illustrations.

MESSRS. ISBISTER & Co.'s announcements for September include—Christ and our Times; by Archdeacon Sinclair; Fragments in Baskets; a Book of Allegories, by Mrs. Boyd Carpenter, wife of the Bishop of Ripon; and A Concise Bible Dictionary, compiled by the Rev. A. Westcott and Dr. J. Watt.

MR. CHARLES ROBINSON, a member of the editorial staff of the North American Review, has written a history of political parties in Europe, which will be published in October.

MR. HEINEMANN is again reprinting The Heavenly Twins, in three volumes, so commencing the fourth thousand. No cheaper edition will be published this year.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN has decided to raise the price of the Mermaid Series from half-a-crown to three-and-six, after January 1, 1894.

THE publication of Mrs. Steel's From the Five Rivers, announced for Monday last, is unavoidably delayed for a week.

SEVERAL criticisms having suggested to Mr. Herbert Spencer that his Preface to the second volume of The Principles of Ethics (published last spring) was misleading, he has decided to recast it; and the new preface will be substituted in all copies hereafter issued. The most important change made is the omission of the somewhat startling statement, beginning, "The Doctrine of Evolution has not furnished guidance to the extent I had hoped." For this, we now have the following:

"In view of these admissions, some will contend that no aid is here furnished by the general Doctrine of Evolution. The first reply is that, in that chief division of Ethics treating of Justice, it furnishes aid both as verifying conclusions empirically drawn, and as leading to certain unaccepted conclusions of importance. If it be said that, throughout the divisions of Ethics dealing with Beneficence, Negative and Positive, the conclusions must, as above implied, be chiefly empirical, and that therefore here, at any rate, the Doctrine of Evolution does not help us, the reply is that it helps us in general ways, though not in special ways. In the first place, for certain modes of conduct which at present are supposed to have no sanction if they have not a supernatural sanction, it yields us a natural sanction—shows us that such modes of conduct fall within the lines of evolving humanity, are conducive to a higher life, and are for this reason obligatory. And, in the second place, where it leaves us to form empirical judgments, it brings into view those general truths by which our empirical judgments should be guided—indicates the limits within which they must fall."

WE are asked to state that Mr. Elliott Stock will publish the book on British Family Names, by Dr. Henry Barber, which was announced in the ACADEMY of last week.

As we believe it is proposed to publish the correspondence of the late Bishop Phillips Brooks, it may be as well to call attention to the fact that the series of his letters from India, which appear in the current number of the Century, are disfigured by numerous misprints. On p. 758 we are gravely told that Delhi "was the centre of the great meeting of 1857"; and on p. 760 occurs the vox nihili "unsarled," for which we can only conjecture "unscathed." The names of both Sir James Fergusson and Sir Charles Aitchison are misspelt, and we have noticed other (more pardonable) blunders in proper names. It is evident also that the letter from "Bankapoor," printed on p. 757, is erroneously dated January 3, instead of January 30; and that it has consequently been misplaced.

OBITUARY.

WE regret to record the death of the Rev. Foster Barham Zincke, one of the best-known personages in East Anglia, and a voluminous author. He died at Wherstead Vicarage, on August 21, in his seventy-seventh year. He was born in Jamaica, where his father then owned a large estate; but we have heard that the family came to England from Germany in the reign of Queen Anne. Going up to Oxford, he matriculated at Wadham, and graduated with a second class in 1839. Among the few names in the first class of that year are those of Dean Goulburn, Father Christie, and

W. Linwood. He was forthwith ordained to a curacy at Wherstead in Suffolk, where he was destined to spend the remainder of his days; for in 1847 he was selected by the crown to succeed his old vicar. He wrote the history of his parish in a big volume (1887), of which a second edition, greatly enlarged, appeared only this very summer. There may be found much about his predecessors, but nothing about himself. His own autobiography was printed for private circulation, under the title of The Days of My Years. His other works describe visits that he paid to the United States, to Egypt, and to Switzerland. He also wrote much on social and educational questions.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THE BEATIFIC VISION.

WHERE is the highest heaven? Is it yon star
That flames and quivers through the woven shade,
Wherein the bowers of hidden joy are made,
Vega, in zenith splendour pure and far?
Ah, no! for hurrying onward, car on car,
The hosts of God in serried ranks arrayed
By turns must climb and shine and fall and fade, Weak symbols of the things that ever are.

Nor is it that unwedded inner law

That bends not for our pleasure or our pain,
Though there the sage its sovereign presence SAW:
More heavenly high the vision that discerns,
Fed from earth's breast and watered by her rain
The ripening of thought's infinite returns.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ON THE SUPPOSED OLD-IRISH VERSION OF HORATIAN ODES.

Oxford: Aug. 21, 1893.

In Nennius Vindicatus (Berlin, 1893, p. 89, note), Prof. Zimmer infers, from a quotation in Cormac's Glossary, that in Ireland, in the ninth century at latest, odes of Horace existed in the Irish language. The quotation is gar cian co tía for cel: it is introduced by the words unde dicitur; Prof. Zimmer gives as its translation serus in caelum redeas (Horace, Odes i. 2. 45); and he adds:

"Die Uebersetzung der Ode i. 2 des Horaz war also im 9. Jahr. in Irland so bekannt, das ein Beleg aus ihr einfach mit unde dicitur eingeführt wird."

Like other ingenious theories of Prof. Zimmer, all this rests on a misunderstanding of the Irish. Cormac's quotation, as Mr. S. H. O'Grady has shown in his Silva Gadelica ii. 558, 569, means "(be it) short, (or be it) long till thou shalt go to heaven," and all resemblance to Ode i. 2. 45 thus falls to the ground. After this exposure, Prof. Zimmer will hardly maintain that the ninth-century Irish had a translation of the Horatian ode (ii. 3. 26), in which we find "serius ocibus sors exitura," or of the Ovidian poem (Met. x. 33), which has "Serius aut citius sedem properamus ad unam"—much closer parallels to Cormac's quotation.

Another of Prof. Zimmer's mistakes is worth mentioning, though he has not yet, so far as I know, founded a theory upon it. In his Gloss. Hib. Supplementum, p. 5, he gives, as an Old-Irish gloss in the Paris MS. of Philargyus, sandix .i. glaus. It needs but little perspicacity to see that we have here nothing but a corruption of a Greek gloss, viz. γλαύξ, just as we have, in the sister MS. in the Laurentian Library, corymbos .i. brutus, which is only βρύπος misspelt.

It is the duty of every scholar to nail such false coins to the counter. True, in the present case they are only farthings; but then they are undoubtedly brass.

WHITLEY STOKES.

THE "QUARTERLY REVIEWER'S" KNOWLEDGE OF OLD FRENCH.

Oxford: Aug. 16, 1893.

I have, of course, no intention of replying to the curious diatribe that has just appeared in the Quarterly Review. As with the letters in the Athenaeum, every word of abuse levelled at my head is but a fresh proof how deeply my criticism has bitten. No one has recourse to scurrility till argument fails. Hence, the more intemperate the Quarterly Reviewer's language, the better I am pleased. Any one reading my article in the Contemporary Review (as I most certainly wish it to be read) side by side with the Quarterly article of last year, will see that its tone was perfectly fair and courteous; and, when such a reader contrasts my pages with the violence of the Quarterly Review, he will at once remember the old saw—"No case: abuse the plaintiff."

I wish, however, to make one or two remarks. I have long suspected that the Quarterly Reviewer was ignorant of Old French. This was pretty evident from his original article, when he wrote of certain lines in the so-called "crucial" passage: "It is, moreover, so obvious that 'escuz de fenestres e d'altres fuz' refers to shields, and not (as Mr. Freeman renders it) to 'firm barricades of ash and other timber,' that one is led to wonder how he can have so misread it." Since this date I have heard that the Reviewer's knowledge of Old French is so singularly meagre that he has been known to confuse a "cas régime" with a "cas sujet."

It is, however, with his new article that I wish to deal just now.

1. The "crucial" passage contains the lines—

"Fait orent devant els escuz De fenestres e d'altres fuz."

Now, my article proved * that, if "fenestres" means ash-trees—a meaning which I, not the Quarterly Reviewer, have questioned, these lines must be rendered—"The English peasants" had made before them shield [-like defence]s of ash-trees and other kinds of wood." I have just shown how the Quarterly Reviewer translated these lines a year ago. He has since gone a step further, and says that my translation is "ludicrous." Now, sir, I propose to pin the Reviewer down to his own word "ludicrous." I have waited patiently for some such pronouncement and at last I have got it. I have got, indeed, even more than I could have fairly expected; for the Reviewer proceeds to lay down that the mediaeval word escu invariably means a shield: i.e., is never used in a metaphorical sense. Would he be surprised to learn that "faire escu de quelque chose" is a common twelfth or thirteenth century phrase, for using as a shield or defence something which is not primarily a shield? I will go to no source more recondite than Littré in evidence of what I say:

"[Il] fist de sa corune escu contre l'espée
"De sa vie [il] a fet escu por s'ame defendre ;"

and, better still than all else, the passage from "Berte aux grans piés." Bertha, years before Charlemagne's birth, is wandering homeless; and, as dark draws on, she lies down to sleep in the open air. The night is stormy, and she has no shelter; so, as the old poet tells us—

"Contre vent [elle] fait escu d'arbrissiaux."

"Against the wind she makes a shield [-like defence] of bushes or brushwood"—just as Harold's soldiers made a "shield-like defence" against the enemy of "ash-trees and other kinds of wood." I could not ask for a closer parallel than this. These examples all belong to the twelfth or thirteenth century.

2. Now let us test the Quarterly Reviewer's knowledge of Old French by another instance. In his last year's article he actually equates the O.E. "mid scildum" and "bordum" with the O.F. "d'escuz e d'ais" (!) This is an equation as ludicrous as that of the Eton schoolboy's, who translated "London School-board" by "Planche de l'école de Londres"; as ludicrous as it would be to render the word "weed" in "Come into the smoking-room, John, and have a weed," by the Latin lotium or the German unkraut.

3. A similar error occurs in the current number of the Quarterly Review, where the Reviewer renders "il ne doterent pel ne fosse" by "They dreaded neither stake (i.e. stick) nor fosse."†

* The evidence is set forth in full in the Contemporary Review for March, pp. 348-51. I need hardly say that the Reviewer has found it convenient to slide over this whole section of my article: in other words, he cannot now find a word to say in defence of the translation which, according to him (not according to Mr. Freeman), was "obviously" the true one, so obvious indeed that no other was even plausible or possible.

† The Quarterly Reviewer actually quotes me as his authority for rendering pel in this passage as a "stake" (i.e., a pointed stick used as a weapon). As a matter of fact, I plainly give this line (l. 8499) as one of my four instances of Wace's palisade, apart from the crucial passage. See lines 3-5 of my Section IV.—lines which the Reviewer ought to have read before trying to make his readers believe, on the strength of my very brief headline (which, of course, can only roughly represent the meaning of the long paragraph it condenses), that one of my four "palisade" or "list" passages was a passage in which neither word occurs—a passage, moreover, to which I give no reference. But, though I gave no reference,

"Pel" or "pels"—when used of military operations in connexion with "fosse" or "mur," or "bretechoe" or "hericun," has a definite meaning—"palisade." Added to this, the Reviewer's translation involves the supposition that Wace, wishing to extol the valour of his fellow Normans to the very highest, could find no better climax to his praise than to tell them that, sheathed in complete armour and mounted on their powerful war-horses, as they were, they did not fear a few sticks in the hands of an unarmed peasantry! This blunder is as bad as it would be to translate our English "Hue and Cry" by the French "Complexion et plainte"; or, better still, our English "Christmas-box" by "Coup de Noel."

There is, perhaps, a worse mistake than any of these in the current paper. But, on this occasion, the Quarterly Reviewer has managed to render his meaning dubious, and accordingly can ride off without detection. I could go on for two or three hours exposing the Quarterly Reviewer's other blunders and inconsistencies, were it worth my while. But I must draw to a close with one more remark. Hardly had his new article appeared, with its brand-new theory of the battle of Hastings (quite different, as everyone admits it to be, from his theory of last year), when I received a letter from one of the most eminent of living English historians. This letter contained an absolute and full confutation of the new theory, showing how the Quarterly Reviewer's new plan of battle could not be made to square even with the authorities he himself uses.

I may add, that if in my Contemporary article there was one point more than another on which the Quarterly Reviewer insisted, it was that he did not "admit" the "fosse." I had headed one of my sections, "How the Quarterly Reviewer's admission of a fosse involves a palisade." Among all his polite and varied charges of falsehood and misrepresentation, none was insisted on with greater vehemence than the falsity of this heading.* It seems, after all, that I was right, and knew the Quarterly Reviewer's mind better than he knew it himself; for his new theory of the battle, which he boasts of as being entirely different from Mr. Freeman's, depends upon this very fosse which, three months ago, he would not on any account "admit." So much for the genuineness of his indignation.

T. A. ARCHER.

I reiterate every word of the sentence the Reviewer refers to. It is a perfectly legitimate deduction from four distinct passages. If the Quarterly Reviewer knew his Wace—and, indeed, all his authorities for Hastings—better, he would write with less heat and less presumption.

* Here are the Reviewer's own words:

"I appeal to those who may think I have written too strongly, whether it is not perfectly intolerable to be lectured thus on the strength of an admission I never made, &c." (Athenaeum, p. 444.)

"I gave an instance of his misrepresentation in the case of the fosse," &c., p. 505. "Our article did not admit the existence of the fosse," Q.R., July, 1893, p. 87.

Of course, the facts are simple. The Reviewer practically accepted Wace's fosse in July 1892, by quoting it, without a word to show that he disbelieved in it, for the purpose of scoring against Mr. Freeman. He, more or less expressly, rejected it in April and May 1893, for the purpose of scoring off me; he repeats this rejection in his second article (July 1893), for the purpose of scoring off me once more; and, finally, "assumes" the fosse on p. 78-9, for the purpose of scoring off Mr. Freeman. Tot necessitates, tot sententiae, if I may be pardoned the bad Latin. Among all this chopping and changing and "assuming" what is the Quarterly Reviewer's real opinion: Fosse or no fosse? Fosse + malfosse, or fosse - malfosse?

"A STUDY OF TENNYSON'S POEMS."

Brighton: August, 1893.

I crave your permission, though this letter is late in reaching you, to take exception to some parts of the review of my Study of Tennyson's Works in the ACADEMY of August 5.

Of your reviewer's general estimate of my book I have no reason to complain. On the adverse side of his criticism, however, he (quite unintentionally, I believe) misrepresents me, and in one direction, gravely, as I think.

He holds me to be narrow, prejudiced in my judgments, where art touches the ethical and the spiritual; and he gives quotations and references in support of his opinion. The abstract opinion it would be out of place for me to combat; but in the quotations and references I have a property, and I have a right to protest if they are unfairly made. It is on this ground that I claim of you the opportunity to put matters straight.

The first quotation which dominates your reviewer's article, and which he says is "an exact or final indication of the spirit" of my criticism, and "embodies within the narrowest bounds an expression" of my limitations, is

"I think Shakspeare deserved—what in a case of another sort, the Athenians inflicted—a fine for writing Othello."

But now if the book be turned to (p. 258), and if, indeed, the reference to the Athenians be considered, it will be seen that the judgment expressed here is not ethical, but artistic. What I wished to say was that the artist has no right to torture, and what I assume about Othello is that the latter part of it is a long drawn agony, too terrible—the more powerful the more terrible—for art. The sight of a gem of womanhood outraged in spirit, and done to death by an unspeakable villain and an unspeakable fool or madman or savage, is too hideous to allow the survival of any pleasure in the mere art; and art, in some sense, should please. I may be right or wrong in this opinion; but it is not a case of ethical prudishness, anyhow.

The next quotation is:

"'Lucretius' is a pathological study, and seems to me more fit for an essay in the Lancet than for a poem."

The reason should have been given. The sentences that follow the quotation are:

"A psychological study, in the hands of such a writer as Tennyson, might make a fine poem; and even morbid psychology would not lie beyond the range of possible successful treatment. But the study of the action of a brain poison upon body and mind is pure pathology, and pathology is outside the region of poetry."

The question is therefore, again, not one of ethical breadth or narrowness, of conventionalism or freedom, but of art.

Next comes:

"The story of 'The Promise of May' is of course shocking."

Let your reviewer remember that Eva was fifteen, and then say if the story is not shocking. But I do not need the admission; the sentences that follow dismiss the charge of prudishness. They run:

"The story of 'The Promise of May' is of course shocking, nor does the putting mitigate the pain. The dramatic form, the prose parts, the rusticity, all literalise the dreadful tale. If such a story had to be told, the idyll was again the form. Tennyson could have melted the heart into compassionate and indignant sorrow by such an idyll."

And I may add that, in the next paragraph, I defend the play against attacks commonly made upon it.

Quotation 4.

"The situation [of the prince's presence in Ida's college] is a delicate one, and makes one a little anxious in the reading."

I put "of course" after "situation"; why did my critic weaken my appeal to the judgment of the reader by leaving it out? It was not the prince's presence, but the presence of three young men disguised as women that made the situation, which the poet himself afterwards found, a delicate one. And surely my critic might have dispelled my bogie, as he had raised it, by completing the paragraph. "On the whole, however, it is well managed, and one is free to enjoy the humour and the playful satire of the scene and its incidents."

Quotation 5.

"I had misgivings whether the infliction of so repulsive a picture [as that of Vivien] were not wanton and therefore immodest."

Compare with this the whole passage:

"When the first four Idylls were published, I, for one, in faith accepted the portraiture of Vivien as necessary to the aim—some just aim—of the poet; in faith, and partly in judgment, for I thought that the poet's intention, over and above that of reproducing some portions of the Arthurian Romance, was to set forth four kinds of women. Later, I had misgivings whether the infliction of so repulsive a picture were not wanton, and therefore immodest. But as the series of Idylls now stands, exhibiting the moral movement running through it, I am reconciled again to the main intention, at least; whether to all the details, I cannot, after so many pros and cons, judge."

Quotation 6.

"In and after the 'Enoch Arden' volume there are a good many pronounced examples of the introduction of preternaturalism. . . . I think such things spiritually unclean, morally corrupt."

The part of this quotation before the ellipsis is taken from the middle of page 287; the part after, from the bottom of page 288. Between the two, hypnotism, mediumship, spiritualism, are spoken of, and upon these the censure after the ellipsis is pronounced. It is true that I have deprecated some features of certain of the poems, and have spoken strongly about "The Ring" as tending to countenance the things censured. But the words in question were used about those things, and not about the poems or anything contained in them.

Quotation (or, in this case, reference) 7.

"He hides his eyes before Cleopatra's nakedness."

The actual passage is "In the same way one objects to the rapture expended, in 'A Dream of Fair Women' upon the voice of the most repulsive woman in history."

Reference 8.

"He marvels that Lancelot should yearn for Guinevere's lips."

Actual passage:

"A man had given all other bliss
And all his worldly worth for this,
To waste his whole heart in one kiss
Upon her perfect lips."

Yet the lips were the lips of Guinevere—a woman no larger souled than that. What a fool the man would have been," &c.

Now I may still be narrow, prejudiced in my ethical judgments, and your reviewer might be able to prove it. But I do not think that these quotations and references, especially as re-edited, prove it. However, these points would probably not have prevailed to make me trouble you with this communication, were it not for the passage following:

"For to say that because Tennyson is at times direct, he is therefore wanton; to maintain that to be dramatically passionate is to be wittingly lewd; that to be influenced by mysticism is to approve the spiritualistic science—to confound, in a word, the field of art with that of practical morals, is surely to lose one's hold on criticism in its first and elementary stage."

But I never did say that Tennyson was wanton, or, I trust, anything half so absurd. I think I am safe to say that the only place throughout the Study in which the word is used is in the passage about Vivien, already quoted. There it means "unnecessary"; and whatever it means it expresses, as the paragraph tells, only one of those second thoughts which are not best. What I say about Tennyson in such matters is expressed in the words that close the Idylls chapter:

" . . . I part with it in the abiding sense that these Idylls make up a poem which, traversing so largely regions of darkness and sin, is a holy poem, awakening the spirit to a higher vision of good, and approving him who chose and transfigured the tale as the poet of the ideal of womanhood and of the passion of purity."

Nor did I ever "maintain that to be dramatically passionate is to be wittingly lewd." I never maintained it as an abstract proposition: the disturbing sentence about Othello did not, as I have shown, look even in that direction; and the wildest imagination will hardly conceive that I used such words in reference to him towards whom my critic says that he need scarcely add that I am "always reverent and generally enthusiastic." The proposition may belong to Alice in Wonderland, but it is no property of mine.

Nor have I ever said that to be influenced by mysticism is to approve the spiritualistic science, and I even think that the statement would be meaningless. "To be influenced by" cannot be the same as to approve, even though spiritualism and mysticism were more alike than they are. Nor have Tennyson's personal experiences or personal opinions been my theme: my subject has been the poems.

I pass from these illustrations, which have no relation to me, to the doctrine which they are used to illustrate. This is that the field of art and the field of practical morals are distinct. If to deny this is to be narrow, then I am absolutely narrow. I hold it to be the doctrine of an apostasy. I repeat against it such sayings as "Art is the handmaid of Religion"; "Art is worship"; "all great Art is moral"; or, more broadly spiritual, Art is indeed truth, as I not only acknowledge, but have emphasised, and so all that is in its possible theme. But the artist is not a mere universal photographer. It is his place to select, and his canon of selection is beauty—beauty explicitly set forth, or implicitly suggested, by, it may be, the exhibition of what is not beautiful. Beauty: for art is worship. The highest subject of art is man, and here human beauty is the art motive. But man is spiritual, and so spiritual beauty, the moral, is the art motive. All true art has beauty for its subject; all highest art has moral beauty for its subject. The thing set before the eye may be ugly, physically or morally ugly; the thing set before the mind in true art is beauty, physical or moral. Art is the handmaid of science and ethics: the subjects are the same, the methods of teaching, only, differ. These teach the form of divine order in nature and man; it exhibits the loveliness of that order, by its presence or its felt absence. What else do the Idylls of the King mean: what else does Macbeth mean? The artist (given the measure of his genius) attains his best according to his moral quality and condition. All highest art subjects are essentially moral. And shall we doubt that such art moves us towards the good? Is it not true, that which I have said of the story of the Idylls—"it is a story of conflict between good and evil, of tragedy and failure. But by it the pure are purified, the holy are made to hunger and thirst after righteousness." The sphere of the highest art is the same as that of ethics; the artist who doubts it has fallen from his standing. And if any one will maintain the controversy, let him not think that he has Tennyson on his side. I know of no poet who, preacher not at all, artist entirely, yet regards himself as Tennyson does as always ministering at the altar of the good.

"Well, then," I can imagine my critic to say, "do not be squeamish, give your artist freedom in the fulfilment of his work." I answer that my delight in the Idylls, and my critic's warm estimate of my study of them, prove (the subject matter of the Idylls being what it is) that I am not, and that he does not think me squeamish. He says: "We are learning that the naked may be unashamed, so long as it is pure in heart." I answer: as naked as you please, in life or in art, so long as there is a spiritual reason. No one thinks that Godiva was immodest. But her pity was her reason. The highest toned women you have known (and the great poet is as much woman in heart as man) would say anything that was necessary. Let there be no necessity, and modesty clothes itself. The art which paints the human form without a spiritual motive is not pure. It may not be impure; it may only be ignorant. The artist, so painting, at best paints like a moral baby, or a savage, or an artistic animal. The baby and the savage are not pure, they are only ignorant. Purity is the state of mind which regards the human creature as spiritual. This is the glory of true human love, as between man and woman, the love of the embodying form growing out of the spiritual darkness. This purity and this love are what would make marriage that mystic blessedness of which some have dreamed. And all this Tennyson understood. He asks no license for naked words without a spiritual reason. Writing about a touch of his boyish ignorance, I said: "The human body should be thought of as a sacrament—the outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual person. To praise its beauty, therefore, in terms of the merely physical is, to say the least of it, below the mark." There is no need for such a comment upon any of his poems after the earliest. His gracious women are, so to say, neither naked nor draped: they are transparent; you see their souls, and you, in effect, see nothing but their souls.

I hope Mr. Waugh will not be vexed with me. I am more than half grateful to him, and I write with compunction. I could easily have forgotten his frolicsomeness with my text and meanings for the sake of the general generosity of his attitude; but the former fell in the region of my deepest convictions, and of the parts of my book upon which I was most sensitive.

SCIENCE.

"THE BABYLONIAN EXPEDITION OF THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA." Series A: Babylonian Texts. Edited by H. V. Hilprecht. Vol. I. (Philadelphia: Part-ridge.)

THOUGH last in the field of Assyriological research, America has proved that she does not intend to be outdone by the nations of Europe. The American expedition to Babylon, under the command of Dr. Peters, was equipped with great care, and was rewarded accordingly. Its excavations at Niffer (or Nuffar), the site of the old Chaldean city of Nippur, are among the most important that have ever been made on Babylonian soil. Numberless inscriptions and clay books have been found there, which form an almost continuous historical series, extending from the grey dawn of Babylonian civilisation to the age of the Persian kings. The publication of the texts has been entrusted to Prof. Hilprecht, who was himself attached to the expedition; and the first volume, which has just appeared, shows that it could not have been placed in more competent hands.

How much there is to do may be gathered from the fact that, besides numerous inscribed objects in stone, about 8000 clay tablets have already found their way to the University of Pennsylvania. The volume just issued contains the inscriptions of the Babylonian kings, which are engraved on bricks, beads, vases, and the like. The series begins with the contemporaneous inscriptions of Sargon of Accad and his son, Naram-Sin, who flourished as far back as 3800 B.C., and founded the first Semitic empire of which we know. To these rulers of a remote past the American explorers have added a third, Urumus or Alusarsid, who claims to have conquered Elam. They have also brought to light the name of Sargon's father, Itti-Bel.

A careful study of so large a collection of dated texts and a minutely accurate reproduction of all their graphic peculiarities have enabled Prof. Hilprecht to create the science of Babylonian palaeography. It has at last become possible to fix the date of a Babylonian inscription by the forms of the characters and the nature of the handwriting. Nor has Prof. Hilprecht kept to himself the knowledge he has acquired. Instead of reproducing the texts in the conventional manner hitherto fashionable in Assyriology, he has given them just as they are in the originals. His copies accordingly have all the palaeographical value and exactitude of the original documents, and every Assyrian scholar will have the opportunity of becoming as good a palaeographer as Prof. Hilprecht himself.

In an excellent and business-like Introduction, Prof. Hilprecht has described the net results of his researches so far as they bear upon early Babylonian history. The discoveries made by the American expedition are especially fruitful in regard to the Kassite dynasty which ruled over Babylonia for 576 years and 9 months. New royal names have been added to the list of those we already possessed, and the reading of several of them has been corrected. The date, however, proposed by Prof. Hilprecht for the close of the dynasty is one which I cannot accept.

It rests upon certain conjectures and assumptions as to the dynasty which succeeded that of the Kassites. Against it there are three insuperable objections. Burna-buryas, the 19th Kassite king, was, as the Tel el-Amarna correspondence informs us, a contemporary of the Egyptian Pharaoh Amenophis IV., and consequently he must have reigned about B.C. 1400, and not nearly seventy years later, as Prof. Hilprecht's scheme would require. Secondly, we now know from the fragment of the Babylonian Chronicle translated by Mr. Pinches in the fifth volume of the New Series of Records of the Past that Tiglath-Uras of Assyria captured Babylon seven years before the accession of Rimmon-suma-utsur, the 32nd Kassite king; and as this event is stated by Sennacherib to have happened just 600 years before his own destruction of Babylon, it must have taken place in B.C. 1291, and not in B.C. 1208, where Prof. Hilprecht's chronology fixes it. Lastly, Bérôssos, as quoted by Alexander Polyhistor, made the short-lived "Assyrian" rule in Babylonia come to an end in B.C. 1273, only ten years later than the period to which Sennacherib's date would assign it. We must, therefore, I believe, adhere to the chronological scheme I have given in the Introduction to the fifth volume of the New Series of Records of the Past, and make the Kassite dynasty extend from B.C. 1806 to 1229. These dates satisfy all the three synchronisms I have mentioned above.

There is only one other point in which I can exercise the duties of a reviewer by differing from Prof. Hilprecht. It relates to the reading of the name of the old king, which is written Uru-mu-us, or Uru-wu-us. He thinks it should be transcribed by the corresponding Semitic Alu-usarsid. But an echo of the name seems to have been preserved in classical literature. Pliny (N. H. xxx. 51) states that the "Assyrian King," Horus, invented a cure for drunkenness; and in Horus we should have the representative of the Babylonian Uru-wus.

Little by little the fabric of ancient Babylonian history is thus being reconstructed. Dynasties of forgotten kings are once more emerging into the light of day, and we are beginning to read their correspondence and the record of their buildings and wars. The volume edited by Prof. Hilprecht has added many fresh stones to the rising edifice.

A. H. SAYCE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"LIFE WITH TRANS-SIBERIAN SAVAGES."

In a notice of a book entitled Life with Trans-Siberian Savages, which appeared in the ACADEMY of August 12, the reviewer has taken seriously, as a veracious narrative of travel in unknown regions, a book which is obviously a romance of adventure of the Rider Haggard school, crowded with incidents quite incredible.

In the latitude of Central France we have not only thousands of miles of snow, but an arctic winter of nine months' duration without a single remission, and 46 degrees of frost for the greater part of the time (pp. 101-2); while several hundred miles north of the limit of typhoons, the author's ship is sunk by a typhoon, and the naked survivors are tost "like chips" on to a half-submerged ledge of rocks, where, "after further dangers and escapes almost equally marvellous," and receiving such injuries, "through being dashed on and off the rocks" as to be unable to walk, they construct (apparently without materials) a raft on which, without clothes, food, or fresh water, they escape, and are most fortunately received "in a capital native hotel" (pp. 154-5). The zoology is as marvellous as the meteorology. The naked savages put to sea in a birch-bark canoe covered with bearskins, and with a single cast of the net in a suitable bay capture over two thousand salmon trout, weighing from four to ten pounds apiece, and successfully haul all these tons of fish to land, though the net is neither wide nor strong. More wonderful are the dogs, "stupid semi-savage creatures," still "half-wild," many having been "captured in the forest," who, at the word of command, swim out to sea in two columns, then wheel and swim back in line towards the shore, driving the salmon trout before them, which they seize and bring to their masters (pp. 51-2).

The savages, who wear fish-skins in cold weather, never wash, and style themselves "Those-who-smell-of-their-ancestors," and yet the deer approach them within forty feet without getting their wind. The savages then shoot them, the poisoned arrowheads usually piercing either the heart or the pericardium (p. 77).

The author, living alone with these savages, and without knowing a word of their language, acquired a profound knowledge of their customs and their religious beliefs, and is made Head Wizard and honorary chief of the tribe, the only drawback being that he has to reduce to ashes his camera, lens and all, and the results of his snap-shots, in order to allay their suspicions. This excuse for the absence of photographs is hardly needful, as it could have been readily explained by his being cast naked on the reef.

If this book is to be accepted as a storehouse of ethnological facts, Mr. "Douglas Howard, M.A." (if there is such a person), should present himself before the Anthropological section at the approaching meeting of the British Association, and be prepared to answer inquiries as to his unique experiences. He should also exhibit "the portrait of the old chief," which, having inadvertently escaped the bonfire and the wreck, is "now in his possession."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE two most important articles in the August number of the Indian Antiquary (Kegan Paul & Co.) are both contributed by Mr. G. A. Grierson. In one, he gives an account of the minor works of Tulsi Das, the popular poet of Hindustan, summarising all the works mentioned, and translating some of them in full. The other is a review of Dr. Liebh's treatise on Panini, which is substantially a fresh attempt to determine his place in Sanskrit literature, by the help of materials made accessible since the well-known essay of Goldstücker. As to the date of Panini, the author's conclusion is that, in all probability, he came after Gautama Buddha, but before the Christian era, and that he was nearer the earlier than the later limit: that is to say, circa 300 B.C. It will be remembered that Goldstücker's suggested date was not later than 700 B.C.; while Dr. Pischel has put it eleven centuries later. Dr. Liebh next proceeds to examine the actual grammar exhibited by four stages of Sanskrit literature, and draws the following conclusions: (1) that Panini is nearest in time to the Grihyasutras; (2) that both the Aitareya Brahmana and the Brihadaranyaka Upanishad certainly belong to a time earlier than his; (3) that the Bhagavadgita certainly belongs to a time later than his. He then deals with Panini's relation to Sanskrit as the living speech of India:

"His opinion is that Panini taught the language spoken in India at his own time: that the Sanskrit he taught was, in syntax, practically identical with that of the Brahmanas and the Sutras; and that, in grammar, it only differed from the Brahmanas by the absence of a few ancient forms, most of which were specially noted by him as Vedic peculiarities, and from the Sutras by the omission to notice certain loosely-used forms, such as exist in every language beside the stricter ones enjoined by grammar."

In this connexion, Mr. Grierson raises an interesting question: whether the Sanskrit of Panini was in his time the actual vernacular of North-western India, or was not rather a scholastic language confined to the learned, in very much the same position as Latin during the middle ages.

In the last number of the Babylonian and Oriental Record (David Nutt), Prof. Terrien de Lacouperie brings forward some more evidences of early communication between China and Western Asia. The particular subjects dealt with are the introduction of the quince from Media circa 660 B.C. by merchants trading between the Persian Gulf and the province of Shantung; the importation of certain precious stones (called ye-kwang in Chinese, probably derived from the Arabic yakut), which are identified with rubies brought by traders from Oman; and the representation of Chaldaean and Egyptian trees—such as the calendar tree and the date-palm—upon Chinese sculptured monuments which can be proved to have been erected in 147 A.D.

ART BOOKS.

PART 2 of Volume xii. of the Transactions of the Cumberland and Westmoreland Antiquarian and Archaeological Society (Kendal: Wilson) contains several papers of general interest. We have the detailed report of the examination of the Roman fort on Hardknott, which was conducted during the summer and autumn of last year, under skilled supervision. Hardknott Castle, standing 800 feet above the sea, is a familiar object to all who have visited the Lake district; but the descriptions hitherto recorded of it, from Camden downwards, have been very inadequate, and even erroneous. It is here that an inscription was found, now unfortunately lost, containing the name of Agricola, who is probably to be identified with Calpurnius Agricola, legate between 163 and 169 A.D. The walls, corner-towers, barracks, gateways, &c., have now been carefully excavated, and the entire area has been surveyed. Apart from an accurate determination of the character of the building, it must be admitted that the results of the work are disappointing. No inscriptions whatever were found, very few coins, and only unimportant fragments of pottery, iron objects, &c. All of these are here recorded in detail, and some of them are illustrated. The most curious discovery was made outside the fort, about 200 feet down the slope. This was the ruins of a small circular structure, only fifteen feet in diameter, which had once been plastered red inside. It is conjectured to have been a shrine. Not far off was a three-roomed house, with hypocausts, which is conjectured to have been a wayside tavern. The paper is accompanied by several elaborate plans. To the same part the president of the society, Mr. Chancellor Ferguson, contributes two articles on Roman remains at Carlisle. In the course of excavations on the site of Tullie House, for the purpose of building a public library and museum, there was found, eleven feet and more below the service, a massive timber platform, formed of oak posts and planks, fastened together by immense iron nails. This platform is about 40 feet in breadth, and was ascertained to extend for at least 220 feet. Chancellor Ferguson pronounces it to be of undoubted Roman date, and argues that it was probably constructed for the support of ballistae and similar engines of war. In the introduction to this paper he gives a very clear summary of his views about the site and history of the Roman town of Luguwallium, illustrated with several plans; and, in an appendix, a catalogue of all the potters' marks that have been found on Roman pottery in Carlisle. Another paper of his deals with the Roman cemeteries of Carlisle, and the remains discovered in them at different times. This is illustrated with a photograph of the inscription, containing the puzzling phrase "revocavit animam," which was discussed by Mr. F. Haverfield and Mr. Robinson Ellis in the ACADEMY last December.

THE last part of Archaeologia Aeliana (Andrew Reid) mainly consists of historical articles—such as "The Battle of Flodden," by Dr. T. Hodgkin; and "The Ancient Farms of Northumberland," by Mr. F. W. Dendy. We may, however, mention here that Mr. F. Haverfield describes a Roman altar, found last year at Wallsend. The inscription shows that it was dedicated to Jupiter by the Fourth Cohort of Lingones, who are independently known to have been stationed at Segedunum, or Wallsend, the most easterly fort along Hadrian's Wall. After the name of the cohort come the words: "cui attendit Julius Honoratus," which Mr. Haverfield interprets to mean that J. H. (a centurion) had been appointed to "look after" or command the cohort. He quotes several other instances of centurions commanding auxiliary troops in Britain.

MR. GEORGE NEILSON has reprinted from the Transactions of the Glasgow Archaeological Society a paper on "Peel: its Meaning and Derivation." Like everything that Mr. Neilson writes, it is full of learning and ingenuity. The peel of which he treats is the small stone tower so familiar on the English and Scottish border. But his aim is to prove that the original peel was neither a tower nor built of stone. Dealing first with the historical evidence, he examines the accounts of the Scottish wars of Edward I., in which the earliest mention of the word is to be found. He shows, conclusively, that the peels built by Edward I. at Lochmaben, Dumfries, Linlithgow, &c., circa 1300, were mainly constructed of wood, and that they were of the nature of a palisaded rampart, extending the accommodation of the castle within. In the time of Edward III., Stirling Castle was strengthened by a peel, which seems to have consisted of wattle and daub: that is to say, of a timber framework, filled up with clay, and interlaced with hurdles. So far we have nothing to do with the border peels, which are first heard of in the sixteenth century. A Scotch Act of 1535, after describing stone "barnkins," goes on to mention peels as being inferior structures, erected for the same purpose of protecting goods and gear. Bishop Lesley, also writing in the fifteenth century, describes peels as "pyramidal towers, made of earth only." From this evidence Mr. Neilson infers that the original border peel must have been a sort of block-house, constructed of wood and faced with earth. He hardly attempts to explain why the name has universally lost this application, and been transferred to stone towers. Consistently with its primitive meaning of a palisade, he finds its etymology in the Latin palus. We confess that he has not made the puzzle any clearer to us.

MR. J. PARK HARRISON has published (Henry Frowde), as a supplement to Archaeologia Oxoniensis, an illustrated pamphlet on "English Architecture before the Conquest," in which he maintains (1) that many relics of Anglo-Saxon architecture still exist unrecognised, and (2) that Anglo-Saxon architecture was itself a survival from Roman times. The evidence adduced comes from various quarters. The strongest, perhaps, is that derived from the illuminated Anglo-Saxon MSS. of the tenth and the beginning of the eleventh century, which show designs and patterns that are repeated on contemporary buildings. Much less strong is that based upon the traces of tool-markings, it being argued that the Saxons used cross-axing, while the Norman tooling was in diagonal lines. Another line of evidence is that of comparing doubtful buildings with others admitted to be earlier than the Conquest. For example, the tower of St. Michael's church at Oxford is here compared with that of St. Benet's at Cambridge. It is also argued, from historical data, that the two towers at Lincoln (St. Peter-at-Gowts and St. Mary-le-Wigford) are pre-Norman in age as well as in style. In the appendix are given a list of architectural details in Anglo-Saxon MSS., together with plates showing reproductions of many of these details.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. ARTHUR TOMSON will have an exhibition in the autumn, at the Dutch Gallery, Brook-street, of a collection of his pictures of cats, some of which have already been seen at the New English Art Club and elsewhere.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD announces, for serial publication, Wild Flowers in Art and Nature, consisting of coloured plates after drawings by Mr. H. G. Moon, with botanical descriptions by Mr. F. W. Burbidge, and notes for the benefit of art-students by Mr. J. C. L. Sparkes, of South Kensington. There will be altogether six monthly parts, each containing three or four plates; and it is expressly stated that the colour-printing has been executed in England.

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. have nearly ready a book on the coins of the Hindu States of Rajputana, by Surgeon W. W. Webb, illustrated with twelve plates and a map showing the mint towns.

It has been decided to issue European Pictures of the Year in three parts, of which the first will be ready on September 25, and the other two at intervals of a fortnight. There will be an introduction by Mr. M. H. Spielmann, consisting of critical and explanatory notes.

THE twenty-third autumn exhibition of pictures will be opened next week at Liverpool, in the Walker Galleries of the corporation.

M. DE MORGAN, the energetic director of the Ghizeh Museum, has been working this summer at Sakkara, and has discovered the largest mastaba tomb yet known. He reports having already cleared sixteen chambers and passages, covered with scenes, some sculptured, others painted. This will be opened to the public next winter.

THE STAGE.

Henry Irving: a Record of Twenty Years at the Lyceum. By Percy Fitzgerald. (Chapman & Hall.)

MR. LECKY, speaking at the last dinner of the Society of Authors, dwelt for a moment upon what he called a kind of vivisection as yet untouched by law, the production of biographies of more or less eminent men while they are still living. Of this vivisection, he might have added, Mr. Irving has had an almost unique personal experience. Besides the mass of criticism evoked from time to time by his work at the Lyceum, no fewer than three records of his career, from the days of his youth inclusive, have appeared within the last ten years. The first was Mr. Austin Brereton's Henry Irving, a Biographical Sketch, with full-page portraits in character from drawings by Edwin Long, Whistler, Fred. Barnard, and other masters of the pencil. Next came Henry Irving in England and America, 1838-84, by a certain mysterious "Frederic Daly," now known to have been Mr. L. F. Austin. Like its predecessor, it was written in an appreciative and generous spirit, but did not run into excessive or indiscriminating laudation. This book, in its turn, has been followed by the present biography, which is brought up to the representation of "Becket." It is needless to say that Mr. Fitzgerald has good claims to be heard on the subject of Mr. Irving's achievements. He is a keen dramatic critic, has a wide knowledge of the theatrical history, and is not disposed to allow personal prepossessions, however strong they may be, to override his better judgment. Nor is his interest in Mr. Irving a matter of yesterday. During the last twenty years or more, I understand, he has formed a well-nigh exhaustive collection of things relating to the actor—critiques, magazine articles, lampoons, play-bills, portraits, and, above all, the innumerable caricatures of him that have appeared since he rose to marked distinction and fame.

Mr. Fitzgerald deals rather briefly with the story of Mr. Irving's early life. Of the boyish aspirant to theatrical honours we get a glimpse when, after leaving the school in George Yard, Lombard Street, he joined an elocution class. A fellow-pupil writes:

"One evening a youth presented himself as a new member. He was rather tall for his age, dressed in a black suit, with what is called a round jacket, and a deep white linen collar turned over it. His face was very handsome, with a mass of black hair, and eyes bright and flashing with intelligence. He was called upon for his first recitation, and fairly electrified the audience with an unusual display of elocutionary and dramatic intensity."

Presently he became an actor by profession, starting in smoky Sunderland as Gaston d'Orléans in "Richelieu." Curiously enough, the theatre was called the Lyceum, and the first words he had to utter were: "Here's to our enterprise!" For the next nine years, if we put aside two brief and unimportant appearances in London, his life was that of a member of stock companies, chiefly at Edinburgh and Manchester. His path was strewn with more thorns than roses; but this did not prevent him from pushing on with increasing hope, resolution, and confidence in his future. He burnt a good deal of midnight oil, dressed his characters with scrupulous care, and profited by the opportunities thrown in his way by acting with such players as Helen Faucit, Dillon, Fanny Stirling, Mathews, Charlotte Cushman, Webster, Robson, and Toole. He was ready to give his best attention to anything, from tragedy down to farce and even pantomime. One illustration of his conscientiousness is to be found in a letter from his Edinburgh manager, Mr. Robert Wyndham, who, like many of his friends in those uphill days, is often to be found in the stalls of the Lyceum on his first nights now:

"Both Mrs. Wyndham and myself took a most lively interest in his promotion, for he was always perfect, and any character, however small, he might have been called upon to represent was in itself a study; and I believe he would have sacrificed a week's salary—a small affair, by the way—to look exactly like the character he was about to portray."

It appears that during his probation Mr. Irving undertook no fewer than three hundred and fifty parts. Eventually, in 1866, he attracted the notice of Dion Boucicault, who procured for him an engagement in London. Here he soon won repute in comedy and melodrama, particularly as the representative of cool, audacious, and polished scoundrelism; and his Digby Grant in "The Two Roses" was alone enough to make the success of that piece. "If this young man does not one day come out as a great actor," said Charles Dickens, whose right to an opinion in such a matter is not likely to be disputed, "I know nothing of art."

The prediction was fulfilled a little sooner than the novelist might have expected. The "light-character eccentric comedian," as Mr. Irving was once spoken of in print, had a vague idea that his strength really lay in the higher drama, at that time out of fashion. Anxious to test the feeling of an audience on this point, he recited the "Dream of Eugene Aram" at a benefit performance, and the effect he produced was beyond even his own hopes. Presently, by a lucky chance, he came into possession of "The Bells," an adaptation by Leopold Lewis of "Le Juif Polonais." It had been rejected by several managers, all believing that the dream scene was above the reach of any English actor then known. Eager to have a chance of playing it, he accepted an engagement at the Lyceum, under the American "Colonel" Bateman, who had taken the theatre in the interests of his second daughter. The enterprise proved anything but successful, and the manager announced his intention to abandon it. Mr. Irving then asked that "The Bells" might have a hearing. Bateman saw nothing in the play, but eventually agreed to produce it on the condition that the actor bore a share of the trifling expense it entailed. Produced it was in the autumn of 1871, with what result I need hardly say. The general verdict was that in the representative of the conscience-stricken burgomaster there had arisen a new master-spirit, a worthy successor to the great actors of old. The long-unfortunate Lyceum became crowded every night; and the manager, not a little astonished to find that he had such an artist by his side, promptly prepared to follow up the advantage which both of them had gained. But for the success of "The Bells," as I happen to know, the theatre would have been closed in bankruptcy two days after the appearance of the piece.

No character had impressed itself so deeply on Mr. Irving's mind as Hamlet, with which he had been familiar since his childhood. He now had the much-coveted chance of playing it in London under favourable conditions; but a little reflection convinced him that it would be better to defer so important a task until his position was more assured. "The Bells," therefore, was followed by "Charles I.," "Eugene Aram," and "Richelieu," in each of which he achieved an instant and decisive success. The first two, it will be remembered, were written for him by W.G. Wills. Of "Charles I." a possibly apocryphal story is related by Mr. Fitzgerald :

"Originally the piece opened with the second act, and the manager was said to have exclaimed: 'Oh, bother politics; give us some domestic business.' This led to the introduction of the tranquil pastoral scene at Hampton Court. The closing scene, as devised by the author, represented the capture of the King on the field of battle. 'Won't do,' said the manager bluntly; 'must wind up with another domestic act.' Sorely perplexed by this requirement, which they felt was correct, both author and actor tried many expedients without success, until one evening, towards the small hours, the manager, who appeared to be dozing in his chair, suddenly called out, 'Look at the last act of "Black-eyed Susan" with its prayer-book, chain and all.' This may be legendary, and I give it for what it is worth."

If the story be true, it was a happy inspiration on the manager's part, as the pathos of the farewell scene became the talk of the town. Bateman's suggestions, in fact, were often of great value; but it may be doubted whether his Barnum-like method of advertising, of which Mr. Fitzgerald gives some examples, did not do the actor more harm than good. No such excitement as that shown by the audience on the first night of Mr. Irving's Richelieu had been seen in a theatre for over half-a-century. Let the great dramatic critic of the Times tell us what happened :

"His defence of Julie de Mortemar when the minions of the King would snatch her from his arms, the weight of sacerdotal authority with which he threatens to launch the curse of Rome, his self-transformation into the semblance of a Hebrew prophet of the olden time, with whom imprecations were deeds, combine together to produce the most astounding effect. Here is tragic acting in the grandest style. . . . The old-fashioned excitement which we associate with the days of Edmund Kean and the 'Wolves' was manifested once more in all its pristine force. Enthusiastic shouts of approbation came from all parts of the house. The pit not only rose, but made its rising conspicuous by the waving of countless hats and handkerchiefs. Not bare approval, but hearty sympathy, was denoted by this extraordinary demonstration; and this sympathy nothing but genius and thorough self-abandonment on the part of the artist could have produced."

Indeed, the only thing wanting to the triumph here won was the presence of Bulwer-Lytton, who had remarked that "any author would be fortunate to obtain Mr. Irving's assistance in some character that was worthy of his powers." The novelist did not live long enough to see how true this was to be in his own case.

Never, perhaps, had the theatrical world been more deeply stirred than it was in the autumn of 1874, when Mr. Irving, feeling that a crisis in his career had come, at length presented himself as Hamlet. By this time a storm of sometimes envenomed criticism had broken over his head; and the question whether he could be deemed a tragedian of the first rank was debated far and wide. It is not too much to say that he passed safely through the ordeal, although the manager had not thought fit to aid him with a mise en scène of particular excellence. His performance was marked by originality of conception, brilliancy of execution, the utmost tenderness and refinement. One of the best descriptions of it was in a letter to the Kölnische Zeitung :

"Silence accompanied his first appearance, silence prevailed through the second act, silence ushered in the third. All was new in this Hamlet—the speech, the dress, the manner. Nothing recalled to mind the effect-snatching expedients of his predecessors. Even the business of the piece lay out of the common track. No wonder the audience were held fast by a spell expressed in silent astonishment. But the astonishment was of the kind that by a psychological law usually precedes admiration. Scarcely had the dialogue with Ophelia in the third act reached its termination when the spell was broken: a hurricane of applause shook the benches; and everybody felt that the tall, evidently nervous actor, who with ruthless nonchalance had thrown overboard the conventional, pathetically puffed-up prince, to make of him an unconstrained gentleman, with a tinge of melancholy upon him—that this actor was the new Hamlet, the Hamlet of the future, the long-desired performer of Shakspeare. . . . According to Goethe, Hamlet fails in consequence of the conflict between his own irresolution and the task which is imposed upon him: a great deed is demanded of a soul that is unequal to it; an oak is in a vase of porcelain. This view—which, whatever Ulrici may say to the contrary, is the soundest—is Irving's."

Nor did the merits of the essay fail to obtain a wide recognition. It was given for two hundred nights in succession—a run without precedent in the history of the poetic drama—and made the earnest-minded young actor the Garrick of his time.

For about three years after this achievement he found himself in a false position. Bateman dying, the management of the theatre was assumed by his widow, a well meaning sort of lady, but of a prosaic cast of mind, old-fashioned in her ideas, and indisposed to spend more money on her productions than she could possibly help. Mr. Irving, influenced by a feeling of friendship, readily agreed to support her, though only to find that he had the burden without the freedom of responsibility. Under the new régime he undertook several important parts—Macbeth, Othello, Philip of Spain, Richard III., Lesurques and Dubosc, Louis XI., and Vanderdecken. Of the first he gave an entirely novel rendering, at least so far as stage tradition was concerned. His conception was that of "a dreamy, shrinking being, overwhelmed with terrors and remorse." His Othello was not successful, chiefly owing to a deficiency of physical power. For the same reason the closing scenes of his Richard had less effect than had been anticipated, but up to the end of the fourth act his performance could hardly have been improved. In Louis XI., by almost general consent, he left even Charles Kean behind. The inevitable separation from Mrs. Bateman came shortly afterwards. Mr. Fitzgerald, so far as I am aware, is the first to tell the story in print. He says :

"Though his suggestions were always readily accepted, this was subject, of course, to the economic limitations aforesaid. It soon became evident that his talents were heavily fettered, and that he had attained a position which, to say the least, was inconsistent with such surroundings. . . . A sense of old obligation—which, however, was really slender enough—had long restrained him; but now, on the advice of friends and for the sake of his own interests, he felt that matters could no longer go on in such a state, and that the time had arrived for making some serious change. It was likely enough that, unless a change was speedily made, the actor's position would be compromised. Where was he to find an opening for those sumptuous tastes and artistic developments for which the public was now ripe, and which he felt that he, and he alone, could supply? This, however, was not the occasion of the separation, which must inevitably have come later. He had merely suggested a change in stage companionship; the attraction of the 'leading lady' with whom he had been so long associated [Miss Isabel Bateman] was not, he thought, sufficient to assist or inspire his own. As this arrangement was declined, he felt compelled to dissolve the old partnership."

Eventually Mrs. Bateman retired in the enjoyment of a not inconsiderable fortune, leaving Mr. Irving in full possession of the theatre.

Then was begun that series of revivals and productions which have given the Lyceum a character of its own, and which, while enabling Mr. Irving to extend his reputation as a player, have shown him to be a stage manager of the highest order. He has consistently sought to combine general efficiency of acting with an accurate, artistic, and brilliant setting. No effect that his talent could suggest or money secure would seem to have been omitted. Now and then he has made mistakes, but none of particular moment. Among the plays he has illustrated are "Hamlet," "Othello," "The Merchant of Venice," "Macbeth," "Romeo and Juliet," "Much Ado About Nothing," "Twelfth Night," "Henry VIII.," "King Lear," "The Cup," "Faust," "Ravenswood," "Becket," and some of those in which he had already appeared. Each was presented with a picturesqueness and taste not previously reached on the stage. Each, however, has owed its chief attraction to Mr. Irving's acting, though not always, of course, in the same degree. His name will long be associated with Hamlet, Macbeth, Benedick, Mephistopheles, Iago, and, perhaps above all, Shylock, who to him is not so much a man personally wronged as the representative of a great but downtrodden race. Romeo he was scarcely well advised to undertake, for the reason that, like Garrick and Edmund Kean, he is unable to depict a purely boyish passion; but only the two players just named could have equalled him in the banishment and death scenes. "Othello" was revived in order that Mr. Edwin Booth, who had had a deplorably unsuccessful season at the Princess's, might return to America with his prestige restored by a memorable engagement in London—a step arguing no little courage, tact, and good-feeling. He and Mr. Irving played the chief parts by turn, the English actor's embodiment of Iago being individualised by what one writer describes as a "brilliant devilry." It was certainly a striking achievement, and ought to be seen again. In the same category we must place his Mephistopheles, although the adaptation prepared for him by Wills was not free from serious defects. Throughout his career as an actor-manager, it should be added, Mr. Irving has had the help of Miss Ellen Terry, whose genius he was among the first to detect, and who has so used the opportunities he has afforded her as to become the representative actress of our day.

There can now be little question that the period under review will be remembered as one of real importance in the history of the English theatre. By 1871, when Mr. Irving began to show of what he was capable, the poetic and romantic drama had sunk to its lowest ebb in London. It seemed to have been permanently supplanted by burlesque, opéra-bouffe, commonplace melodrama, and comedy of the Robertsonian school. Mournful experience had taught the manager of Drury Lane that "Shakspeare spelt ruin and Byron bankruptcy." Moreover, the attitude of the thoughtful public towards the stage in general was that of indifference and contempt, while the status of the player remained far below what it ought to have been. Mr. Irving soon changed all this, especially after he had a free hand at his theatre. In some respects, no doubt, he fell an easy prey to criticism. His voice is unequal to the whirlwind of passion. His well-known mannerisms, which he has not always sought to hold in check, are of a kind to detract from the effect of his performances. But it should be borne in mind that a great actor without distinctive peculiarities has not yet existed, and is not likely to exist. In the case of Mr. Irving, too, they are accompanied by a combination of qualities separately rare—imaginative power, independence of thought, keenness of perception, unremitting study, and a well-nigh exhaustive mastery of the resources of his art. His range is wide enough to include the tenderness of Hamlet and the sardonic humour of Louis XI., the intense pathos of Charles I. and the ruffianism of Dubosc, the gigantic anguish of Lear and the arch wit of Benedick. "His mannerisms," wrote Dion Boucicault, who had seen all that Macready and Charles Kean had done on the stage, "are so very marked that an audience requires a long familiarity with his style before they can appreciate his merits. It is unquestionable that he is the greatest actor as a tragedian that London has seen during the last fifty years." Add to this a recognition of his grasp of comedy so often shown, and we have a comprehensive description of the actor in a few words. Boucicault's opinion was that of the play-going world at large, and Mr. Irving found himself raised head and shoulders above his contemporaries. But his success proved a matter of more than personal interest. It led to a reaction in favour of the higher drama: poetry on the stage again spelt fortune instead of ruin; the theatre reasserted its claims as a centre of intellectual life, as of fashion, and a new and invigorating influence became apparent to all who had eyes to see. Simultaneously the social status of the player went up, even to the extent of being ridiculed by Punch; and men who in different circumstances might have joined one of the learned professions—the Alexanders, the Bensons, the Warings, the Fultons—are now fretting and strutting their hour upon the boards with a due pride in their calling. It is not the least of Mr. Irving's claims to remembrance that he should have been the chief cause of the general advance which the stage has made within the last two decades.

Mr. Fitzgerald's volume would seem to have been written with his usual haste. He is too careless of his style, too prone to abuse the forms "and which," "and who," and so forth. Nor has he been sufficiently alert in the revision of his proofs. In a work by him we do not expect to hear of "Edward" Kean or "Ellen" Faucit. Then his incidental sketches of contemporaries are sometimes misleading. Here is an instance in point:

"Albeit a little tête montée, Frank Marshall, with his excited, bustling ways and eccentric exterior, seems now to be much missed. He was always bon enfant. He had written one very pleasing comedy, 'False Shame,' and also was rated as a high authority on all Shaksperian matters. He published an elaborate Study of Hamlet, and later induced Irving to join him in an ambitious edition of Shakspeare, which has recently been completed. He was also a passionate bibliomaniac, though not a very judicious one, lacking the necessary restraint and judgment. He had somewhat of a troubled course, like so many a London littérateur."

No one who was well acquainted with Marshall—a ripe Shaksperian scholar, unaffectedly modest, full of critical common sense, and to his end placed above want—can accept this as in all respects accurate. Two errors in the matter of dates must be laid to Mr. Fitzgerald's charge. Mr. Irving's first appearance as Othello is put down to 1875, and his production of "Faust" to 1886. In each case the author is exactly a year wrong.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

FROM Messrs. Weekes & Co.:

Thoughts and After-Thoughts, and Such is Fame, by Gerard F. Cobb: two light ballads; in the accompaniments the composer shows his harmonic skill. She is far from the Land, by Rosetta O'Leary. The melody is simple and quaint, but the harmonies of the accompaniment are not always suitable. Classical Compositions for the Organ, by J. Wodehouse. The transcriptions of Chopin's Funeral March, and of Beethoven's March from the Sonata (Op. 26) are good, though it seems a pity to have altered the original keys. It is, however, only fair to add that Beethoven, in scoring his March for orchestra, has written it in B minor. Technical Studies in Double Notes for the Piano-forte, by E. Sauerbrey. A very useful collection including scales in thirds, sixths, fourths, &c.; there are comments in both English and German.

Progressive Studies for the Piano-forte. Edited by Franklin Taylor. (Novello.) This is a very useful collection. Each part contains studies having reference to some particular branch of pianoforte technique, five-finger exercises, broken chords, octaves, &c.; and teachers especially will find this a most convenient arrangement. The greater number of the studies have been selected from standard collections; but there are also others, useful, yet far less known, such as those of Kalkbrenner, Steibelt, &c. All the parts of the series are not yet published, but still, in some, it seems as if the right hand is favoured at the expense of the left. All the studies are carefully fingered, and we are glad to find that in this matter Mr. Taylor is eclectic: for him there is good in old as well as in new methods.

LITERATURE.

The Great War of 189—: a Forecast. By Rear-Admiral P. Colomb and Others. (Heinemann.)

THIS volume, republished from Black and White, is an attempt to predict the course and the issues of the gigantic strife which many believe will convulse the world in a not distant future. The authors, for the most part, are men of some mark, and have written certainly with no mischievous purpose. The book, nevertheless, belongs to the class made notorious by The Battle of Dorking, and Chauvinist publications of the kind; it is a petty firebrand quickening international hatreds. The writers are, as a rule, inspired by an undiscerning aversion to France and Russia, and by a stolid hero-worship of Prussia; and these sentiments, breaking out in a hundred passages, expose them to the charge, often thrown by us in the teeth of Frenchmen, of making bad blood. These prejudices, too, have seriously injured their work; have made it contradict the teaching of history in more than one important respect, and especially have produced strangely perverted views on the omity and the rights of nations. As to the large operations of the war on land, we do not find a single brilliant conception; the descriptions of them are often improbable, and questionable strategy sometimes owes its success to an enemy's scarcely redible blunders. The battle pieces are much better done: they fairly illustrate the working of the three arms alone, or in concert, in the wars of this day, and the changes due to material inventions; but the partisanship they betray is often offensive, and mars the truthfulness and effect of the pictures. The naval operations are more a look of reality, except, we think, in one instance: they explain the prodigious importance of the command of the sea, in anything like a great general war; and Lord Wolseley's twofold descents on Varna and Trebizonde, and the consequences that flowed from them, though military achievements, set forth this truth in the clearest light. The writers are well acquainted with the defects of the organisation of England for war, and very properly dwell upon them; but they have practically nullified their own warnings, for they have made out England to be almost always victorious. For a book that has been revised, there are many errors of the press; and here and there figures, and even sentences, are at odds with each other, and cannot be made to agree. The style of the war correspondent has, of course, been adopted to make the work appear real; but it is not an agreeable style, though some of the descriptions are animated and good, especially those that indicate the hand of Mr. Forbes. What has been wittily called Red Indian rhetoric, and the language of the prize-ring, might, however, have been omitted with much advantage; and we are shocked at the rubbish of barbarous words shot into this well of English by educated men.

General history, and even military history, are by no means the strong point of the authors; their views of war and its lessons are much too contracted. It was unwise to rely on a dictum of Moltke written when he was in his eighty-seventh year: there have been "wars of peoples and nations" long before these days, in contradistinction to "dynastic conflicts." Not to speak of the strife between Carthage and Rome, we need only refer to 1813 and 1814. It is amusing to those who have studied the annals of Prussia from 1740 to 1814, to read how words are put into the mouth of the imperial successor of Frederick the Great, boasting of the "loyalty and fidelity" of the German name: the Devil, no doubt, is apt at quoting Scripture. We never heard, too, before, that "Pitt had created a new world to redress the balance of the old": the phrase was applied by Canning to himself and his policy in 1825, and must be cut out, as a theft, from his speeches. Passing to special subjects, we do not understand what is meant by Moltke's "principle of marching separately and fighting combined": the practice is at least as old as Hannibal's advance on Rome, and is right or wrong as the occasion requires, and it has been repeatedly commented on by Napoleon. It is thoroughly shallow, too, to describe "a Napoleonic battle as a blow to pierce the centre, or to fail": this is attributing a mannerism to the great master akin to the mannerism of Frederick the Great—as a matter of fact Napoleon attacked quite as often on the flank as the centre—and this account misses the essential features and excellences of Napoleon's tactics. The ideas of the authors on international rights would make Grotius and Vattel gasp, and obviously have grown out of mere prejudice. Austria makes a filibustering raid on Belgrade—an action in the highest degree unlikely on the part of a great Conservative power—and this is deemed to be perfectly right; Russia does exactly the same thing at Varna, and Russia is guilty of wanton aggression. England, though she is still avowedly neutral, forces a Russian fleet to go back to Sebastopol and prevents a Russian and French fleet from attacking their enemy, a German fleet; and yet it is thought hard that France and Russia declare war against us. Belgium, however, is the peculiar domain of these curious doctrines of international law. Belgium gives the Germans a free pass through her territory to invade France—a treacherous and deadly hostile act; and yet because France, as she had a perfect right to do, marches into Belgium as a retaliatory blow, we read over and over again in these pages that France has "violated Belgian neutrality"—not violated but outraged by Belgium herself—and is, therefore, a disturber of the peace of Europe. This is the more interesting because Belgium allows England to occupy Antwerp, admittedly a measure against France; and this is a violation of Belgian neutrality in no doubtful sense.

The war on the Continent is confined, for the most part, to two great invasions; and a word must be said on each of these. The Triple Alliance is opposed to Russia and France; and Germany and Russia take the offensive on a front from the Baltic to the Dniester. In slavish imitation of the strategy of 1866, condemned by the experience of ages, two German armies advance on a double line, from Thorn and Neisse, at a wide distance, their purpose being to meet in Poland, and probably to converge on Warsaw; and the main Russian army, leaving behind two large detachments to cover its right flank under Gourko and the Grand Duke Vladimir, moves against the Austrians, who, it appears, are certainly at least equal in force, and are concentrated on the Galician frontier. The army of the Vistula, the left German column, wins a battle near Alexandrovo, against Gourko's troops, fought at night by the electric light; but the army of Silesia, the right German column, suffers a repulse at the hands of the Grand Duke Vladimir, after gaining important success at Czenstochow. The two Russian commanders fall back on Skierniwoice, a strategic point, for the defence of Warsaw; they are routed at this spot by the united German armies, mainly owing to a huge charge of cavalry in their rear, which, somehow or other, escapes their notice; and about the same time, the main Russian army, led by Dragomiroff, is completely beaten by the Austrians, and is driven back on Lublin, the bold offensive of the Czar being thus frustrated. Considering the situation and the position of the belligerents on the theatre of war, all this seems to us improbable in the extreme. The numbers of the contending armies are not given; but Gourko and the Grand Duke, it appears, are not as strong as the two German armies; Dragomiroff, we should say, was not superior to the Austrians, his immediate enemies; and the Austrians, besides, it must be borne in mind, were on the verge of a powerfully fortified frontier. This being so, it is not to be supposed that the main Russian army would make a long march from Volhynia and Poland to invade Galicia, leaving a hostile force in such a position as Thorn, threatening its flank and rear, another hostile force being at Neisse, unless, as apparently was not the case, that flank and rear were made completely secure by the armies of Gourko and the Grand Duke. And, if so, the operations, from first to last, were not such as are likely to happen; they are not akin to the realities of war. The writers, indeed, half admit this; they assert that the Russians never imagined that the Germans would venture to invade Poland. But a miscalculation like this is impossible; Thorn is a standing defiance to Warsaw.

The second great invasion is that of France, made by the allied Italian and German armies. The Italian attack is a diversion only, to hold three French corps d'armée in check, and does not require even a passing notice; we shall confine ourselves to the advance of the Germans. Here, again, the operations, which are not made clear, seem to us unreal and most improbable. The Germans march through Belgium, to turn the line of the great French defences to the east, and to reach the northern frontier of France; and they do this though they have but thirteen corps to oppose to sixteen of the enemy. Nothing, certainly, in the first part of the war of 1870, when the numerical inferiority of the French was immense, would justify such a project as this—in the abstract rash, and especially rash, as the Belgian population hate the Prussians, a fact alleged by the writers themselves; and the strategy that follows seems to us most faulty. The Germans apparently leave three corps only to keep a hold on Lorraine and Alsace, which almost certainly would be up in arms against them; and—though all this is very indistinct—they make for the Sambre and the Aisne, with nine corps, which approach each other, it would seem, from the distance between Liège and Luxemburg, and draw towards Namur and Mézières. They defeat the French, who are represented as slow in assembling their superior forces—a statement contradicted in another passage—and as practically surprised by this mode of invasion, in a series of battles fought between the well-known field of Ligny and the tracts round Châlons; and having frustrated an attempt to repeat Bourbaki's movement, at the close of 1870—an attack by forces collected from the north and the south; and intended to strike their left flank—they march on Paris in serene confidence. We believe that nothing like this could happen in this assumed war between France and Germany. The chiefs of the French army knew perfectly well—the fact has been evident for twenty years—that the Germans would, in all probability, try to make Belgium their way to invade France; and they would be indeed fools if, being superior in force, as in the supposed case, they could not repel the attack we have sketched. Nay, more—the chances, we are convinced, would be that they would have an opportunity, on the given facts, to fall with effect on the flank of the German advance, perhaps to beat the divided armies in detail, perhaps to cut them off from their base, and probably to compel them to accept battle in a position where a defeat would be fatal. A German invasion, in short, under these conditions, would very possibly end in a second Jena, assuming the French had a real leader, with the powers, let us say, of the illustrious Chanzy. As to the march on Paris in the events described, the writers admit that it was very unwise; we venture to say, after the experience of 1870, that it would not be even thought of in the German camp.

A night attack made by the army of Paris ends in a deserved defeat of the Germans; and the invaders, who had marched to the capital, leaving great hostile forces on their flanks and rear, are routed before they can return to Metz. All this is reasonable and well told; and the final victory of the French army—we should say narrated by Mr. Forbes—is a graphic and not an unreal picture. As to the tactical experiences of the war, these, we have said, are not badly set forth; they do not deviate, we think, from the truth. The combat at Ligny shows how superior well-handled is to ill-handled cavalry; that at Vaux Champagne teaches how hopeless it is for infantry to attack without the support of guns; and the battle of Machault clearly illustrates how irresistible may be a well-planned charge of horsemen. The volume, in short, is a fair commentary on the relations and the effects of the three arms; but, save that it indicates how completely the formations of infantry have become changed, it contains little that has not been taught by the battles of the Napoleonic age. The writers, however, are unjust, nearly all, to the French; and their injustice simply defies history. We should like to know when twenty-five German squadrons defeated thirty-six French squadrons; a defeat, when the numbers were in such proportions as this, was certainly not instanced in the first part of the late great war. It is absurd, too, to write that "the fight became stationary, for the French outnumbered us, two to one"; nothing like this occurred, in a cavalry melee, even at Mars la Tour, which may be referred to. The whole experience, too, of the siege of Paris confutes the notion that a well-fortified line, between two forts, could be stormed at a rush, even though poor Frenchmen were the defenders; this, if we recollect Badajoz, is a paltry and lying calumny. This stupid detraction of the French soldiery, of the men who won Auerstadt against enormous odds, of the men who fought at Worth and Gravelotte, with untarnished valour, against overwhelming numbers, would be only ridiculous were it not also offensive; and the skilful officers of the army of modern France might well complain when they are told that they have "no thoroughness," and that their "conception of the nature of the infantry fight is radically defective," did they not rate at their worth the worshippers of success. As to the most recent inventions in the mechanism of war, we have already referred to the electric light; and this volume notices the effects of the latest kind of shells and of balloons constructed to discharge explosives.

The naval operations, we have said, have, for the most part, been well described: they show the judgment of a naval strategist. The British fleets paralyse the arms of the Czar in the Euxine, with scarcely any loss of life; they defeat a French and Russian descent on Denmark, which might have stopped the invasion of France, and have sent an enemy to Berlin; they help the Italian army as it moves into Provence. The power of England at sea is, in a word, well portrayed. But this most important subject has been thoroughly dwelt on through the medium of fact, and not of fancy, in Captain Mahan's admirable works; and we do not care again to refer to it. The operations, however, that end in the victory of Sardinia over the French fleet strike us as not very well conceived; for once more there is much that is far from probable. We should much doubt whether Spain would ally herself with England in a league against France; still more whether she would allow Port Mahon to be made a station for British war ships. As to the Battle of Sardinia, it was at least as likely that the French would destroy the weak Spezzia squadron, as that Sir George Tryon would overtake their fleet; and this is hardly commendable strategy. That we should beat the French, with a lesser number of ships, is in accord with historical facts, and need not irritate French seamen; but why is it said that the artillery practice of the French at sea was exceedingly bad? these are not the days of Ganteaume and Villeneuve. The conditions of the Peace, at the close of the war, are not such as could have been expected. Prussia certainly would not give up an acre of Poland; and, if not, it would be vain to demand a concession of the same kind from Russia, especially, as in the present case, she had not been crippled. Nor would France, after a decisive victory over Germany, abandon Alsace and Lorraine: she would fight on for her lost provinces; and to think otherwise is mere want of knowledge. This book does not deserve much praise; its tendency assuredly is not to promote peace and good will among men.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

The Gospel of Life. By B. F. Westcott (Macmillans.)

"THE following chapters give the substance of Lectures which I gave from time to time (to small classes of students) during the twenty years of my work at Cambridge." This first sentence of Bishop Westcott's Preface explains his sub-title, "thoughts introductory to the study of Christian doctrine." The book is a sort of prolegomena to theological study. It has been written, we imagine, in answer to a demand made upon Dr. Westcott by his pupils for something more vital to the intellectual life of the present day than they could find in the course of reading prescribed for those qualifying themselves for the Christian ministry. The prescribed course of theological study is apt to be severely conservative and anxiously orthodox, and it ignores the special needs of the young student. The doubts and difficulties which assail young men are "fire-new"—at least, the outward form and expression of them is—and are, therefore, not obviously or specifically dealt with in the familiar text-books. Moreover, text-books of divinity do not look upon doubts and difficulties with sympathy; they scarcely allow that doubt is a necessary evil, and cannot, therefore, conceive of it as a friend. The pride of orthodox theology continually suggests that only scoffers and loose-livers have doubts, and never ponders with due reverence and respect the meaning of the great sacrament of darkness and uncertainty with which God sanctifies strong souls. It is not surprising that, during twenty years of care for young minds at Cambridge, Dr. Westcott should have become aware of the necessity of interpreting for the young candidate for holy orders between the insolent, confusing, inevitable turmoil of to-day's difficulties, and the dignified, dusty remoteness of orthodox theology. We can best indicate how frankly Dr. Westcott comes down from his doctor's chair, and seats himself on the form beside the young undergraduate, by quoting a sentence or two from his Preface:

"My desire," he tells us, "has been to encourage patient reflection, to suggest lines of inquiry, to indicate necessary limits to knowledge, and not to convey formulas or ready-made arguments. . . . The world is not clear or intelligible. If we are to deliver our message as Christians, we must face the riddles of life, and consider how others have faced them. . . . We walk 'by faith' in the face of riddles which remain to the last unanswered."

The words we have italicised state a truth which most theological professors ignore, and many deny. It is the special virtue of Bishop Westcott's book that it confesses this truth conscientiously, and confesses it cheerfully: "nor is there any ground for discontent at this condition of life."

A volume by Dr. Westcott which has gradually grown into shape during the study, thought, and experience of twenty years is, of course, unusually full of matter. We have neither the space nor the ability to review it minutely. It is already so condensed that we cannot condense it further, and so admirably arranged that any rearrangement would only confuse. We must be content to describe as well as we can what the intelligent reader will find in it—the reader who does not stop to analyse or compare, although he reads carefully. The most important and essential section of the book is the first chapter, entitled "The Problems of Life." It presents the outlines of a philosophy which Dr. Westcott offers to the young theological student, innocent, perhaps, of Aristotle and Kant. This attempt to give some arrangement to the problems of life, as they present themselves to the mind of everyone who thinks, is continued in several chapters, and is used throughout the volume as a frame upon which the thoughts are stretched, and by which they are brought into relation and order. It is used more or less obviously in chaps. iv. and v., which contain an analysis of certain "præ-Christian solutions of the problems of being" and life. The philosophical theory and the historical inquiry will impress the reader as the two main subjects of the book; but, in addition, he will remember chap. ii., which contains a discussion of the necessity and use of theory or dogma, chap. vii., which considers miracles, and chap. ix., on "Christianity historical." This may serve as an indication of the salient points of The Gospel of Life; but the book is strikingly without salient points. It is everywhere tightly packed with weighty thoughts; and each reader, according to his needs and his views, will find his own favourite chapters.

The philosophic treatise on the problems of life contrasts with the historical sketch of religions in its complete detachment from text-books and authorities. It is in many parts an expansion of certain sections of Dr. Westcott's Gospel of the Resurrection, which is remarkable among his works for its rigorous avoidance of dogmatism, and for the independence, in spite of its erudition, of its main teaching about the soul. It is perhaps because Dr. Westcott wishes to make his pupil think, and not merely to tell him what to think, that in the present work the analysis of the problems of being is severely plain. But it is one result of this plainness that the author's assurance to us, that during twenty years of work at Cambridge these "thoughts have been constantly tested," is felt by the reader as he reads to be vitally true. We are occupied with a philosophy which is the writer's own—which he has made for himself and used; and because he has himself found it useful, he can explain it to us in terms of our own experience, so that we can use it too, if we please. Dr. Westcott's loyalty to the young men of his generation consists especially in this: that he recognises the reasonableness of their difficulties, and offers his counsel because he has himself encountered their doubts. His book, though crammed with knowledge and in parts merely careful abstract of other men's thoughts, is intensely original: "My way of facing my difficulties."

Chapter v. summarises the teaching of the three religions of China, of the two religions of India, and of the Zoroastrianism of Persia. It forms, along with chapter iv., a special section of the volume, in which the Bishop's power of sympathetic and penetrative exposition is excellently displayed. It is impossible to over-estimate the value to the general reader of such aids to the study of intricate and difficult subjects. We can only say here that these essays, like the Essays on the History of Religious Thought in the West, will be received with gratitude by all readers of intelligence, who are aware how rarely a scholar of Bishop Westcott's erudition will condescend to the effort to make the results of his labour easily accessible. The chapters insist on the value to the Christian student of the teaching of præ-Christian religions. It is impossible to read them without learning reverence for those religions. Practically, they tend to break down the false view which finds no inspiration—nothing divine—in so-called pagan beliefs. The tendency of the whole volume, as of all Bishop Westcott's writings, is to increase for us the extent and the intensity of God's voice, so that we hear it not only in special corners, but everywhere in the world. This is the tendency of the volume, and perhaps the Bishop is wise not to express it too sharply. We confess that we disbelieve in the expediency of insisting on the special inspiration of even the New Testament. Let every special inspiration take care of itself! The words of Christ alone can claim to stand in a class apart. If only Englishmen could be taught to regard their own history and literature with any measure of the reverence which, unavoidably in religious households, they inhale into their blood for the history and literature of the Jews, the spiritual energy of England would at once increase perceptibly. Our reverence for the God who chose and guarded the Jewish nation and the Jewish "books," unless it is a promise and a part of our reverence for the God who chooses and guards our nation, tends continually to give to Old Testament ideals and standards a false value, and has in the past again and again dragged Christianity down below its own level. Just as the setting apart of the Sabbath is intended to teach the sanctity of all our days, and is apt to become a stumbling block if this be not understood, similarly the setting apart of the Hebrews tends to become a mere injustice or caprice until it is felt to be a preparation for the setting apart of the whole world—an assertion of the care of God for all His nations. The ninth chapter of our treatise, when it tells us that "all history is in one sense a fulfilment of a divine plan," and goes on to distinguish "two elements in the progress of humanity," a natural element and a divine one, seems to us to introduce confusing distinctions, and to shrink somewhat from positions implied in other chapters of the book. It seems to qualify unnecessarily the assertion that "all earlier history leads up to the Incarnation; all later history has contributed to the interpretation of it." Again, when Dr. Westcott says, "there cannot be any new revelation," the words clash a little with his other statement that "many signs seem to show that we are standing on the verge of a great epoch of revelation."

Chap. ii. on dogma, and chap. vii. on miracles, are of very special interest. The latter, in particular, is vigorous in logical arrangement, terse in expression, and yet graceful and luminous in style. One point only is omitted which a young student would wish considered. Nothing is said definitely about the miraculous element in Gentile literature. We are left on this point to draw our own conclusions.

Of the general style of the volume we have said very little. It is, perhaps, more aphoristic than is usual with Dr. Westcott. Every sentence seems to have mellowed and ripened in the writer's mind till it has become not only thoughtful and careful, but also natural and right. The book is throughout easy to comprehend; it has obviously been taught to many pupils, and in the process has acquired the form and order best suited to a pupil's mind. To Bishop Westcott's other works, it is the best of introductions.

RONALD BAYNE.

The Odes and Epodes of Horace. Translated by Sir Stephen de Vere. With Preface and Notes. (Bell.)

SOME of this handsome volume is a reprint. Of the eighty-seven versions here given, ten were printed in the edition of 1885, and thirty in the following year. Horace wrote, of lyrics, 103 odes, 17 epodes, and the Carmen Saeculare. We have then, in this book, the judgment of a practised translator and no mean poetic artist, what part of Horace's lyric work is best worth preserving, and why; and in what form his stanzas are best represented in English.

The Preface is a most interesting piece of writing, though I think it leaves the general problem of translation unsolved. After weighing the words of Hallam, Mickle, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Newman, Sir S. De Vere sums up that "the duty of the translator is to endeavour to present the classic author to the English readers such as he was to those for whom he wrote." Well, we do not and cannot know what he was to those for whom he wrote; we can only guess. The appeal is really to the modern reader, because there is nobody else, no other standard, to whom or to which the translation can be referred. All we can ask is, "How does the translation strike those of us who know the original best?" and the answer is silence, for they are the very people who care least for a translation.

But the vindication of Horace's character, as man, as poet, as moralist (pp. xxx.-xxxviii), is delightful, though perhaps rather genially impulsive—e.g., "The Plebeians . . . saw . . . that his heart was always with the poor. They, no doubt, read over and over again that noble ode, Non ebur neque aureum, &c., and they blessed him as they recited Quid, quod usque proximos Revellis agri terminos?" &c. Is not this to compare the past of Rome with the present of Ireland? Did Horace really write for, and catch, the ear of the poor?

Before leaving this Preface I would fain call attention to one strangely misleading version in it. On p. xxix the translator gives us a version of Walter de Mapes' famous anacreontic, "Mihi est propositum," &c. The fourth verse, describing the bard's need for good food and wine if he is to poetise aright, ends thus—

"Nihil valet penitus quod ieiunus scribo; Nasonem post calices facile praeibo."

Sir S. De Vere renders this—

"Starving I lose my inspiration,
But in my cups I bang the nation."

It is impossible to think that this scholarly translator really took Nasonem = nationem—yet why does he lead us into the temptation of thinking so? It may be added that, in a book so beautifully got up, the misprints are somewhat provoking—e.g., in this very ode of Walter de Mapes, we have "Bacchur" for Bacchus; on p. 5, "Pyrrhas" for Pyrrha; "Marsyan" (p. 3 and elsewhere) for Marsian (p. 112)—as if it had something to do with Marsyas; "Laeotrigonians" for Laestrygonians (p. 153); "clarum Rhodon" (p. 248); "she" for "he" (p. 79, l. 10); "Ferentum" for Forentum (p. 127).

But, leaving these trifling though regrettable lapses, let us look at the translation itself. It is part of the many superstitions about classical literature, that a book like the Odes of Horace, if translated at all, must be translated whole, not in selections. It is pleasant to find Sir S. de Vere ignoring this view, and translating what he thinks most worthy of Horace and most adaptable to English; furthermore, he discards the stanza of the original in any ode which he thinks can be rendered more impressively otherwise. These are acts of fortitude which may justify themselves, but which no argument—not even the clever and ingenious pleas of pp. xv.-xvi.—will justify to those who are enamoured of the form as much as of the matter of Horace. Of the selection, I would only venture one criticism. I would sacrifice at least eight or ten of the lesser odes here translated for a version of the 28th Ode of Book III.—the Europa ode—which is omitted. No doubt the commencement of it lacks charm. But where is Horace more truly inspired by the legends of Greek mythology than in stanzas 7-16? I cannot believe that Sir S. De Vere has fallen a prey to the prude among commentators who thought the ode unfit for publication. Is there a better touch in all Horace than the maiden imagining her father's voice warning her to suicide, zona bene te secuta—the last protection of maidenhood? It is a real disappointment to see the gap, in this translation, between Odes 25 and 29 of Book III.

But the translator shall show for himself what he can do where he neglects the stanza form, giving the poetry what he considers its natural development in English rhyme. Let us take the "Praise of Hypermnestra" (Od. iii. 11, ll. 33-52):—

"Among the faithless many, one Worthy the nuptial torch, betrayed
Her traitor father: she alone
Nobly untrue; a glorious maid
False to her pledge but faithful to her lord,
Thro' unborn ages honoured and adored.
Then to her youthful spouse she cries,
'My husband, sleep no more: arise!
Lest, swift and silent, thro' the gloom
From hands unfeared a longer sleep may come.
Fly my fierce sire, my ruthless sisters. They Now, now, like lions, rend their lordly prey.
By hand of mine thou shalt not die
Nor bound in loathsome dungeon lie.
. . . Go where kind breaths from Heaven shall speed thy flight,
Shrouded by Venus and protecting Night!
Go, happy-omened! Grave upon my tomb
The pain, the joy, the triumph of my doom!'"

Opinions may well differ as to whether this is Horatian or no: I only venture an opinion that it is excellent English poetry, and the last two lines admirable.

Here is another passage (Od. ii. 13, ll. 21-32).

"Ye Gods! how nearly have I seen
The gloomy realms of Proserpine,
Aeacus, stern judge divine,
And far apart, the abode serene
Of pious men; and heard sad Sappho's song
Mourn her lost love, and chide her rivals' wrong;
And thee, Alcaeus, with thy golden lyre,
Sweeping with powerful hand the clanging wire,
Singing the perils of the sea,
The storm of war, the exile of the free!
In sacred silence press around
The listening shades, but most approve
The strains that tell of tyrant kings discrowned, War-songs, not songs of love!"

There are defects here—the third line seems unmetrical, and one fancies an "and" has fallen away at the beginning of it; "clanging wire" seems rather harsh, even for sonantem plenius. But it has this at least of the original about it, that it carries one on like a freshening breeze.

Once more, let us hear the close of the ode in praise of Bandusia's fountain—an immortal poem, in virtue of its simple charm, for really there is nothing else in it:

"Thou too, O sacred spring,
Shalt have thy place with founts long-loved, far-known;
Whilst I, thy poet, sing
The fleck hoar thy margin shadowing,
The runnels from thy moss-grown caves that flow,
Whispering in murmurs light and low
A language all their own."

Of verse of this merit this volume is full; and the inspiration of it can easily be traced by a reference to Pref., pp. 18, 19. Sir S. de Vere has seen that Horace is one of the best describers of natural scenery, in a few touches, that the world has seen. The translator has, I think, too often expanded, often made the few touches in the Latin into a good many in the English. This is, perhaps, the second-best way; but, if to get some of the best verse of a great Latin poet into language not unworthy of an English poet be a goal, the second-best way has led to it. It is pure pleasure to read many of these versions.

E. D. A. MORSEHEAD.

Sixty Years of Recollections. By M. Ernest Legouvé, of the Académie Française. Translated, with Notes, by Albert D. Vandam. (Remington.)

THIS century of ours, now in extreme old age, is garrulous with memories of its youth, manhood, and later middle life. Reminiscences crowd in upon us—sometimes in altogether charming guise, like those of Mrs. Ritchie; sometimes pleasantly graceful and feminine, like those of Mrs. Andrew Crosse; sometimes, if the truth must be told, egotistic and somewhat dull, like those of W. Bell Scott; sometimes vaporous and shadowy, like those of M. Arsène Houssaye; sometimes, like those of M. de Goncourt, echoing the "all is vanity" of the Preacher; sometimes—but the enumeration would be endless. "Ah! who will give us back the past?" sighs Mr. Gosse in his beautiful "Desiderium." The past itself none can give us. But its memories, its fallen leaves, are being heaped up for us by busy hands.

And among those whose recollections are worthy of record, M. Legouvé holds an honourable place. Think of a memory that goes back to a meeting of the French Academy on April 15, 1813, more than eighty years ago—when little Ernest Legouvé, a lad of six, was taken to hear "fit things" about his father from the lips of his father's successor in the Academic arm-chair. And since then with what men and women of note has he not congregated? He "collaborated" with Scribe—their joint "Adrienne Lecouvreur" still keeps the stage well, and their "Bataille de Dames" was heard again in London during the recent visit of the Théâtre Français; he knew Rachel, and quarrelled with her; he loved Malibran, as who did not? he was related to Eugène Sue; he received the stormy confidences of Berlioz; he was the intimate friend of Hahnemann, the founder of homoeopathy; as a playwright he has been brought into connexion with most of the leading French actors and actresses of his time; as a member himself of the French Academy, and a distinguished man of letters, he has played his part in the best literary society. He writes well too, which is no small qualification in a writer of memoirs, or indeed in a writer of anything else.

Without being exactly a man of genius, M. Legouvé possesses that faculty for taking pains which Reynolds, falsely no doubt, considered to be the essential characteristic of genius. As a conférencier, a term not at all adequately rendered by "lecturer," no one can have been at more trouble than he to make of each of his discourses a finished and artistic product, both as to matter and manner; and as an elocutionist, he has few rivals. And so with his style: it is the good, clear, careful, pointed style of the old French tradition—not the style of modern impressionism, all sound and colour and suggestion, but bright and definite.

It is curious to note, as one goes through these pages, how faded is our interest in many of the men and women whose memories are evoked by M. Legouvé. Casimir Delavigne, Lemerrier, Andrieux, Bouilly, Jouy, what are these—even the first—but names? Eugène Sue, who loomed so large in the world of fifty years ago, quite eclipsing Balzac in popularity, does any one read him now? The "amateur of genius," as M. Legouvé well calls him, has gone to his account. Nay, Béranger himself, the great Béranger, whose songs were once a power in the land—what influence, whether political or literary, does he still possess? M. Vandam, indeed, says, in one of his notes to these volumes:

"Of all the portraits in this 'Gallery,' there is not one so strikingly 'like' as that of Béranger. What is, perhaps, more curious still with regard to his literary influence is that, after many years, it remains with the educated classes. It is no uncommon thing to hear people of the best society clamour for a song of Béranger. There never was a soirée at M. Thiers' in which his friend Mignet, a great professor, did not get up and recite one."

But Thiers and Mignet, too, are of the past. M. Vandam is speaking of yesterday. Perhaps, on the whole, the figures that have faded least in M. Legouvé's portrait gallery are the figures of the actresses and actors, the figures of those whose art might seem, at first sight, to be most ephemeral. Malibran, Rachel—these seem to step out of the canvas, so strongly were they vitalised, and take their place in life once more. M. Legouvé tells, in a pathetic passage, how Rachel, foreseeing her own early death, wept one day, at the rehearsal of "Adrienne Lecouvreur," as she uttered the words, "Farewell, triumphs of the stage! Farewell, delights of the art I love so well!"—how she wept, "because," as she said, "I was thinking with despair how soon Time would obliterate all traces of my skill, and soon there would remain nothing of what had once been Rachel." And M. Legouvé adds truly, "She was mistaken; something of her still lives—the halo round her name." In truth, there are beings so strongly, markedly alive, so spontaneous and individual, that death itself passes them by.

In view of the pen-portraits of Carlyle and Saint-Simon, it is not possible to contend that only a writer whose temper is genial and kindly can write about his contemporaries with advantage. But amenity and tolerance have their charms, especially when they do not degenerate into foolish good-nature; and M. Legouvé's record of those among whom his life has been passed is altogether pleasant.

FRANK T. MARZIALS.

Life of St. Edmund of Canterbury from Original Sources. By Wilfrid Wallace, D.D., Priest of the Order of St. Benedict. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

SAINT EDMUND of Canterbury was one of those great mediæval prelates who arose from what we should now call the lower section of the middle class. He was the eldest son of Robert Rich, who is said to have followed the trade of a rope-maker at Abingdon, and to have been fairly well off—fortunes mediocres. The father died when his children were young; and on the mother devolved the care of the young family. She was evidently a devout person, of a type common in the middle ages. There is no evidence that she troubled her mind about any of those subtle questions of theology which were beginning then to be debated in the neighbouring city of Oxford. Her ideas of goodness included a belief in a wide charity, and a penitential discipline of a much stricter kind than is now commonly practised. It is not difficult to see that she modelled her conduct with regard to her children on the saintly lives which from childhood she had heard interpreted in the vernacular in the parish church of Abingdon. We hear of her giving hair shirts to her son not infrequently. Though careless of creature comforts, the good soul valued learning, and was desirous that her son should receive the best education which the times afforded.

In early life the boy was sent to school at Oxford. Dr. Wallace has collected some details regarding his school life there, of a miraculous nature. We are glad they have been reproduced in a modern form. It was once the practice of editors and biographers to cast aside these things as so much unmeaning rubbish; but we shall never understand the people of the middle ages, if we do not allow for the atmosphere of miracle by which all people believed themselves to be surrounded.

From the Oxford school Edmund went to the University of Paris, then by far the greatest emporium of knowledge north of the Alps. After spending a long period in that seat of learning, he returned to Oxford and took the degree of Master of Arts. It does not seem certain, but it is in a high degree probable, that he went once again to Paris to study theology. Again we find him at Oxford lecturing on theology, then treasurer of the new Cathedral foundation at Salisbury, and shortly afterwards a preacher of the Crusade of 1215. Whether it was his zeal as a preacher or his theological learning that led to his election to the throne of Saint Augustine, we shall never know. On the occasion of the vacancy, which Edmund eventually filled, there had been much strife as to who was to occupy the see. Students of ecclesiastical history know that for many centuries, whenever an Archbishop of Canterbury died, these quarrels sprang up as a matter of course.

We are told that, when St. Edmund heard of his election to the highest post of honour in the English Church, his humility led him to try to avoid what so many others coveted. It was but natural that a man of gentle, retiring habits, such as Edmund Rich, should wish to decline that post of peril. He, no doubt, was well acquainted with the storm-tossed careers of Lanfranc and St. Anselm, and it must have seemed but as yesterday that St. Thomas was murdered in his own cathedral.

We need not follow St. Edmund as archbishop until his death in exile and burial at Pontigny. The latter part of his career has been dealt with by Dean Hook in his Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, but the narrow standpoint which Dr. Hook occupied rendered him in some ways unfit to deal with the career of a mediæval saint. Dr. Wallace has approached the subject with far deeper sympathy. He has moreover had the advantage, which his predecessor had not, of having before him all the known biographies of his hero.

The volume includes many pages that bear but little upon the career of St. Edmund. Those relating to Simon de Montfort and Robert Grosseteste are cases in point. But they are the work of a scholar who knows what he is writing about; so in the present dearth of authorities about those disturbed times we could ill afford to lose them. The appendices contain a mass of hitherto unprinted matter which will be valuable to future students.

"THE PSEUDONYM LIBRARY."—The Two Countesses. By Marie Ebner von Eschenbach. Translated by Mrs. Waugh. (Fisher Unwin.)

Few more remarkable series of novels have been produced for a long time than the Italian series in which Mr. Marion Crawford's indefatigable and almost unfortunate facility has recently poured itself out. It is true that the penalty of such facility is not altogether to seek in them. They are, though well, somewhat slackly written—thoughts and phrases which are really far more original than those of some well-known "stylists" and "thinkers" being put without the distinction which a little care would have given. They are, perhaps, too voluminous. The central imbroglios round which they gather are not always of the first interest; and—which is their greatest fault—the admirable grasp of incident and the acute observation of human life and character which Mr. Crawford possesses are not often completed by the last indefinable touch which makes persons out of personages. Yet, when one compares these vigorous and accurate presentments with the cheap-jack humour, the pinchbeck epigram, the puerile attempts to be modern and unconventional, of so much work in fiction at the present day, it seems something like sinning our mercies to find any fault with Mr. Crawford at all. Pietro Ghisleri is at least the equal of any of the Sarracinesca series, with which it is more or less connected; indeed, we are not sure that it is not superior to them, though there is no single figure as remarkable and as life-like as Corona. That "last touch," the absence of which we have above admitted, is once more wanting; and there will be some who on a point of casuistry will differ with Mr. Crawford on the question of the mortality of love, a belief in which he himself seems to combine with a quite romantic faith both in its quality and in its transference to other objects. But this is casuistry. The hatred of Adèle Savelli for her step-sister, Laura Carlyon, and the truly Italian machinations which she directs against those who love the said Laura, are good: while the conception of the hero—who is quite the reverse of a proper moral man, and not generally credited with great amiability or generosity, but really a chivalrous enthusiast in a sceptical and self-doubting envelope—is capital. The description of the Castle of Gerano is excellently neo-Radcliffian, and the passage on Ghisleri's second duel with Gianforte Campodonico is admirably done. Perhaps our old friend the gigas ex machina, San Giacinto, is too unerringly successful and masterful. Some may find the idyll of Laura's first love and marriage with her deformed husband, Lord Herbert Arden, a little too idyllic. And there are some very old-fashioned folk who, without denying anybody two or, indeed, half-a-dozen marriages, would rather not have them in the same book. But these are all carpings merely, and practically go to show that we think Pietro Ghisleri worth carping at. In invention, pathos, tone, construction, interest, it is far above most contemporary novels.

Mr. Ernest Vizetelly is, of course, perfectly justified in pointing out that no exception can fairly be taken to M. Zola's last novel on the score of the relationship between hero and heroine. It is, for once, really "insular" to find anything shocking in marriage between uncle and niece—the prohibition of which is a purely English or, at least, Protestant crotchet, not even Levitical. The translator has found—as before opening the book we had felt sure, from our knowledge of the French, that he must have found—other things unpleasant to English taste which he had less difficulty in removing, and which he has removed with M. Zola's consent, though not always to the advantage of the story. For, say what good or what ill any one may about this author, his work hangs pretty close together, and it is not easy to "cut" it. Of the rest of the apology into which Mr. Vizetelly enters we may be excused from saying much here. Nor is it necessary to criticise the translation in detail, though we wish Mr. Vizetelly had not vulgarised M. Zola's titles. La Joie de Vivre—not his worst book in power—has one of his best titles; and it is an outrage to render it, "How Jolly Life Is"—which sweeps us, at once, from satiric tragedy to cockney farce. As for Doctor Pascal itself, it is, of course, in more senses than one, an epitome of the "Rougon-Macquart" series. What we think the dead, hopeless weight of a more than contestable theory hangs over it, of necessity, more heavily than over any of the others. Nowhere in the whole twenty does the dull brute obstinacy of purpose butt and bore at us more mercilessly; nowhere are the author's contracted views, his quaint prejudices, his narrow range, more apparent. Yet Clotilde is, at once, one of the most real and one of the most romantic figures he has ever drawn; the scene on the threshing-floor rises far above the usual level of his work for passion and majesty, and the climax of reconciliation does not come far behind it. Although much of the book is tedious, and some of it a little disgusting, it is hardly anywhere vulgar; and the least warm admirer of what the profane call the Comédie Bestiale may all admit that M. Zola has "come with a rush" at its finish. Hardly even in La Faute de l'Abbé Mouret has he shown how great a novelist he might have been, if he had not deliberately chosen the wrong path, misled by a mere foi du charbonnier in a grovelling and ignoble creed.

Mrs. Wiggin has given us two of the pleasantest American stories that we have recently read. The scene of both is in England, and the heroine of both is that American girl, English admiration for whom Mrs. Wiggin perhaps assumes rather confidently as a universal fact. But both these heroines are very nice American girls, and we are quite content to like them. Not, however, to unworthy Englishmen do they fall: persons duly starred and striped pursue them and carry them off on and from the alien soil. This is just as it should be. Each nation should keep its best natural products to itself, if it can; and both Catherine Schuyler, who is pursued by a lover round the cathedrals of England, which she visits under the care of her aunt to improve her mind, and Penelope Hamilton, who is an artist and whose mind is pretty well improved already, are—for American girls—very good natural products. Miss Penelope, indeed (with a graciousness which we can but acknowledge with a bow, marred only by a slight tendency to choke) even "does not see why Englishmen are thought deficient in a sense of humour"; and Miss Catherine wished to kiss all the Winchester boys, a proceeding to which, not only by reason of their motto, but also from the description of her charms, we trust that they would not have made any great objection. So that these are really amiable young ladies. There is, indeed, a passage about a duke which makes us doubt whether Miss Hamilton is not too gracious so far as we personally are concerned, in granting Englishmen a sense of humour. But it is only here, and in one or two other places, that that "salt estranging sea," the Atlantic, reminds us of its existence. In short, the book is a clever book and a pleasant book; and there's an end on't.

The humours of the American freshman some years ago may be read in Donald Marcy, and, though not suited to arouse repining in any English mind that it "freshed" at Oxford or Cambridge instead of at "Harle," may be read with sufficient interest. The unpleasant practice of "hazing" is here exposed in all its deformity; the virtuous minister's daughters, who are quite competent to "teach school" if they do not, are well contrasted with the dubious young persons who give parties to "boys" when their mothers have gone to bed. Morals are inculcated with not too heavy a touch; but might not Miss Phelps have found a more probable name for her Armida than Miss "Merry Gorond"? And since she is moral, we will be moral too. Much may be said both for and against the practice of kissing young ladies at dances when they seem to wish that you should do so; but, if you do so, it is not correct to put their letters unopened and unanswered into the fire afterwards. On that point no casuistry can be permitted.

Harvard Stories is a book of the same class, but more admittedly devoted to one particular institution, and more modern. It also possesses a quality—to wit, the quality of being amusing, which we do not always find increasing in the ratio of modernity. Mr. Post's Harvard "Undergrads" are a very amiable collection of young persons who, between them, build up a Vordant Green for their own establishment in a sufficient and satisfactory manner. They talk book a little (which indeed hath been observed of other undergraduates in other parts of the world), and they talk slang a little excessively. Slang is good as salt, but bad as meat. They seem to have changed a good deal since the contemporaries of Donald Marcy, the chief feature in common being a curious delight in hoaxing policemen, which suggests the British medical student more than the British undergraduate; and they are a little more boyish in some of their ways than their analogues here. Nor can the most determined foe of book-learning accuse them of wasting too much time on what the ancestors called musty folios. But they are good fellows, and understand jollity, which whosoever learneth not when he is young, seldom shall he feel it when he is old. The most elaborate sketches—those of the football match and boat-race with Yale—though a very little over-coloured, are spirited and vigorous. The one serious story (of course of "the war") is told with pathos and good taste; the dog Blathers will be welcomed by Huz and Buz in Paradise; and there is hardly a chapter in the book which is otherwise than mirthful and good.

We have not found much interest in either of the "Two Countesses," Muschi and Paula; but it does not follow that others may not be more fortunate. GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Women Adventurers. Edited by Mémie Muriel Dowie. (Fisher Unwin.) This book consists of "lives" of Madame Velazquez, Hannah Snell, Mary Anne Talbot, and Mrs. Christian Davies, with an introduction by the editor, Miss Dowie. The reader whose appetite for the ordinary fiction of the circulating libraries has become dull may find refreshment in the somewhat archaic style of most of these so-called "lives," which are reprinted from pamphlets of various dates. Miss Dowie's volume, A Girl in the Carpathians, may possibly prepare the reader for something of the nature of adventure in foreign travel, but the exploits of the ladies mentioned were military and naval. Probably all of these ladies really existed, but what proportion of their respective biographies is authentic it seems impossible to determine. One may almost apply what Miss Dowie says of her book on the Carpathians: "Information is such an insidious, slippery sort of thing, that do what one can, and steel oneself as one may, a little is sure to leak in." Take as an illustration of what we have said, Mrs. Christian Davies, whose "life" bears date 1740. She was born, we are told, in the year 1667; and details are given agreeing with this date. She died "aged 108 years, if dates are to be trusted." But Miss Dowie deprecates anything like critical inquiry. "Such serious investigation would be ungracious." She makes an exception, however, in the case of Madame Loreta Janeta Velazquez, who served in the American Civil War in the army of the Confederate States: "She stands upon a different—a more serious platform, for she is of our own day, and plenty of men now living must have known her as Lieutenant Harry Buford." We have neither the space nor the inclination for a close scrutiny even of this lady's pretensions. Here is a specimen, of which the reader can form his own judgment:

"So soon as I got to New Orleans, I went to an old French army tailor in Barrack Street, who I knew was very skilful, and who understood how to mind his own business by not bothering himself too much about other people's affairs, and had him make for me half-a-dozen fine wire net shields. These I wore next to my skin, and they proved very satisfactory in concealing my true form, and in giving me something of the shape of a man, while they were by no means uncomfortable."

This lady's biography, on its original publication, was edited by "C. J. Worthington, late of the United States Navy." This gentleman says significantly at the end:

"Throughout her history, upon every page of her book which deals exclusively with her own doings, there is an air of truthfulness which comes—dare I confess?—with very great refreshment to a connoisseur of the elaborated adventure of the average adventurer."

We seem to have read an authentication a little like this in the immortal Gulliver. Some readers may possibly find Miss Dowie's introduction more attractive than the biographies, among which, it would seem, she was unable to include the life of "a female pirate," a fact which she "regrets deeply":

"Piracy," she tells us, "as a trade, should be peculiarly suited to a woman; it gave considerable opportunities of brief, fiery, emotional display; was fierce and dramatic and profitable. Quick returns readily attract a woman, and piracy of the fine, old, legendary kind, was a matter of quick returns and not small profits."

We should scarcely have expected this from Miss Dowie, though it agrees to no small extent with Schopenhauer's estimate of woman, as endowed with instinctive treachery, with an invincible tendency to lie, and with injustice as a fundamental principle of character. These are qualifications which would enter admirably into the equipment of the female pirate. Miss Dowie begins her Introduction by saying that "among the hoary, white old questions that go tottering down the avenue of time, is one of an intermittent vitality truly surprising. The Independence of Woman—is it right or wrong?" Of late, however, especially in this country, there has been such vigorous development in relation to this particular question that its condition can scarcely be compared to the eternal senility of Swift's Struldbrugs. In our social condition there are several things which may call to remembrance Imperial Rome, the Rome of Juvenal and Martial. Then, as now, for example, women were anxious to rival men in acquired learning and in athletic exercises. But there is a difference. Martial tells of a Roman who had married a wealthy woman, but who, on his appointment to one of the great offices of State, was divorced by his wife, lest her fortune, or such portion of it as was in her husband's hands, should be laid under contribution to defray the cost of spectacular entertainments required or expected by the people. But with us a woman's property remains, notwithstanding marriage, strictly her own. It does not pass into her husband's power, though it may involve him in some liabilities. When the lucre-loving lady celebrated by Martial recalled her property she left her husband perfectly free. We, however, have improved on this state of things. As the Jackson and other cases have shown, a woman can say to her husband res tuas tibi habeto, and then leave him, while he still remains trammelled, possibly for life. Miss Dowie candidly remarks, notwithstanding what she had said before, "An observation of women's success in public matters leads me to be certain that, for the moment, advantage lies with women as opposed to men."

The Poet and the Man. Recollections and Appreciations of James Russell Lowell. By Francis H. Underwood, LL.D. (Boston: Lee & Shepard.) While awaiting the fuller memorials which have been promised, Mr. Underwood's memoir is welcome. It is partly biographical, but consists mainly, as the title indicates, of "recollections and appreciations." Mr. Underwood and Mr. Lowell were personal and, for some years, intimate friends, and the book serves less as a critical estimate than by showing what manner of man Mr. Lowell was in private life. In public he could be suave, or, when occasion seemed to demand it, quite the opposite. His skill in making things smooth was often finely exhibited, notably while he was Minister in London. But he never exercised this skill at the cost of principle; and it happened often enough in the course of his lifetime that, as a conscientious man, he found it necessary to ruffle, not only the people of England, but also his own countrymen. Mr. Underwood is able to show us what he was as a friend. With his estimates of Mr. Lowell as poet and as public man we cannot always agree. Mr. Underwood was too near him to be able to estimate him fairly in these relations. We are not disposed to quarrel with his general conclusion that Mr. Lowell's association with public life, "though flattering and honourable," was only "an incident in his career"; that it was as "a scholar, instructor, essayist, and poet"—and, we would add, as a reformer or agitator—that he realised his early aspirations and fulfilled his destiny; and, finally, that he was "a great man." Wherein his greatness consisted is the point where opinions differ. Mr. Underwood believes Mr. Lowell was first of all, and chiefly, great as a poet. To us he appears rather as a great man of the world. The prominent features of his character are strong practical ability and shrewd commonsense. That he was a poet also, made him all the better man of the world. But his literary work, the best of it, at any rate, was eminently practical; and it always related, more or less, to human affairs and interests. As Mr. Underwood himself remarks, "He cared little for poetry which was not uplifting to the soul or useful to humanity" (p. 92). The influence of his first wife and of the "Transcendental" Movement, of which she was an ardent supporter, gave tone to his character and direction to his life. That was his "conversion" or "new birth"—to use the language of the churches. The "gay youth, fond of chaffing and ready to jeer at the abolitionists," became a "reformer and a devotee of spiritual life." But when Mr. Underwood adds, "No more complete renunciation of the 'world' was ever made," we must differ from him, unless by the "world" he means merely purposeless pleasure. The real world Mr. Lowell did not renounce in the least degree; but, when he was awakened to its urgent need for amendment in certain particulars, he set himself strenuously to amend it. He did not even renounce gaiety and the useful talent for "chaffing." He was a man who could enter heartily into the joys of life, as well as give practical sympathy in its sorrows. That he was manly, hearty, full of fire and life, is surely visible in his writings as well as in his public acts; while other records of his private relations point the same way.

Charles Kingsley: Christian Socialist and Social Reformer. By the Rev. M. Kaufmann. (Methuen.) This volume, says the author in his preface, "is a monograph, not a biography"; but it certainly contains as much detail as would be required for a biography, and not more criticism than a properly written biography should contain. The author aims to "present one aspect" of Kingsley's life, "as a social and sanitary reformer," in which effort he deals—perhaps unavoidably—with the other aspects, and with a good many things besides. If he had gone a step further, and written a popular biography of the author of Alton Locke, he need not have detracted from his main purpose, while producing a work more generally useful. As it is, the author has given us a careful and entirely readable study of one who was interesting as a social reformer, but greater as a man. Kingsley's Christian Socialism is worth attention for the light it throws on Kingsley's own character, rather than for any great value in the movement itself. Perhaps, however, Mr. Kaufmann, who is an enthusiast on the subject of (historical) Socialism, would hardly think so; but, for all that, his estimate of Kingsley is very high.

NOTES AND NEWS.

We are informed that, under the auspices of the Royal Irish Academy, there will soon be published a memoir of the late Bishop Reeves, recently president of the Academy, and distinguished for his wide and accurate knowledge of Irish history and early literature, and for his writings on those subjects. Lady Ferguson, widow of Sir Samuel Ferguson, was selected for the task, to which she has brought not only well-tryed ability as a writer, but the advantage of having known the Bishop from the days of his youth.

LEWIS CARROLL has written a continuation to Sylvie and Bruno, which, like the first part, will be illustrated by Mr. Harry Furniss.

MR. ANDREW LANG'S Christmas book for 1893 will be called The True Story Book, because it contains stories founded "more or less" upon fact. They will cover the whole field of history, from Thermopylae and the finding of Vinland to Prince Charlie's wanderings and the battle of the Shannon and the Chesapeake. Like the former series of "Poetry Books," the volume will have numerous illustrations by Messrs. Lancelot Speed, H. J. Ford, and others.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will begin in October the publication of Prof. Huxley's collected works, in monthly volumes. The format is that of the "Eversley" edition of Charles Kingsley's novels, in which also have appeared the works of Emerson and Mr. John Morley. The first six volumes of the series will consist of papers collected under the following titles: "Method and Results," "Darwiniana," "Science and Education," "Science and Hebrew Tradition," "Science and Christian Tradition," and "Hume."

MESSRS. EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE have in the press The Army-Book for the British Empire: a record of the development and present composition of the military forces and their duties in peace and war, by Lieut.-Gen. A. H. Goodenough and Lieut.-Col. J. C. Dalton, both of the Royal Artillery. The latter, it may be remembered, is the editor of The Waterloo Roll Call, and also of the first English Army Lists in the time of Charles II.

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co. have nearly ready for publication a new work by Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole, entitled The Mohammedan Dynasties. It consists of tables and pedigrees of the Khalifs and princes of Islam, from the seventh to the nineteenth century, together with brief historical introductions and indices.

MRS. MANDELL CREIGHTON, the wife of the Bishop of Peterborough, has written a companion volume on France to her First History of England. It will be published by Messrs. Longmans, with five coloured maps and numerous illustrations.

MR. ALEXANDER INNES SHAND has been entrusted by Messrs. Blackwood with the duty of writing a Life of the late General Sir Edward Hamley.

THE forthcoming volume of Prof. Henry Morley's English Writers will deal with Shakspeare and his time.

A MEMORIAL volume of essays, &c., by the late Dr. Thomas Campbell Finlayson, minister of Rusholme Congregational Church, will be published shortly by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. It has been edited by his brother, a well-known doctor at Glasgow; and will have a brief biographical sketch, written by Prof. A. S. Wilkins, of Owens College. Most of the papers selected for publication are literary or philosophical. They include studies of Tennyson and Browning, and translations from Goethe, Schiller, and Heine.

IN addition to the memorial volume on Winchester, Mr. Edward Arnold has in the press another book on the ten great public schools: Eton, Harrow, Winchester, Rugby, Westminster, Marlborough, Cheltenham, Haileybury, Clifton, and Charterhouse. The several articles will be signed by the writers, and there will be more than fifty illustrations.

MESSRS. ISBISTER & Co. will publish during October a volume of sermons preached by Archdeacon Farrar in Westminster Abbey, to be entitled The Lord's Prayer.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK will publish shortly a facsimile of the first edition of the Imitation of Christ, printed by Zainer in 1470-71. The copy from which it has been photographed was originally in the library of St. Peter's Monastery at Salisbury. It will be accompanied with an introduction by Canon Knox Little.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS announce a new book by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, entitled The Wilderness Hunter, giving an account of the big game of the United States, and its chase with horse, hound, and rifle. The volume will have abundant illustration by Messrs. Remington, Frost, and others.

THE first volume of "The New Irish Library," published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin in connexion with the Irish Literary Society, will consist of a reprint of the articles on "The Patriot Parliament of 1691," contributed by Thomas Davis to the Dublin Magazine of 1843. It will have an introduction by Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, the general editor of the series. The second volume will be a collection of stories of Elizabethan Ireland, by Mr. Standish O'Grady.

THE next two volumes in the series of "Heroes of the Nations" will be Henry of Navarre: and the Huguenots in France, by Mr. P. F. Willert; and Cicero: and the Fall of the Republic, by Mr. J. L. Strachan Davidson.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. will begin to publish in October, on behalf of the Combe trustees, a popular edition of the Works of George Combe, in shilling volumes. The first volume will be The Constitution of Man.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW & Co. announce an historical novel by Mr. F. A. Inderwick, Q.C., based on incidents of the Napoleonic war associated with Romney Marsh. The book will be entitled A Prisoner of War, and will be illustrated.

MR. WALTER BESANT's new novel, The Rebel Queen, will be published next week, in three volumes, by Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

THE "Pseudonym" volume to appear next week will be, to some extent, a new departure. The Passing of a Mood, which gives the title to the book, is one of twenty-one scenes of modern life written by three people—V., O., and C. S. Some treat of what is called the demi-monde, but most are intended to present as pictorially as possible the moods and capricious trains of thought of intellectual people.

MRS. G. S. REANEY, the author of so many children's tales, has recently written a novel appealing to older readers, and treating of moral and social questions. It will be issued, in three volumes, by the new firm of Messrs. Bliss, Sands & Foster, during the first week in October.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON will publish immediately a novel, in three volumes, by Mr. Fitzgerald Molloy, entitled An Excellent Knave.

MESSRS. F. V. WHITE & Co. will publish in the course of the present month the following new novels:—The Soul of the Bishop, in two volumes, by John Strange Winter; The Hunting Girl, in three volumes, by Mrs. Edward Kennard; and Not in the Betting, by Sir Randal Roberts.

CHEAP editions will be published by Mr. Heinemann, of The Tower of Taddeo, by Ouida, with eight new illustrations by Mr. Holland Tringham, and of Kitty's Father, by Mr. Frank Barrett; and also a revised edition of The Premier and the Painter, with the announcement for the first time of Mr. I. Zangwill's name as joint author.

MESSRS. JARROLD & SONS, of Norwich, announce a new uniform edition, at short intervals, of the works of Mrs. Leith Adams (R. S. de Courcy Laffan). The two first volumes of the series will be Louis Draycott and Bonnie Kate.

THE American firm of Macmillan & Co., who have just moved into new premises at Fifth Avenue, New York, issue a list of new books by American authors, to be published by them during the autumn. Among these American authors we notice the name of Mr. Goldwin Smith, who is represented not only by his Political History of the United States, but also by a collection of translations from the Latin poets, to be entitled Bay Leaves. The majority of the other books are scientific treatises (chiefly mathematical and physical) by professors at the numerous American universities. But we may specially mention a book on American Book-Plates, by Mr. Charles Dexter Allen, with fifty illustrations.

THE Rev. Frederick Langbridge's Poems of Home and Homely Life, of which the original edition of a thousand copies was quickly exhausted, and of which a popular edition has since been sold, is to appear again this season at an intermediate price.

THE "Whitehall edition" of Shakspeare, mentioned in the ACADEMY of last week, will be in twelve volumes, to be sold separately. The editor is Mr. H. Arthur Doubleday. His plan has been to follow, so far as possible, the text of the First Folio; all emendations adopted from modern editors are indicated in notes. The first volume, containing the four earliest comedies, will be published within the next fortnight.

THE following are among the educational announcements of Messrs Blackie & Son:—Latin Stories, by A. D. Godley, of Magdalen College, Oxford; French Stories for Middle Forms, by Marguerite Ninet; A French Reader, by J. J. Beuzemaker; Text-book of Heat, by Dr. C. H. Draper; Students' Introductory Handbook of Systematic Botany, by J. W. Oliver; Elementary Hydrostatics and Pneumatics, by R. Pinkerton, Lecturer in University College, Cardiff; also Richard II., by Prof. Herford; Julius Caesar, by A. D. Innis; and Macbeth, by E. K. Chambers, in the "Warwick Shakspeare"; and Julius Caesar in the "Junior School Shakspeare."

WE understand that Mrs. L. T. Meade retires from the editorship of Atalanta after the appearance of the September number, but she will still continue to contribute to its pages.

WE are informed that Mr. Francis Adams was engaged, up to the time of his death, on a review of Egypt and the present situation, from the Egyptian point of view. Mr. Unwin was in recent correspondence with him about this book.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

"Are Americanisms, as well as bad French, creeping into English literature? In the current number of Blackwood's Magazine I have come across two examples. One is in the novel of provincial life, entitled 'Earls court,' which, though anonymous, is assuredly not written by an American. Here (p. 355) the Hon. George Colpoys, M.P., is represented as making love thus: 'If you can't say that you love me any just now, say that you will marry me, and try to love me afterwards.' The other is in a review of recent French novels, where (p. 386) we read: 'It is on the back of this luncheon-party that Morgex has with Andouin a conversation destined to bear fatal fruits.' By the way, this latter article is full also of extraordinary translations from the French. It may be enough to mention that a juge d'instruction is first called a 'civil magistrate,' and then 'the judge of public instruction.'"

CORRECTIONS:—In the ACADEMY of last week, in the review of Cannan's History of Economical Theories, p. 188, col. 2, l. 7, for "did not leave out" read "also include"; and in Mr. E. C. Tainsh's letter on "A Study of Tennyson's Poems," p. 195, col. 1, l. 34, for "darkness" read "deariness."

ORIGINAL VERSE.

WRITTEN IN AN ALBUM OF WHICH ALL THE LEAVES WERE OF COLOURED PAPER.

THE Album first held sheets of paper white,
Whereon each friend his tribute should indite:
Unstain'd the whiteness of the unprinted leaves,
From which its name the Album still receives.
Adorn'd by no nice arts the volume then,
It gain'd its beauty from each hum'rous pen:
Brilliant the wit which point and colour made,
While softer pathos gave the needed shade.
Now pens are feeble, bards have lost their fire;
Yet shall not all thy comeliness expire.
Album no longer; this mechanic age
Gives thee new beauty in a rainbow page.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Antiquary for September seems to have suffered from the dullness of the season. With the exception of Mr. John Ward's paper on the Salisbury and South Wilts Museum, there is hardly anything that will be remembered when the number is laid down. Mr. W. H. St. John Hope's paper on the recent excavations at Silchester cannot be regarded as an exception: it is such a mere sketch. We presume that a detailed account of the interesting discoveries that have been made there during the current year will be given in the Archæologia. The "Notes of the Month" both in the foreign and British departments are, as usual, excellent.

NOTES ON TWO RECENT EDITIONS OF WORDSWORTH.

II.—THE COLLATION OF THE TEXT.

In the ACADEMY of August 26 there appeared some observations designed to demonstrate the futility of the attempt recently made by an accomplished critic in the pages of the Athenæum to extenuate or partially justify the gross inaccuracies of Prof. Knight's chronological work, on the ground that his date-lists must be regarded as being necessarily of a tentative character or—to quote the term actually employed by the kindly apologist—as mere "trial-lists" from the very nature of the case. It was pointed out that this vaguely depreciatory view of the character of the tables finds no support whatsoever from the language used by Prof. Knight himself, who, to judge by the allusions in his Preface and earlier Notes, would seem, for a time at least, to have regarded even his first table with no little complacency, as a bit of work upon which every reasonable precautionary effort had been duly bestowed with the view of insuring its substantial accuracy. It was shown in the next place that the flattering forecast formed by Prof. Knight of the correctness of his chronological work was in truth absurdly wide of the mark—in a word, that so far are the tables from furnishing any just grounds for complacent reflection, that even the second, carefully revised table issued by Prof. Knight in 1885 proves on examination to abound in errors "gross as a mountain, open, palpable"; and, in order at once to illustrate and to reinforce the argument, two several lists were added, each containing numerous examples of a leading kind of error. Having thus to the best of our ability exhibited Prof. Knight's chronological work in its true character—in order to render more salient the contrast which it offers when placed side by side with the virtually flawless work recently given to us by Prof. Dowden—we pass to-day to the second point of contrast between the respective labours of the Scotch and of the Irish professor, viz., that which manifests itself in their several attempts to collate the texts of the numerous successive editions of the poems from 1793 to 1849. Before entering upon this second portion of our subject, however, we must first gather up a few loose threads of our former argument which, in the stress of rapid composition, we either overlooked or designedly dropped for the moment.

The publication of a volume of Selections from their poet's works, made by the members of the Wordsworth Society, furnished Prof. Knight with an excellent opportunity of revising the inaccuracies that persistently survived the (alleged) careful revision of 1885. Accordingly, we do find that, of the blunders enumerated in the two formidable lists given by us on August 26, the following few are silently corrected in that volume:—

1. The publication-date of the sonnet, "To Toussaint L'Ouverture," is rightly given 1803 (instead of 1807).

2. That of the sonnet, "It is not to be thought of that the Flood," is also corrected from 1807 to 1803.

3. That of the sonnet, "When I have borne in Memory what has tamed," is also corrected from 1807 to 1803.

(These three sonnets first appeared, as a note in the Selections tells us, in the Morning Post of 1803.)

4. The publication-date of the poem, entitled "At the Grave of Burns: Seven Years after his Death," is rightly corrected from 1845 to 1842.

5. The publication-date of the sonnet, "Clouds, lingering yet, extend in solid bars," is rightly corrected from 1820 to 1819.

6. The publication-date of the lines, "If thou, indeed, derive thy light from Heaven," is properly corrected from 1836 to 1827.

7. The composition-date of the poem, called, by Dorothy Wordsworth, "The Firgrove," or "The Inscription of the Pathway," is given correctly as 1800 (instead of 1805).*

8. The composition-date of the sonnet, "High is our calling, Friend!" is correctly given as December, 1815 (instead of March, 1815).

9. The composition-date of the lines, "Written on a Blank Leaf of Macpherson's Ossian," is correctly given as 1824.

10. The composition-date of the lines, "If thou, indeed, derive thy light from Heaven," is conjecturally given as 1827 (instead of the certainly wrong date 1832).

So far, so good: Prof. Knight has, happily, succeeded in reducing the sum total of his errata by ten. This would be a matter for sincere congratulation, if the alterations found in this volume of Selections ended with the ten instances just enumerated. But, unhappily, they do not; and, incredible as it may appear—when we recollect that Prof. Knight had been looking forward to the preparation of that book as a fit opportunity for finally revising the chronological department of his labours—it is yet an indisputable, though a deeply deplorable, fact that the remaining alterations are each and all of them fresh blunders, which Prof. Knight has heedlessly suffered to creep into what it was once fondly hoped would be a brilliant example of editorial accuracy and diligence. It seems, we repeat, scarcely credible, and yet here are the cold facts:—

1. Prof. Knight tells us that "The Old Cumberland Beggar" was first published in 1798. (Correct date 1800.)

2. He tells us that the lines beginning, "I travelled among unknown men," were first published in 1800. (Right date 1807.)

3. He tells us that the lines addressed "To a Highland Girl" were first published in 1815. (Correct date 1807.)

4. He omits to tell us that the sonnet, "O Mountain Stream! the Shepherd and his Cot," was written in 1806 and first published in 1807, thus leaving us to infer that its date (of composition as well as of publication) is properly the same as that of the majority of the Duddon Sonnets, viz., 1820.

5. He gives a curious date for the composition of the "Cuckoo" poem—March 21, 1801-2. By which, we take it, he means March 23-26, 1802, which appears, according to the scanty information at present within our reach, to be the true date of the poem.

Thus, owing to the malign influence of that singular vice of his editorial character—a seemingly invincible aversion from the incessant labour and alert vigilance indispensable to the attainment of a high degree of accuracy in minute questions of date, &c.—Prof. Knight

* The poem was begun in 1800, and lines 1-66 were probably written in that year: before September 1, not on it, as is stated by Prof. Knight. The poem was most likely finished in 1802, while John Wordsworth was still away upon "the joyless ocean."

has actually forfeited one half of the advantage which he would otherwise have gained from the correction of his former errors in this recent volume. After such an exhibition of recklessness in the body of the book, we are not much surprised to find Prof. Knight stating, in the Preface, that the text adopted by the late Matthew Arnold for his famous little volume of Selections was that of the four-volume edition of 1832. The reader will find a true account of Matthew Arnold's text in a review of Prof. Dowden's edition of Wordsworth published in the Athenæum of August 12.

And now we must pass on to the second branch of our subject, which is a comparison of the work done by Prof. Knight with that accomplished by Prof. Dowden in the direction of text-collation.

Prof. Knight has not left us in any difficulty or uncertainty regarding his claims in this matter. On the very first page of his Preface to the Poetical Works he says:—

"All the changes of text adopted by the poet in the successive editions of his works will be given in footnotes, with the precise date of these changes."

And again (Preface, p. xlviii.), he says:—

"Wordsworth did not always alter his text for the better. Every alteration, however, whether for the better or for the worse, is here printed in full."

And again (Preface, p. xlviii.)

"The text adopted is . . . that which was finally sanctioned by Wordsworth himself, in the last edition which he revised. But, as every variation from this final text occurring in the earlier editions is given in footnotes, it may be desirable to explain," &c.

(The italics in the first and second of these quoted passages are ours. Those in the third are Prof. Knight's.)

From these passages, and others of like import, we gather that Prof. Knight claims to supply in his footnotes an absolutely full and complete list of the various alterations introduced from time to time, according as each successive edition appeared, by the poet himself into the text of the poems. Prof. Dowden on the other hand (Preface to Aldine Edition of Wordsworth's Poems, p. xiii.) expressly forewarns us that in his collation of the texts he does not aim at exhaustiveness, and promises to give us merely a large selection from the various readings of editions prior to 1849. Here, however, we may say that Prof. Dowden is somewhat better than his word; for, if we except the "Excursion," and the two poems published in 1793, we may confidently assert that no variation possessed of even the very slightest interest for the curious investigator of such matters has been passed over by Prof. Dowden. So far as the lyrical poems are concerned, Prof. Dowden's collation is virtually exhaustive; and it is chiefly, if not solely, in the case of the lyrical poems that the study of Wordsworth's alterations and fluctuations of text possesses interest and value for the student. If however Prof. Dowden has performed works of supererogation in this particular direction, Prof. Knight, on the contrary, has fallen lamentably short of the rash pretensions which he quite gratuitously announced at the outset of his work. Some considerable time before the first volume of Prof. Knight's edition of the Poetical Works was produced, there appeared in the Contemporary an article from the pen of Prof. Dowden on the subject of the variations in the text of Wordsworth's poems. The article in question is, we need hardly say, of the very greatest interest and importance to every student of Wordsworth; in fact, some acquaintance with it is absolutely indispensable to those who desire to obtain a clear insight into the principles underlying Wordsworth's manipulation of his text. In the natural course of the argument pursued in Prof. Dowden's article, several typical examples are quoted of the more remarkable changes introduced for one reason or another by the poet into his text. But strange to say, from beginning to end of Prof. Knight's eight volumes, there never once occurs the very slightest allusion to this admirably instructive and suggestive essay upon the subject which holds so prominent a place in his notes. Nor is this all: regard for truth compels us to add that, of the typical instances of text-variation quoted in Prof. Dowden's article, several—and these not the least important—are, notwithstanding his large promises of an exhaustive collation of the text, simply altogether ignored by Prof. Knight. I write away from home and have not the article in question at hand for reference; but I have distinctly within recollection the following instances of an altered text, adduced by Prof. Dowden, and utterly disregarded by Prof. Knight:—

1. The opening line of the poem entitled "Rural Architecture" was altered in the edition of 1827 from, "There's George Fisher, Charles Flemming, and Reginald Shore" to, "From the meadows of Armath on Thirlmere's wild shore"; but owing to the combined efforts of Dorothy Wordsworth and Barron Field, the original reading was restored in the following edition, that of 1832.

2. The third line of the poem entitled "Personal Talk," originally (1807) ran: "About friends, who live," &c.—a reading which impaired the metre. This was altered in the edition of 1815 to the present reading, "Of friends, who live," &c.

3. The 56th line of the poem entitled "The Brothers" originally ran, "And, while the broad green wave," &c. This reading was retained from 1800 to 1836, that is, through eight successive editions; in 1843 (1842?) it was altered—with the view of enhancing the accuracy of the description—to, "And, while the broad blue wave," &c.—a reading which has been retained ever since.

4. In the third stanza of "The Female Vagrant," as originally published in the Lyrical Ballads of 1798, the seventh line ran thus: "The cowlslip-gathering at May's dewy prime." In 1820 "May" became "June," for the same reason that led the poet to alter two lines of "The Oak and the Broom" which at first ran thus—

"The Spring for me a garland weaves Of yellow flowers and verdant leaves," to their present shape—

"On me such bounty Summer pours
That I am cover'd o'er with flowers (1815);

and also brought about the alteration of the lines in the same poem—

"That instant brought two stripling bees To feed and murmur there"— to the version introduced into the edition of 1815 and subsequently retained—

" . . . two stripling bees
To rest, or murmur there; "

the object of all these changes being the same in each case, viz., the attainment of a stricter accordance with the facts of natural history. Not one of these four instances of text-variation is noticed by Prof. Knight; nor does he record the second of the two instances just quoted from "The Oak and the Broom." It should be added that the examples now given from Prof. Dowden's paper derive their main interest from the connexion in which he introduces them to our notice; and that there are several other instances brought forward in his paper, and overlooked by Prof. Knight, which cannot now be recalled to mind. But, to resume the course of the argument—it will readily be understood with what surprise the writer first observed these proofs of Prof. Knight's oversight, and with what heightened interest he entered upon a careful examination of the entire body of the textual foot-notes. The result of that examination he must now endeavour as concisely as possible to put before the reader.

Prof. Knight's collation of the text of the poems fails in two respects. In the first place, it fails through its incompleteness, altogether omitting (as it does) to notice a very large proportion of the alterations introduced by the poet into his text; and, secondly, it fails owing to the careless and imperfect fashion in which such alterations as have been recorded are entered in the foot-notes. With regard to the omissions, it must suffice to give a few examples of the more prominent ones, the subject being altogether too large for us to do more than just touch upon the fringe of it. Of the poems of volume ii., then, three are printed without anything whatever in the shape of a footnote being added, so that the reader inevitably concludes that in these instances, at least, the text has remained unaltered from the very first. But in truth, these three poems, "Ellen Irwin," "The Song of the Wandering Jew," and the poem beginning, "It is no Spirit who from Heaven hath flown," have each of them been subjected to extensive and repeated alterations; while "The Song of the Wandering Jew" in particular has been enlarged by the addition of some, and altered by the transposition of others, of its seven stanzas. Again, in the footnotes to the twenty-five stanzas (225 lines) of "Guilt and Sorrow" (vol. i.) which were published prior to 1842, there are seventeen omissions (not to speak of nine misprints and eleven wrong dates!); in the "Idiot Boy" (vol. i.) there are sixteen omissions, with one wrong date; in "The Thorn" (vol. i.) there are twelve omissions, one misprint, and one wrong date. In "Peter Bell" (vol. ii.) there are at least thirty-five omissions, together with three or four blunders of various kinds; nay, even in the footnotes to the "Remembrance of Collins," a short poem of three eight-line stanzas, Prof. Knight has contrived to make three omissions, together with an omission in the title and a misprint. Altogether, the omissions in vol. ii. amount to more than one hundred and ninety, to which must be added some five-and-forty errors of a miscellaneous character. So much for the omissions, pure and simple, in Prof. Knight's textual work. We must now briefly notice the inaccuracies and imperfections that detract so largely from the value of the partial collation made by him.

Among the various flaws which deface Prof. Knight's textual notes, the first we shall notice consists of a partially-quoted variation, abruptly curtailed in such wise as to leave now the sense, now the metre, halting and incomplete. An example will best illustrate our meaning. The fourth stanza of the address "To the Sons of Burns" opens thus:

"For honest men delight will take
To spare your feelings for his sake,
Will flatter you," &c.

This is the reading adopted in 1843. In the footnote sundry earlier versions are given, among the rest that found in the edition of 1820, as follows:

"For their beloved Poet's sake
Even honest men delight will take."

It is manifest that this quotation is incomplete; for if these two lines be substituted for the corresponding two adopted in 1843, the sense and the grammatical construction of the sentence will halt. The difficulty is very simply obviated by supplementing the version of 1820 as quoted by Prof. Knight, thus:

"For their beloved Poet's sake
Even honest men delight will take
To flatter you," &c.

The following examples may here be given of a similar unintentional curtailment of the variation. The omitted words, which are required for the due filling up of the hiatus, are here given in brackets:

1. "Let, with bold adventurous skill,
Others thrid the polar sea;
[Build a pyramid who will—]"—vol. ii., p. 274, note 3.

2. "In such a vessel [ne'er before] Did human creature leave the shore"—
vol. ii., p. 372, note 2.
3. "[. . . then did he cry]
 . . . most eagerly—"—vol. ii., p. 377, note 1.
4. "[James pointed to its summit . . .]
And told him that he there," &c.—vol. ii., pp 120-1, note 3.
5. "And with a wallet o'er my shoulder along,
A nutting-crook in hand, [I turned my steps—]"—vol. ii., p. 59, note 2.
6. "And there she sang tumultuous songs,
By recollection of her wrongs,
[To fearful passion roused—]"—vol. ii.,
p. 95, note 1.
7. " . . . for midway in the cliff
It had been caught, and there [for many years]"—vol. ii., p. 122, note 3.

The reader will notice that these examples are all taken, for convenience sake, from volume ii. of the Poetical Works; and this will naturally suggest to him the frequency with which this particular class of blunder occurs throughout Prof. Knight's volumes. It must, however, be observed that the inaccuracy and carelessness of the editor reach their highest point in vol. ii. Vols. iii. and iv., although by no means free from errors, nevertheless show a great improvement upon vols. i. and ii.; and the later volumes are still more exempt from faults of carelessness.

But, to proceed with our examination. The next blunder we shall notice is that which consists of printing in the footnote, instead of the variation meant to be given, the very reading exhibited in the text above! This, strange to say, is an occasional form of mistake in Prof. Knight's earlier volumes. The following examples must suffice:—

1. " . . . this glorious feat" ("act")—vol.
ii., p. 178, note 4.
2. "A slighted child . . ." ("the")—vol.
ii., p. 87, note 1.
3. " . . . for around that boisterous brook"
("beside")—vol. ii., p. 125, note 1.

Over and above these two classes of blunder, we find five or six instances where Prof. Knight has gone to the trouble of inventing a reading which has no existence in any of the numerous texts extant! Thus we find him printing the 32nd line of the first canto of "The White Doe of Rylstone" according to a purely imaginary version, thus:

"Look again, and they are all gone"— and appending thereto a footnote to the effect that this (imaginary) version was introduced into the edition of 1820, the original reading (1815) having been " . . . all are gone." In fact, the line has never been altered, and has always run thus:

"Look again, and they all are gone."

Such instances, however, are too few to be taken seriously into account. But a fruitful source of error exists in the rule observed by Prof. Knight of affixing the date in small-sized figures to every one of the various readings quoted in his footnotes. Whether they are editorial blunders or simply slips on the part of the printer which have escaped the eye of the proof-reader, it is impossible to say; but it is a fact that scores of these minutely printed

* It may, nevertheless, be as well to refer to the following two examples of a like purely imaginary variation. Line 21 of the poem entitled "Gipsies" runs as follows: "Regard not her—oh! better wrong and strife." Here Prof. Knight tells us that ed. 1827 exhibits the version: "Regard her not—oh! better," &c., whereas, in fact, ed. 1827 agrees with all the edd. Again, Prof. Knight gives "Within this nook the lonesome bird," as the version of line 14 of "The Danish Boy" given in ed. 1827, whereas this ed. agrees with edd. 1832 and 1836 in reading, "within this lonesome nook the bird," &c.

dates are at variance with the truth. In some few instances the circumstances strongly suggest that the error is simply due to the printer; but there are far too many others in which the suggestion is just the other way, and points unmistakably to the writer of the footnote. For example, the last line of the familiar sonnet entitled "Admonition" ("Well may'st thou halt—and gaze with brightening eye") ran originally as an Alexandrine, thus:

"On which it should be touch'd, would melt and melt away."

Prof. Knight's footnote informs us that the Alexandrine was altered to its present shape (an ordinary five-beat line) in 1827. This statement, however, is untrue. The Alexandrine is preserved unaltered in the edition of 1827, and reappears in the editions of 1832 and 1836-7 as well. It was not until Wordsworth was preparing his sonnets for publication in a separate volume that he saw fit to cut down the Alexandrine to a uniform length with the remaining lines of the sonnet. This volume appeared in 1838, which, accordingly, is the date that should properly stand in Prof. Knight's footnote, in lieu of 1827. The two dates are so very dissimilar in appearance that it is impossible to suppose that the occurrence of 1827 in the footnote is due to a misreading of the editor's MS. on the part of the printer. We are therefore left to infer that the said "1827" is simply the handiwork of that indolence and irresponsibility which, as we saw before, we have only too good reason to regard as the leading traits of Prof. Knight's editorial character.

In the foregoing observations we have not even touched upon one important shape occasionally taken by Prof. Knight's editorial misdoing: namely, a disregard of the duty of placing on record every instance of the insertion, excision, or transposition of an entire stanza. A signal example of this form of negligence occurs in vol. iii., where the "Ode to Duty" is printed according to the latest revised version of 1849-50, without a word being added in the footnotes regarding the remarkable stanza found in ed. 1807, but wanting in all the subsequent editions. Another instance of similar negligence will be found on page 318 of vol. ii., where the third stanza of the poem "To the Daisy," beginning, "Bright flower! whose home is everywhere," is given without any intimation that it was excluded from edd. 1827 and 1832. Again, on page 274 of the same volume, the stanza beginning, "Drawn by what peculiar spell," is duly printed in its rightful place as the sixth stanza of the second poem, "To the small Celandine," without ever a hint in the footnotes of any variation in the wording of lines 3-6, or of the transposition of the entire stanza from the first poem (in which it stood on its original appearance in 1836, and subsequently in 1843) to its present position in the second poem to which it was transferred in 1845. But perhaps the gravest of Prof. Knight's shortcomings in this kind are the omissions he has been guilty of in his footnotes to the poem of "Ruth." So excellent, indeed, is the illustration which his treatment of this poem affords of the characteristic flaws of his editorial work, that I will not offer any apology for running through his footnotes seriatim.

1. Stanza 1, ll. 3, 4.

"And Ruth, not seven years old,
A slighted child, at her own will." (1802.)
Here the footnote simply repeats the reading of the text overhead, instead of giving the following variation:

And so, not seven years old,
The slighted child. . . . (1800)

2. Stanza 2. Prof. Knight errs in saying "This stanza is not in edition of 1800." The stanza appears in every edition of the poem from 1800 onwards. On the other hand, stanza 3 is not in the edition of 1800—a fact which Prof. Knight omits to record.

3. Stanza 2, ll. 2, 3.

"And music from that pipe could draw Like sounds of wind and floods—"

This is the reading of ed. 1836, and all subsequent edd.; edd. 1800-1832 read:

"And from that oaten pipe could draw
All sound of winds," &c.— a variation which is ignored by Prof. Knight.

4. Stanza 5, ll. 2, 3.

"But no! he spake the English tongue,
And bore a soldier's name."

This is the reading of ed. 1836. Edd. 1800-1832 read, "Ah no!"; and edd. 1800, 1802 give "bare," instead of "bore," in line 2—both variations omitted by Prof. Knight.

5. Stanzas 10-11. We now come to a place in the poem which gave its author infinite trouble. Wordsworth's repeated handlings of this portion of the narrative, and his fluctuations between the various methods of relating it adopted by him at different times, form an admirable illustration of the extreme difficulty which he always experienced in telling a plain story. We proceed to quote Prof. Dowden's account of the textual changes:

"Between stanza 10 and stanza 11 appeared seven stanzas in 1802, of which four were new, and three were transposed; the three transposed stanzas being those now 22nd, 23rd, and 24th. Of the four stanzas which were new in 1802, two have been retained—now the 28th and 30th—and two were omitted in all editions after 1805. These omitted stanzas appeared respectively as first and last of the seven stanzas inserted in 1802 between the present stanza 10 and stanza 11; they are as follows: Stanza 11 of ed. 1402:

"Of march and ambush, siege and fight,
Then did he tell: and with delight
The heart of Ruth would ache;
Wild histories they were, and dear;
But 'twas a thing of heaven to hear
When of himself he spake."

"Stanza 17 of 1802:

"It is a purer better mind:
O Maiden innocent and kind
What sights I might have seen!
Even now upon my eyes they break!
And he again began to speak Of lands where he had been."

"The order of the seven inserted stanzas of 1802 was: (1) 'Of march,' &c., (2) 28, (3) 22, (4) 23, (5) 24, (6) 30, (7) 'It is a purer,' &c. When shifting st. 22, 23, 24, and changing them from narrative to dramatic, 'he' and 'his' became 'I' and 'my'; the other changes in these stanzas will be noted presently. We now come to the treatment, in 1805, of the insertion between st. 10 and st. 11. Stanzas 22, 23, 24 resumed the position which they occupied in 1800, and now occupy; a new stanza, now st. 29, was written; and the order in 1805, was (1) 'Of march,' &c., (2) 28, (3) 29, (4) 30, (5) 'It is a purer,' &c. In 1815, the inserted five stanzas of 1805 altogether disappear. In 1820, stanzas 28, 29, 30 reappear, and in their present position. Stanza 39 was added in 1802, so that in 1800 'Ruth' contained 38 stanzas; in 1802, 41; in 1805, 45; in 1815, 40; in edd. 1820-1849, 43 stanzas."

Will it be believed that of all this complicated shifting, introducing, cancelling, and restoring of stanzas Prof. Knight has not one word to say! He tells us indeed that st. 39 was not in ed. 1800; but there his information ceases: and when he says (p. 93, note) of the 28th, 29th and 30th stanzas, "this and the next two stanzas do not occur in edd. 1800 to 1815," he shows his absolute ignorance of the alterations and additions made in edd. 1802 and 1805. We are unwilling to characterise Prof. Knight's treatment of this portion of "Ruth," as it deserves to be characterised. We will, therefore, leave the reader to "put a name to it," as we say in Ireland, and proceed with our examination of the footnotes.

6. Stanza 15, l. 2 "Fond thoughts . . ."

This is the reading of edd. 1832-1849; edd. 1800-1827 read "Dear thoughts," a reading omitted by Prof. Knight.

7. Stanza 17, l. 2, "The wakeful Ruth. . ."

This is the reading of edd. 1820-1849; edd. 1800-

1815 read, "Sweet Ruth alone," a reading overlooked by Prof. Knight.

8. Stanza 23, line 1. "Nor less, to feed voluptuous thought." This is the reading of edd. 1805-1849. Ed. 1802 reads "unhallowed thought," overlooked by Prof. Knight.

9. Stanza 24. This entire stanza appears in ed. 1802 in a totally different shape from that it wears in edd. 1805-1849. Space does not admit of its being copied out in extenso. The version of 1802 is wholly omitted by Prof. Knight.

9. Stanza 25, line 1. "But ill he lived" (edd. 1805-1849). "Ill did he live" (ed. 1802 only: omitted by Prof. Knight).

10. Stanza 28, l. 5. "When I, in confidence and pride" (edd. 1805; 1843-1849). "When I, in thoughtlessness and pride" (ed. 1802); "When first, in confidence and pride" (edd. 1820-1836); the two latter readings are omitted by Prof. Knight.

10. Stanza 30. Prof. Knight gives two versions of this stanza, but he omits the version of ed. 1802—too long to quote here.

11. Stanza 33. In giving the ed. 1820 version of the latter half of this stanza Prof. Knight omits the last line, "To fearful passion roused," to the utter destruction of the sense of the passage.

12. Stanza 39, ll. 1, 2. Prof. Knight omits the following (ed. 1802) version of these lines:—

"The neighbours grieve for her, and say That she will, long before her day," &c.

So much for Prof. Knight's collation of the text of "Ruth." We must leave the reader to judge how far such a commentary is likely to assist him in gaining a clear notion of Wordsworth's mode of handling his text. This paper has already reached so great a length, that we cannot now do more than counsel him, as earnestly as we can, to betake himself, not to Prof. Knight's edition, but to Prof. Dowden's, if he wants to learn anything of the perplexing and intricate changes and transpositions to which so many of the poems have been subjected by their author. In Prof. Dowden's textual work, the lynx-eyed critic of the Athenaeum detected just one flaw; and, curiously enough, that flaw occurs in the notes to "Ruth." Prof. Dowden gives "she grew," in one place, where he should have given, "grew up"—not a very grave error, after all. More power to the critic for his vigilance in descrying the error—he must pardon the writer for indulging in another Hibernicism—and more power, too, to Prof. Dowden, whose work is able to withstand so successfully the fierce fire of an expert's criticism. What the present writer has written regarding the two recent annotated editions of Wordsworth he has written not to gratify any personal feeling towards either editor, but simply for the sake of the student and in the interest of English scholarship, wherein the maintenance of a high standard of accuracy must needs be a matter of deep concern to each and all alike.

In conclusion, whether Wordsworth was or was not an artist in words, I shall not take upon me to decide. Assuredly, he was not an artist in words, in the sense in which the late Poet Laureate may be said to have been one. In portraying his subject, Tennyson laid on layer after layer of colour, clothing it with a thousand rainbow hues to the frequent beclouding and obscuring of the outline. Wordsworth, on the other hand, employed a method the very reverse of that adopted by Tennyson. His desire was to present the reader of his poetry with "pure form nakedly displayed"; and to that end he worked with as few strokes and as little colour as possible, adding only such detail as was required for the due projecting of the object to be delineated. In a word, Wordsworth's method was largely classical, while Tennyson's was romantic. But, although Wordsworth's diction may seem to some readers occasionally cold, colourless, and jejune, the poet himself was undoubtedly a diligent student of words, in the largest sense of that term.

"I can say without vanity"—he once observed to the late Bishop of Lincoln—"that I have bestowed great pains on my style, full as much as any of my contemporaries have done on theirs. I yield to none in love for my art. I, therefore, labour at it with reverence, affection, and industry. My main endeavour, as to style, has been that my poems should be written in pure intelligible English. Lord Byron has spoken severely of my compositions; however faulty they may be, I do not think that I ever could have prevailed upon myself to print such lines as he has done; for instance—

'I stood at Venice on the Bridge of Sighs,
A palace and a prison on each hand.'

... Shelley is one of the best artists of us all—I mean in workmanship of style."

Readers of Prof. Knight's Life of Wordsworth will recollect how heartily the poet enters upon the discussion of various questions of style with his friend (Sir) W. R. Hamilton, how vehemently he protests against the unscrupulous liberties taken with the language by so many writers of verse, and how eagerly he insists that the logical faculty has infinitely more to do with poetry than the young and the inexperienced, whether writer or critic, ever dreams of. Again and again he impresses upon his correspondent that "style is, in poetry, of incalculable importance." And, indeed, there can be no doubt that, of the various exercises that have been devised from time to time for the attainment of a clear and compact poetic style, there is not one which more effectively combines enjoyment with instruction than that recommended (if we recollect aright) by the late Mr. J. R. Lowell—the deliberate disintegrating and taking asunder of one of the Sonnets, or a bit of the "Excursion" or of the "Prelude," with the object of gaining an accurate knowledge of the fashion in which Wordsworth builds up the stately edifice of his philosophic verse. In attaining this object, the study of the variations introduced by the poet into the successive editions of his works may frequently contribute valuable aid; and for this reason, no less than for the light which they often throw upon the character—the proclivities and the aversions—of their author, the study of them may be warmly recommended.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"RAPE AND RENNE" IN CHAUCER.

Cambridge: Sept. 4, 1893.

The phrase "rape and renne" in Chaucer's Canon's Yeoman's Tale, G. 1422, has never been satisfactorily explained. I attempted an explanation once on lines suggested by Mr. Wedgwood; but I now give it up. The passage is as follows:—

"Ye shul nat winne a myte on that chaffare,
But wasten al that ye may rape and renne."

Stratmann quotes the phrase s.v. rape, to hasten; and as the phrase stands, it seems to mean—"all that ye can hasten and run." If we mentally add "away with," we get a sort of sense, and, probably, the sense which Chaucer attached to it.

But, just as Chaucer uses "word and ende" for "ord and ende," he here uses a popular form of an older obsolescent phrase. "Rape and renne" will not do, because both are intransitive verbs; in the older phrase, both verbs were transitive, as is essential to the sense.

The older phrase is indicated in Atkinson's Cleveland Glossary, s.v. rap; but the clue is not fully worked out. It is preserved in the Trinity MS. of the Ancien Riwe, p. 128, where we find "repen and rinen" as a variant of "arepen and arechen"; see Arepen, Arechen, Arinen in the New English Dictionary. Repen is the A.S. hrepian, to handle; and rinen is A.S. hrinan, to touch, attain to; cf. raffen in Kluge. Hence, "repen and rinen" means "lay hands upon and catch hold of," or, briefly, "handle and touch." Substitute this phrase for Chaucer's "rape and renne," and the complete and exact sense appears. It so happens, by chance, that rape and repe are from the same root; this assisted the confusion. Still later, "rape and renne" became "rap and rende" (Palsgrave); or "rap and ran" (Ihre).

The form rinen, when little understood, easily passed into rinnen, the equivalent of rennen. Note that, in the Ancien Riwe, the whole phrase is given; foxes (we are told) draw into their holes "al thet heo muwen repen and rinen."

WALTER W. SKEAT.

JARVIS'S TRANSLATION OF "DON QUIXOTE."

Oxford: Aug. 30, 1893.

On October 8, 1892, a letter of mine appeared in the ACADEMY under the title of "The Pseudo-Smollett." In that letter I drew attention to the fact that the "Tobias Smollett," who was affirmed by certain publishers to be the translator of the "Adventures of Gil Blas," as issued by them, was not the Tobias Smollett known to the students of English literature, but a Mr. Benjamin Heath Malkin, whose purpose was "to produce a more easy and spirited transcript of the original" of Le Sage.

May I be allowed to draw attention to another book, issued by certain publishers, which purports to be the work of a man of letters of the eighteenth century, the friend of Pope and Warburton, but is really the product of some anonymous scribe of the Victorian age?

I have before me a copy of a book, recently published by George Routledge & Sons, which bears on its title-page the following announcement, "Adventures of Don Quixote de la Mancha, translated from the Spanish of Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra by Charles Jarvis." It forms No. 35 of the series they are issuing, entitled "Sir John Lubbock's Hundred Books." It is really the same book as the one brought out by the same publishers many years ago in their "Standard Library." Messrs. Routledge issued this same book in another form in 1885 in "Morley's Universal Library" (No. 24). That edition contains an Introduction by Prof. Henry Morley, with remarks on the translators of Don Quixote. He seems to be under the impression that he is editing the authentic work of Jarvis. At the Bodleian I have also seen copies of three editions of Don Quixote, issued by three distinct firms of London publishers, each purporting to contain the translation of Charles Jarvis, and each as a matter of fact containing a translation identical with that published by Routledge. The names of the publishers are as follow: Willoughby & Co., 1852, F. Warne & Co., 1866, and Ward, Lock & Co., 1880 ("carefully revised and corrected").

The fact is, that these modern editions of Don Quixote which bear the name of Charles Jarvis on the title-page do not give the public a translation which has any proper claim to that designation. This may be seen by comparing a specimen passage, taken from the original edition of "Jarvis's Don Quixote," published in London by J. & R. Tonson and R. Dodsley, MDCCXLII., with its equivalent as it appears in the Jarvis editions mentioned above. Let us take, for instance, the following passage from the Spanish, and see how the original has been rendered by the two Charles Jarvis's respectively:

"Dejamos al gran gobernador enojado y mohno con el labrador pintor y socarron, el cual industriado del mayordomo, y el mayordomo del Duque, se burlaban de Sancho; pero él se la tenía tieras á todos, magiera tonto, bronco y rollizo; y dijo á los que con él estaban y al doctor Pedro Rezio, que como se acabó el secreto de la carta del Duque habia vuelto á entrar en la sala: ahora verdaderamente que entiendo que los jueces y gobernadores deben de ser ó han de ser de bronco para no sentir las importunidades de los negociantes, que á todas horas y á todos tiempos quieren que los escuchen y despachen, atendiendo solo á su negocio, venga lo que viniere; y si el pobre del juez no los escucha y despacha, ó porque no puede, ó porque no es aquel el tiempo disputado para darles audiencia, luego le maldicen y murmuran, y le roen los huesos, y aun le deslindan los linajes." (Don Quijote, Parte II., cap. xlix.)

Charles Jarvis.

"We left the grand governor moody and out of humour at the knavish picture-drawing peasant, who, instructed by the steward, and he by the duke, played off Sancho; who, maugre his ignorance, rudeness, and insufficiency, held them all tack, and said to those about him, and to doctor Pedro Rezio, who, when the secret of the duke's letter was over, came back into the hall: I now plainly perceive, that judges and governors must or ought to be made of brass, if they would be insensible of the importunities of your men of business, who, being intent upon their own affairs alone, come what will of it, at all hours, and at all times, will needs be heard and dispatched; and if the poor judge does not hear and dispatch them, either because he cannot, or because it is not the proper time for giving them audience, presently they murmur and traduce him, gnawing his very bones, and calumniating him and his family" (vol. ii., p. 253).

The Routledge Jarvis.

"Never was the great governor more out of humour than when we left him, from the provocation he had received from the knave of a peasant, who was one of the steward's instruments for executing the duke's projects upon Sancho. Nevertheless, simple, rough, and round as he was, he held out toughly against them all; and, addressing himself to those about him, among others the Doctor Pedro Rezio (who had returned after the private despatch had been read). 'I now plainly perceive,' said he, 'that judges or governors must or ought to be made of brass, to endure the importunities of your men of business, who intent upon their own affairs alone, will take no denial, but must needs be heard at all hours and at all times; and if his poor lordship does not think fit to attend to them, either because he cannot or because it is not a time for business, then, forsooth, they murmur and peck at him, rake up the ashes of his grandfather, and gnaw the very flesh from their bones.'

If anyone will take the trouble to compare the two versions with the original, taking for this purpose any chapter indiscriminately, he will not be in much doubt, I fancy, as to which of the twain is the better, whether in regard to accuracy of rendering, or in regard to the character of the English style. The authentic Jarvis represents the Spanish closely and concisely, and writes respectable English of the early half of the eighteenth century. The "Jarvis" of the Victorian age supplies us with a version which has but little remaining of the praiseworthy characteristics of eighteenth century prose; and which is a somewhat loose rendering of the Spanish of Cervantes. But the comparative merit of the two versions is not the question. My purpose in sending you this note is to warn an unsuspecting public that the Don Quixote which is now issued by certain publishers as the translation of "Charles Jarvis" is a very different book from the "Jarvis's Don Quixote," which first appeared in 1742.

"SHOULD" AS SIGN OF THE PERFECT TENSE IN NARRATIVE.

Yattendon, Newbury: Aug. 26, 1893.

I beg to offer the subjoined remarks to your readers.

(1) Some years ago I found myself in company with a London tradesman, who narrated to me a long story which he had read in a book. I was surprised at his constantly using should for did in his narration. Instead of "Then he did so and so, and then he ran," he said, "Then he should do so, and then he should run." Also he asked me this question, "Did you ever hear, sir, what Bismarck should say, when he heard that the Crimean War was declared?" The idiom which puzzled me was evidently quite familiar to him; and it seemed to me that it differed from the simple past tense by containing a sort of appeal to the hearer's attention, or challenge of his surprise.

(2) Some one to whom I told this suggested that this should was precisely similar to its use in the common expression, "And then what should he do but . . ." or, "Whom should I see but so and so?" where it seems to have just this force.

(3) I have looked out for its occurrence in literature, and the following passage seems a genuine example. It is in Lord Herbert's Life of Henry VIII., 1649, pp. 110, 111:

"I find that the Duke of Buckingham . . . did under his own hand declare . . . the passages betwixt him and Hopkins in this manner: that is to say, that the summer before our king made warre in France, Hopkins sent for him . . . etc. . . . howbeit, that Hopkins said nought to him; yet that himselfe came the next Lent; where in shrift, the said Monke told him that . . . etc. . . . and that Hopkins demanding afterward, what children the king had had, he told the number; and that Hopkins should say thereupon, I pray God his issue continue, etc. . . . Also that (another time) he came to Hopkins . . . and that Hopkins asked who he was, and thereupon should say, that some of his blood or name should prove great men; and that after this Hopkins should send to the Duke, etc. . . .

(4) There is a narrative use of should to be distinguished from this, i.e., where it is used as we use would. This is frequent in Bunyan's Grace Abounding, e.g., "Also I should at these years be greatly afflicted," &c., i.e., I would be, or I used to be.

(5) There are cases where it is difficult to decide which of these two is intended. A passage in Young's translation of Montemayor's Diana (1598, p. 8) seems to belong to the former class. "She should then be musing on her solitary and sorrowful life" seems to mean—I wish you to understand that she was then, &c. The following from Sarah Fielding's translation of Xenophon's Memorabilia (p. 24) might be either:

"It being a thing well known among the people that Socrates should declare (that) his genius gave him frequent intimations of the future."

As I have met with no one acquainted with this idiom, I should be glad to appeal to your readers for an account of it. It would be a satisfactory explanation that it was a subjunctive mood introduced by the involved grammar consequent on a narration within a narration; but this seems not to cover the examples.

AN UNPUBLISHED BASQUE DICTIONARY.

Azpeitia: Aug. 31, 1893.

In the first volume of the Euskal-Erria, mention is made of a Basque Dictionary, by Aizpitarte, which has never been printed. Though Prof. Julien Vinson says nothing about it in his valuable Basque Bibliography—nor of the printed works in Guipuzcoa by the same author (including a History of Guipuzcoa), which were bought by Prince L.-L. Bonaparte from the publisher (Pablo Martinez, of Azpeitia) who is still living—yet the Dictionary has not been lost. The author's family gave it to the well-known Basque scholar, Father J. T. de Arana; and he, in his turn, presented it to the Convent of Loyola, where, by permission of the Rector, it was this afternoon brought down for my inspection by the Rev. Ramon Vinuesa.

The title, which is in a recent hand, runs thus:

"1785. Diccionario Bascongado con cerca de cuarenta mil voces, segun las dejó coleccionadas el año de 1785 su autor D. José María de Aizpitarte, socio de la ilustre Sociedad Bascongada de los Amigos del País. Es el original del autor que consta de 1632 paginas."

It is bound in white parchment. The words are classed according to their initial letters, but otherwise there is no alphabetical order. No authorities or localities are cited. The definitions, which are in Spanish, consist as a rule of one word only. In many cases the reader is merely referred by a véase to another Basque synonym. Many parts of the verb are parsed and translated—a great help when correctly done.

The Provincial Government, which has suppressed the chair of Basque in the Instituto de Guipuzcoa, might do worse than publish this book.

THE "QUARTERLY REVIEWER'S" KNOWLEDGE OF OLD FRENCH.

Oxford: Sept. 6, 1893.

In my footnote on the word pel, I strove to be very brief; I have ended by being obscure. I wrote:

"The Quarterly Reviewer actually quotes me as his authority for rendering 'pel' in this passage as a stake (i.e., a pointed stick used as a weapon)."

I should have written:

"The Quarterly Reviewer quotes me as being indirectly one (?) of his authorities for rendering pel in this passage as a stake, a word which here, according to his own interpretation of the passage, means a pointed stick used as a weapon. It is an honour to be quoted by the Quarterly Reviewer, but I really must disclaim the compliment on this occasion. I have no wish to rob him of any fraction of the glory that will result from his translation of 'Il ne doterent pel ne fosse.'"

"DRYTHE."

Nutfeld, Surrey.

I think the word "drythe" heard to-day on the lips of a Surrey peasant deserves recording. "Drythe in the trees" was the man's expression, and he referred to the dried-up condition of the foliage. Perhaps some of your readers could inform me if the word is in general use in any other part of England. It seems to me to fill a gap in our language, and it would be a pity to allow it to become obsolete.

C. L. PIRKIS.

SCIENCE.

TWO BOOKS ON CHEMISTRY.

On the Chemistry of the Blood and other Scientific Papers. By the late L. C. Wooldridge, M.D. Arranged by Victor Horsley and E. Starling. (Kegan Paul & Co.) This volume consists of two parts. In the first and more important of these, a number of physiological papers, reports, lectures, and notes are included; in the second part, half a dozen papers on pathological subjects are reprinted. A forcibly written introduction by one of the editors, Prof. Victor Horsley, deals mainly with the obscure problem—the cause of blood-coagulation—to which Dr. Wooldridge devoted his chief attention. The first point established by Dr. Wooldridge was this: coagulation of the fibrinogen in the plasma of the blood may occur without the intervention of any ferment. He then showed that one of the fibrinogens of the plasma was precipitable by mere cold, and that another would give a clot in the presence of carbon dioxide. Dr. Wooldridge next proceeded to prove that a combination or association of lecithin with a certain proteid possessed such a powerful clotting action that its injection into a vein caused instant coagulation of the living blood. He demonstrated that the lecithin present in this combination was not endowed by itself with this remarkable property. Dr. Wooldridge's final conclusion as to clotting was that it is caused in two ways: one of them being the action of a fibrin-ferment upon a fluid fibrinogen, the second being the interaction of two fluid fibrinogens, one of these differing from the other in chemical composition and containing lecithin. This is not the place for a discussion of the value of Dr. Wooldridge's experiments and of the conclusions which he drew from them. But it is permissible to express our satisfaction with the way in which they have been presented, or re-presented, to the scientific world in the volume so ably edited by Prof. Victor Horsley. Had it not been for the action of this very competent critic, the Croonian Lecture delivered by Dr. Wooldridge before the Royal Society at the invitation of its council would have remained buried in the archives of that body, not for seven years only, but in perpetuity. Until the publication of the volume before us no adequate account of Dr. Wooldridge's researches was generally accessible. And we look in vain to recent text-books for information as to his work, which is dismissed in a few words by Dr. Sheridan Lea in his Chemical Basis of the Human Body (1892), and is not fairly represented by the few lines of small type given to it in Dr. Halliburton's Text-book of Chemical Physiology (1891).

A Dictionary of Applied Chemistry. By T. E. Thorpe. Vol. III. (Longmans.) This portly volume of more than 1000 pages completes a very important work on Chemical Technology. It is so excellent that we regret that there is not more of it. No fewer than forty-four chemists have contributed special articles to the volume before us. The majority of these articles attain the highest degree of excellence compatible with the limits to which it has been necessary to restrict them. We may select for special praise the accounts—of fixed oils and fats, petroleum, photography, potassium-salts, silver, sodium, specific gravity, spectrum analysis, starch, sugar, sulphur, sulphuric acid, thermostats, triphenylmethane colouring matters, and water. Most of these articles are fully illustrated with figures of apparatus. Many other contributions to this dictionary, even when they occupy a comparatively small space, are just as good, in their own way, as the important articles just enumerated. We do not, however, think that equal justice has been done to all the chief subjects discussed in this volume. Thus, the article on varnish occupies but three pages, gives but one datum as to temperature, and is not illustrated by a single figure of apparatus. It is wholly inadequate and quite out of date. The two articles on paints and pigments ought not to have been admitted at all. These papers overlap and are in some points mutually inconsistent. Thus, on page 100 we are told that "madder brown is of vegetable origin and liable to fade," while on page 243 the same pigment is praised as "very permanent." Several compounds are named which have never been employed as pigments; such are Thallium yellow, Palladium yellow, and Platinum yellow! Most of the paragraphs on pages 240 to 244 are simply transferred, after slight condensation, from a small and well-known handbook issued by a firm of artists' colourmen. The information they contain—if information it can be called—is of the most meagre kind, and is in some cases decidedly incorrect. It is not worth while to submit these pages to detailed criticism; let it suffice to draw attention to these statements:—

"Chrome greens are compounds of chrome yellow and Prussian blue"; "zinc white is either the anhydrous oxide, the hydrated oxide, or the hydrated basic carbonate of zinc"; "what is now sold under the name of Naples yellow is a compound pigment, perfectly durable and trustworthy"; "sepia consists of a mass of extremely minute carbonaceous particles mixed with an animal gelatine."

Now chrome greens are not compounds, but mixtures; zinc white is the simple oxide of the metal; most of the Naples yellow now sold is a mixture of cadmium sulphide with white; while sepia owes its colour to a definite organic acid (sepiaic acid), and is not finely divided carbon. This article on Pigments closes with some bibliographical notes. Oddly enough, of the dozen books mentioned, only four describe pigments, the remainder being devoted to the physiology of colour and its artistic aspects. The title of the only valuable treatise on pigments included in the list is given under the name of its editor, not under those of its joint authors; no such writer as "A. H. Chevreul" is known (the Christian names of the great chemist Chevreul were Michel Eugène); and the inquirer is referred to a small book on pigments, which is distinguished only by the number and absurdity of the chemical errors which it contains. We are sorry to be obliged to speak so strongly concerning one of the contributions to a work which, as a whole, must take, as it deserves, a very high place in modern chemical literature. At all events, the demerits of the contribution in question may serve, by way of contrast, still further to accentuate the many excellences for which this Dictionary of Applied Chemistry is conspicuous.

THE BUDDHIST TEXT SOCIETY OF INDIA.

WE condense from Part II. of the Journal of the Buddhist Text Society of India (London: Kegan Paul & Co.) the following report of a speech delivered by Sri Sarat Chandra Das at the first general meeting of the society:

"During my residence in Tibet in the years 1879, 1881, and 1882, I had the honour of being the guest of the chief spiritual minister and tutor of the Grand Lama of Tashi-lhunpo. It was at his invitation that I visited Tibet. The principal objects of my journey were: (1) To investigate the literature of Tibet, both sacred and secular; and (2) to explore the unknown parts of the country hitherto considered as terra incognita by geographers.

"The country lying on the north of the Himalayas, east of Ladak and west of the province of Tsan—including Lake Manasarovara, the Kailas mountains (the glaciers of which form the head-waters of the Indus, the Sutlej, and the Brahmaputra or Tsangpo), and the great lake called Nam-tsho or Tengri Nor—were explored by the late Pandit Nain Singh. The country known as Northern Tibet, including Amdo—situated to the south of the great desert of Kobi, and north of Lake Tengri Nor—was explored by the late General Prejevalsky. Eastern Tibet, including Kham and Bathang, and extending to the confines of China, was first explored by Pandit Krishna Singh, and lately by Mr. Rockhill, secretary to the American Legation at Peking. But although these eminent persons had explored the outlying provinces of the country, and made considerable additions to geography, yet Tibet proper, containing the great provinces of U'Tsan and Lhobra, remained yet unexplored. In the course of my travels, I explored the first, together with that most interesting lake called Yamdo or Palti, in a scientific manner. My companion and friend, Lama Ugyan Gya-tsho, explored the province of Lhobra six months after my return from Tibet.

"In these two kinds of investigation, I have experienced immense difficulties. It is comparatively easy to explore new countries, unknown rivers and mountains; but to make researches into the language, literature, and religion of a country like Tibet is not an easy affair. The language of Tibet is entirely foreign to us, having nothing in common with Sanskrit. Its pronunciation, like that of Chinese, is most difficult. The form of Buddhism prevalent in Tibet is little known to the learned world.

"The minister possessed the largest collection of Sanskrit and Tibetan works of all kinds of any private gentleman in U'Tsan, though inferior to the principal university libraries of the country. Finding me bent on study, he accommodated me in a corner of his spacious library. Thus I was able to learn the contents of his rich collection. The state library of Tashi-lhunpo, located in the Grand Lama's residence, is one of the largest in Tibet. But as no one was allowed to enter the sanctum except for the purpose of paying reverence to the Grand Lama, I did not venture to visit his library. But I did visit the ancient libraries of Sakya, Sam-ye, and Lhasa, which are filled with original Sanskrit works brought from India. The library of Sakya is a lofty, four-storeyed, stone building of great size, erected about the middle of the twelfth century. It was there that the monumental work of Kshemendra, called Kalpatala, was translated into Tibetan verse by order of Phagpa, the grand hierarch who converted the Emperor Khublai to Buddhism. I visited the great monastery of Sam-ye, which was built in the beginning of the eighth century, after the model of the Odanta Puri Vihara in Magadha. The library, when I saw it, contained comparatively few books. But I was told that the largest collection of Sanskrit books in Tibet existed here down to eighty years ago, when the library was destroyed by an accidental fire. The library of the Dalai Lama at Lhasa is now considered the largest of all. It was there that I obtained Kshemendra's Kalpatala.

"The Tibetans derived their alphabet as well as their literature from India. The form of Nagari used in Magadha during the seventh and eighth centuries A.D. bears a striking resemblance to the Tibetan alphabet. Nagari has undergone considerable changes; but the Tibetan characters have remained fixed from the time of their introduction until now, owing to the use of the stereotype block in printing since the beginning of the ninth century. In India, printing was unknown until the arrival of the English: hence the various phases noticeable in Nagari.

"Two forms of character, differing very slightly from each other, have been in use in Tibet: one is called the U-chan (that is, with the head-line or matra); and the other U-me (without the head-line). The latter form is used in business, correspondence, &c.; the former in printing and in preparing MSS. for books. It is very curious that running hand, which is an outcome of the U-me, has not undergone much change in course of time.

"The Tibetans translated all the Sanskrit works they could obtain from India and Nepal into their own language, and thereby enriched it. Upon these they founded their own literature, which, as translated works increased, grew richer and more comprehensive. During the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, when Buddhism became extinct in India, the literary activity of the Tibetans received a fresh impulse from the Chinese, under the dynasties of the great Khan and the Ming Emperors. During this period, Chinese Buddhist works were largely translated into Tibetan. In this manner the capability of the language to express foreign terms and ideas became enlarged, and its literature abundant. The Tibetans borrowed from China what they had not been able to obtain from India.

"The wise policy of getting every foreign book translated into Tibetan, first initiated by King Srong-tsan in the beginning of the seventh century, was followed by his successors down to Ralpa-chan, and also by the successive Lamaic hierarchies which ruled over Tibet. With the translation of the works of the Indian saints, their spirits also had been transferred into the country of Himavat; hence we now find so many incarnations of Indian Pandits at the head of the great monasteries. It is a noteworthy fact that in the chief Lamasaras, biographies of many illustrious Indian Buddhists may be found stereotyped on wooden blocks. The Tibetans are very fond of recording the events connected with their lives. In the grand monasteries presided over by incarnate or erudite Lamas, the duty of writing the diary about the Superior (Lama) is entrusted to a learned monk. After the death of the Lama, his biography is compiled from this diary. It is owing to this that printed biographies of the Lamas of the chief monasteries can be had in the bookstalls of every market in Tibet.

"It is mentioned in the historical and legendary books of Tibet that most of the Lamas, who now appear there as incarnate beings, formerly belonged to India, and particularly to Bengal. The Dalai Lama, the supreme hierarch and sovereign ruler of Tibet, appeared in his previous existence—first, as the son of the King of Bengal, and then twice as his lineal descendant, distinguished for charity and self-abnegation. The Tashi Lama, in his two previous births, is said to have appeared in Bengal as the sage Acharya Abharyakara Gupta and as Sumatikirti. Owing to this, the name of Bengal is revered all over Tibet and Mongolia, where the Lamas connect it with the respectful expression, sriyukta = possessed of noble virtues. During the reign of the Pala dynasty, which extended over three centuries, Bengal rose to eminence both in learning and in military achievements. We are told by a Tibetan historian of the eleventh century, whose work was stereotyped on wooden blocks about 1053 A.D., that King Deva Pala, who ruled at Gaur, annexed Magadha and Varendra to his dominions, with the help of troops drawn from Bengal. The Bengalis of that time were distinguished for their learning, bravery, and high character. They had many virtues, which their descendants have not inherited. In Tibet, the name of a Bengali Acharya is never written without the expression D Pal-Phuntsun Tahog, meaning noble and possessed of perfections. The higher class Tibetans of the interior and the great Lamas do not yet know that Bengalis address one another by the title of Babu, which is a Mahomedan word meaning an "idle, rich man." The common people believe that those Bengalis who are called Babus are, in fact, Mahomedans. According to the Tibetan historians, it was the Mahomedans who destroyed Buddhism in India."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

PROF. DOBIE, of Edinburgh, is engaged on a critical edition of the Ethiopic Version of IV. Ezra, founded in the main on the hitherto uncollected Paris MS. The deficiencies of this MS. will be made good through a critical use of the Frankfort, Berlin, and British Museum MSS. Of the British Museum MSS. ten will now be used for the first time. Prof. Dillmann has promised to contribute readings from the MSS. of M. d'Abbadie towards this edition. Mr. Dobie will take account of the Latin, Arabic, and Syriac Versions in the reconstruction of the text.

THE Rev. J. Hamlyn Hill, of St. Catherine's College, Cambridge, has made a complete translation into English of Tatian's Diatessaron. He has made it, in the first place, from Ciasca's Latin version, and then the result has been compared word for word with the Arabic. The extracts found in Ephraem's Commentary have also been translated by Mr. Hill from Dr. Moesinger's Latin; and Prof. Armitage Robinson is now at Venice correcting this translation by means of the Armenian MSS. there. But, as the work is intended to be read by others besides experts, it is to be preceded by an introduction, which will describe the MSS. and their history, tell us what is known of Tatian himself and his commentators, and estimate the value of the work in the criticism and exegesis of the Gospels, and in establishing their early date; and it is to be followed by a series of Appendices. The work will be published by Messrs. T. & T. Clark in the autumn, in a binding uniform with the "Ante-Nicene Library."

THE last work of that hardworking and ingenious student, the late Mr. George Bertin—one of the very few, outside universities and museums, who have devoted themselves to the unremunerative pursuit of Assyriology—is printed in the new volume of the Transactions of the Royal Historical Society. It is a paper which he read before that society about a year before his death; and it has been seen through the press—cuneiform characters and all—by his two sisters, who were accustomed to assist him in his literary undertakings. The subject is, "Babylonian Chronology and History," restored mainly from the dynastic tablets in the British Museum. The result is to confirm, to a large extent, the statements of Berosus, whose accuracy has also been supported by the researches of Prof. Sayce. At the end is a list of all the several dynasties that ruled in Babylonia from mythical times down to the Seleucidae. Wherever possible, dates and the duration of reigns are given, and the names of the monarchs both in cuneiform characters and transliterated. Work of this kind must always be tentative, in view of the continual discovery of new sources of information, such as those recently brought back by the American expedition to Babylonia. But this consideration affects only to a slight extent the permanent value of Mr. Bertin's labours. We may add that the Misses Bertin have had a few copies of the paper specially struck off, which they will be glad to send to scholars interested in the subject, who may address them at 29, Wilkes-road, N.W.

FINE ART.

ENGRAVINGS and DRAWINGS by OLD MASTERS.—Messrs. DEPREZ & GUTEKUNT have always on hand a selection of WORKS by the best Masters. Collections arranged, valued, and purchased. Prints and Drawings mounted and framed.—18, Green Street, Charing Cross Road, W.C.

On the Tumuli and Inscribed Stones at New Grange, Dowth, and Knowth. By George Coffey. (Dublin: Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, Vol. XXX., Part 1.)

NEW GRANGE, Dowth, and Knowth are the most conspicuous of a number of prehistoric sepulchral mounds, situated on the north bank of the river Boyne, about six miles above Drogheda. The largest and best known of them is the tumulus at New Grange. It is typical of its class, and it has, at the same time, some special features of remarkable interest. It consists of a vast heap of stones, now so overgrown with trees and bushes that it looks like a wooded knoll. The heap is contained within a circular wall or curb of huge stones, 8 to 10 ft. long; these are laid on edge, and touch each other end to end. The height of the mound is 44 ft., the diameter 280 ft. Round the whole, at a little distance, ran a circle of standing stones, of which twelve now remain. At the south-eastern side of the mound is an opening, leading to a passage formed of flat, upright stones, roofed with huge flags, and large enough to give easy access to the interior. The passage is 62 feet long, and ends in a chamber nearly 20 feet high with three recesses, giving it a cruciform shape. In each of these recesses is a great stone basin, intended, it may be supposed, for the reception of sepulchral urns.

From the Four Masters we learn that this mound, like the others in the neighbourhood, was entered and plundered by the Danes in the ninth century. The discovery of the entrance in modern times was made by a Mr. Charles Campbell, towards the close of the seventeenth century. Shortly afterwards, in 1699, it was visited by Mr. Edward Llwyd, Keeper of the Ashmolean Museum, who wrote a full account of what he saw, and of what was said to have been found, to the Royal Society. The Danes left nothing for the modern antiquary except a few bones, but Mr. Llwyd notes one feature of interest which has since disappeared: besides the circle of standing stones running round the "stately mount," as he calls it, there was a single one on the top. A later visitor, Molyneux (1725), noticed "a slender quarry stone, five or six feet long," lying on the floor in the central chamber, and conjectures that it had once stood upright there. This also has disappeared.

The main interest of the tumulus, however, lies in a feature not so easily removable—in the sculptures, namely, with which many of the great stones in the interior, and at the entrance, and even in the bounding wall, are decorated. In these sculptures we see the dawn of that sense of decorative art in which the Irish were afterwards to attain so eminent a mastery. Within the limits of this single monument we see the first rude tentative endeavour, which consisted in diversifying the surface by any kind of scrawled line, or even by roughly picking off the smooth, weathered skin of the stone. We can see these aimless lines take form as distinct figures. At a further stage these figures are repeated and co-ordinated in a design—a design placed at haphazard on the stone as a child might scribble it on a sheet of paper. Finally—though still with the imperfection due to rude tools and unaccustomed hands—the whole of a given surface is treated uniformly with a decorative motive, well considered with relation to the ground it was intended to cover and the position the stone was to occupy.

Formerly it was thought that every line and figure of these carvings had a mystical or symbolic meaning, and that we had before us here the hieroglyphs of a pagan cult. Comparative archaeology has taught us better; and the surmises which Mr. Coffey permits himself are very chastened and sober compared with the daring imaginations of Vallancy, or even of Sir William Wilde or Swen Nilsson. Yet there are features connected with this group of monuments which have clearly another than a purely artistic or a purely utilitarian significance. The pillar-stone found by Llwyd on top of the tumulus at New Grange, the similar stone seen by Molyneux lying within the central chamber, the carving on one of the stones of the west recess, which Mr. Coffey suggests may be a bit of herring-bone pattern, but which on a Phoenician coin or in a Phoenician temple would without hesitation be taken for a palm branch, and the sun-figure in Dowth—a circle surrounded by rays: all these indications point to a field of exploration from which we are not to be warned off because Vallancy and others lost their way in it.

In this fine quarto volume of the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, Mr. George Coffey has given a full, true, and scholarly account of the tumuli of Dowth and New Grange, illustrated by plans, sections, and maps, and by a series of excellent photographs taken by magnesium light in the interior of the tumuli. Little, if any, of the ornament has been left unillustrated, much that was new has been brought to light, and some disputed points have been finally set at rest. But upon one carving in New Grange, long a subject of discussion and conjecture, the new light thrown by Mr. Coffey has had the singular effect of making it more of a mystery than ever. Once regarded—and even translated—as a Phoenician inscription, Mr. Coffey clearly shows it to be simply a tracing of a ship with figures in it, such as are found in great numbers on sculptured stones of Scandinavian workmanship. Elsewhere in Ireland, however, they are not found, for Irish art from the earliest times was decorative, not imitative. Nor, if an Irish prehistoric artist had set himself to draw a ship, is it easy to see why he should have hit upon just the Scandinavian formula for that object; for a formula it is, much more than a representation. Was it scrawled upon the walls by one of the marauding Danes who entered the tumulus in the ninth century? This is hardly possible; the position of the carving makes it almost certain that it was executed, like the rest of the decoration, before the stones were placed in their present position. It remains for the present an artistic ἀναξ λεγόμενον, so far as Irish art is concerned.

There is another disputed question with which Mr. Coffey has been able to deal more conclusively. Are the sepulchral mounds about New Grange to be identified with the famous cemetery of the Irish Kings, known from the earliest times and widely celebrated in legend and history as "Brugh na Boinne?" The case against this identification was strongly held and urged by O'Donovan and Sir Samuel Ferguson; but, by the production of some new MS. evidence, Mr. Coffey has established beyond a doubt that these eminent antiquaries were wrong. Henceforth the vast cairn with its rude sculptures is to be identified with the famous Brugh—

"By the dark-rolling waters of the Boyne, Where Angus Óg magnificently dwells."

As a monograph upon an ancient monument Mr. Coffey's work is a credit to Irish antiquarianism, and the Royal Irish Academy was well advised to produce it with all the completeness of pictorial illustration which the subject requires. In all Europe there is probably no more interesting monument of the early bronze age than the tumulus at New Grange, and the foreign archaeologist has now for the first time the means of fully studying it without the necessity of making a journey to see it. And we may say the same of Mr. Coffey's treatment of the mound at Dowth. That of Knowth is not known to have been opened since it was plundered by the Danes a thousand years ago. We may echo Mr. Coffey's hope that nothing will be done in this direction without competent supervision. One regrets to observe that the tumulus of New Grange, after being used for many generations as a quarrying place for road-metal, has been seriously tampered with in recent times, apparently to satisfy some official idea of improvement. The original pavement of the passage and chamber has been shovelled out and thrown into a pit at the entrance; one of the stone basins, which was found standing within another in one of the recesses, has been removed and placed in what was considered a more symmetrical position; and parts of the walls here and at Dowth have been refaced with masonry. The guardians of ancient monuments, if not trained archaeologists, are clearly capable of doing as much mischief as the profanum vulgus, road-mender, and the like, whose depredations they are appointed to check.

THE BRISTOL INDUSTRIAL AND FINE ART EXHIBITION.

I.

THE JENNER COLLECTION OF RELICS.

It is just seventy years since Dr. Edward Jenner, the discoverer of vaccination, died at Berkeley, in Gloucestershire, where he was born, and where he passed nearly all the seventy-four years of his benevolent life. It was hard by, at Sodbury, that his attention was first drawn to the fact that milk-maids who had had cowpox were inaccessible to attacks of smallpox, and where the idea of transmitting the vaccine lymph from one human being to another first took shape in his brain, with what results we know. Now for the first time, the relics, personal and literary, of his life and labours, which have been treasured and handed down as heirlooms in his family until they have come into the possession of Mr. Frederick Mockler, of Wotton-under-Edge, are submitted to public inspection. Their perfect state of preservation, and their intrinsic interest, render them worthy of more than local or passing notice. It would be well if they could be acquired by the Royal College of Surgeons—the intimate and lifelong connexion between the famous John Hunter and his still more famous pupil and friend indicating that as their most appropriate and permanent home.

The leading features of the collection are richly framed oil paintings of Thomas Jenner (grandfather of Edward), president of Magdalen College, Oxford, Elizabeth, his sister, Mary and Elizabeth, his nieces, and the Rev. Stephen Jenner, father of Edward—these are Kitcats, and half-lengths of the Kneller style and period; then one of Edward himself—it looks like a Hoppner; another, an engraved portrait of Edward, after Hobday, commenced by William Sharp, and probably the last he did. Other engraved portraits are—by W. Say, after J. Northcote, a fine, spirited mezzotint; by W. H. Mote, after Sir Thomas Lawrence, in which the honest doctor's bourgeois appearance is considerably refined. There is a case of some half-dozen ivory miniatures of Edward and members of his family, and some delicate drawings of the various stages of development and subsidence of the effects of vaccination; notably, the first case of cow-pock which Jenner observed is delineated by E. Pearce from the hand of the historic milkmaid. A few water-colour caricatures by Edward's nephew. There is a small glass case containing an antique silver cup, and other personal mementoes. In oak frames under glass are his diplomas, notably those granted by Cambridge (U.S.) and Guy's Hospital; these and all other the numerous testimonials, addresses, presentations of freedoms of cities—London and Dublin, to wit—either framed or bound in covers. Then there are his visiting books, with their significant entries—one of a visit to the Duke of Clarence, afterwards William IV., dated 1794—and prescriptions. Then we have a draft of his will, in his firm, clear, elegant hand. Several volumes of his correspondence and drafts of letters—one to a friend, telling him of the grant just made him by the House of Commons (1807) of £20,000. There are also the MSS. and first editions of his works, which, with other documents, and a host of controversial pamphlets, are separately bound and lettered. It is rare, indeed, to find a collection so complete and so unique as this. There is reason to suppose that much of the material here would serve to amplify the biography compiled by his friend, Dr. Baron, of Gloucester, the two octavo volumes of which are included. Whether we consider the greatness of the benefit conferred by this then obscure country practitioner upon all future generations of mankind, the pure and disinterested benevolence of the man who wrought this inestimable discovery, his retiring disposition, his simplicity of character—he sought as he said, "the calm, sequestered path of life, the valley, not the mountain"—the reflection is forced upon us that the tokens and evidence of his career should be placed where they can best be seen as in a shrine, in the metropolis of that country among whose noblest sons he is worthy to rank.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THIS winter's exhibition of the Arts and Crafts Society will be held in the New Gallery, Regent-street, during the months of October and November. It will consist of contemporary original work in decorative design and handicraft, such as—designs, cartoons, and working drawings, decorative painting, textiles and needlework, glass, pottery, metal work, carving and modelling, plaster work, cabinet work, book decoration, printing and binding, wall papers, leather work, &c. Inventions or mechanical contrivances are not, as such, admissible. The exhibition is not confined to members of the society.

THE results of Mr. Theodore Bent's visit to Aksum, in Abyssinia, last spring will be published by Messrs. Longman & Co., under the title of The Sacred City of the Ethiopians. The book gives a full account of the monolithic monuments and other archaeological remains, which were the special object of the journey; and also a translation, by Prof. D. H. Müller of Vienna, of the Sabæan inscriptions, which attest the presence of Arabian colonists in the interior of Ethiopia as early as the eighth century B.C.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. announce a book on Greek Dress, by Maria Millington Evans, with illustrations.

MR. GEORGE WADE has been selected to execute the colossal memorial of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, premier of Canada, which is to be erected at Montreal.

WE quote the following letter of Mr. R. M. W. Swan from the September number of the Geographical Journal:

"I have examined two ruined temples of the Zimbabwe period and style, situated at the confluence of the Lotsani and Limpopo rivers, in S. lat. 20° 39' 42", E. long. 28° 16' 30". The temples show the same system of orientation and geometrical construction as the great temple at Zimbabwe. I cleared the bush from the more perfect of the two, and made a careful measurement of the radii of the one curve of which it consists. I oriented directly from the centre of the curve, and saw the sun from that point setting just to the left of the middle of the main doorway. On correcting the position of the sun for its decrease in declination during the seventeen days which had elapsed since the solstice, I found that it would set at the solstice exactly in a line with the centre of the arc and the middle of the doorway. This direct measurement and observation should remove any doubt as to the applicability of our theory of the construction of the plans of these temples."

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Masters of English Music. By Charles Willeby. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.) "The aim of this series," says our author, "is to place on record the chief facts and incidents in the careers of the greatest living composers." Among English musicians, Sullivan, Mackenzie, Cowen, Parry, and Stanford no doubt hold the foremost place; but the peculiar adventure of Sir Arthur in the wilds of California, the practical and, we may add, musical jokes of Mr. F. Cowen in Sweden, and such-like stories, however amusing, scarcely deserve to rank among "chief facts and incidents." Of Sir Arthur, Mr. Willeby justly says "his name is a household word." He emphasises the brilliancy of his career; but brilliancy does not, of necessity, imply greatness. The immense popularity of Sir A. Sullivan has, perhaps, really been an obstacle to the full manifestation of his genius. Our author tells us that Sir Arthur "is able at any moment to call on his creative genius, be it on behalf of song or symphony." In the next paragraph, however, we learn that he has only called once on his genius for a symphony. The "In Memoriam" overture, one of his best works, seems to have specially pleased Mr. Willeby, in that it brought to his memory the scene of a funeral in a little Italian village. In this case the music certainly deserves praise; but, as a rule, it would be unfair to like or dislike according to memories of the past which a piece—perhaps, by the merest chance—might recall. Our author is perfectly justified in praising Sir Arthur as a conductor, for when thoroughly in earnest, he is one of the best; but his allusion to a great German conductor is as silly as it is spiteful. Of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie he narrates his early struggles, and tells of his indefatigable energy and independence of character. We quite agree with him, when, in connexion with the "Rose of Sharon" he says: "It is as a successful example of the blending of modern thought with classic form that it is most keenly interesting." His remarks, too, about the operas "Columba" and "The Troubadour" are sound. The story of Liszt's coming to London to attend a performance of his own oratorio, "S. Elizabeth," is related, and how, on the night of performance, the composer fell asleep in his stall. But why speak with pity of him as "the poor old man"; on that night Liszt was to be envied.

Mr. Willeby mentions Dr. Mackenzie's difficulties at the Royal Academy when he first took office; but the composer fought against opposition, and fought successfully, and the associated board for examinations came into existence. The artistic career of Mr. F. H. Cowen is described from his earliest years; for already at the age of eight he had composed an operetta, entitled "Garibaldi." In mentioning "Ruth" our author gives us in brief his ideas with regard to oratorio. "To our own thinking, oratorio, when it leaves the epic for the dramatic, becomes a bastard creation. It is neither drama nor oratorio, for surely the essence of oratorio should be devotion?" It is fortunate that his remarks are brief, for we do not think that he could have preached a very clear sermon from such a text. Mr. Cowen comes in for a just share of praise as a conductor. The advantage of such a prodigious memory as he possesses is pointed out, yet a similar gift in the case of the German conductor mentioned above was animadverted upon with something like scorn.

Drs. Hubert Parry and Charles Villiers Stanford occupy but a small portion of the volume. Mr. Willeby is hard on Dr. Parry for allowing the "programme" of his Symphony in G to be printed; but, after all, this caused but little, if any harm. If the composer had asserted that it was necessary for a proper understanding and enjoyment of the music, the case would be different. Our author, however, recognises the excellence of the music. He also tells us that he almost believes that Dr. Parry has "true dramatic genius." The composer, it is to be hoped, will one day confirm that statement. We believe, indeed, that Dr. Parry, with a libretto to his taste, would achieve something exceedingly good. The first few pages concerning Dr. Stanford are ominous. The fact that Brahms is Dr. Stanford's "idol" sets Mr. Willeby's back up. Our author is free, of course, to like or dislike Brahms; but to sneer at a composer who holds such a testimonial as the one which Brahms received from Schumann, and whose merits have been acknowledged by so many eminent musicians, is a sign of foolishness. The reputation of the "great Johannes" will not suffer from Mr. Willeby's fly stings.

LITERATURE.

Pastime Papers. By Henry Edward, Cardinal Manning. (Burns & Oates.)

It is probable that this little book has come as a surprise to many. Those who had not the honour and joy of intimacy with the late cardinal have been wont to see in him, his life and his work and his writings, something stiff and stern, a dogmatic severity, a lack of generous ease and sympathy and lightness. He stands in their memories, vested with the robes and ornaments of sacerdotal and episcopal authority: gaunt, austere, commanding, not quite human; priest and prelate, and prince, infinitely dignified, but aloof from the world in his asceticism. They knew him to be cultured, a true son of academic Oxford, courtly and urbane, yet he had an air of exclusiveness and reserve, which only his piety saved from seeming proud: a combination of St. Thomas à Becket and St. Charles Borromeo. It is an impression which Mr. Hutton's careful biography does not do much to modify. Throughout that work Manning is a dictatorial dogmatist, delighting in rule and discipline, law and order, sentence and decree: not pleasantly pliant and malleable, not graciously flexible and versatile, but rigid and hard and grim. Compare, they will say, Manning's Petri Privilegium with Newman's Letter to the Duke of Norfolk: see how magisterial is the one, how persuasive the other. This imagined Manning never unbends, never relaxes: a man to revere rather than to love.

But turn to Manning's friends: study the Manning of the Metaphysical Society, as drawn in Mr. Wilfrid Ward's Life of Dr. Ward, or the Manning of this book. He was far from worldly, in the most innocent sense of the word: far less so than the secluded Newman. No man was ever wittier than Manning's brother-in-law, Bishop Wilberforce: no man less humorous. Manning had no wit, but a vast deal of humour. And it was his peculiar genius that, while he noted the way of the world with ready observation and dexterous look, marking its amusements, follies, sins, together with all that is great and good in it, he never laid aside his religious character, because in that was his life. Upon various sides of his nature he resembled both his friends, Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone: he was both subtle and sincere. Of late years he became more widely understood, through his attitude towards social questions. It was seen that, like the reigning Pope, his ascetic detachment from the world did not imply either lack of knowledge or lack of heart. Yet even so, the epigrammatic summaries of Manning's character pronounced him a man of imperious will and rigid temper: the "proud prelate," dear to melodramatic historians, just softened and subdued by the "sweet saint," dear to gushing hagiologists. He puzzled people: they knew his patriotism, his love for imperial England; they saw in him strong traces of the typical English cleric; but they did not get a complete and satisfactory view of him. There have been those who lauded Newman to the utmost, but who dared whisper rather loudly that there was a streak of the actor, the charlatan, about Manning: they never accused him of hypocrisy, but they spoke of something in his temperament not quite frank and open and ingenuous. His sincerity, piety, uprightness, were not called in question; but Roman officialism, Vatican policy, ultramontane excess, so we were told, found a congenial nature in Manning upon which to work. All the old foolish traditions about cunning Jesuitry, about the pious credulity and holy imbecility so pleasing to heaven, about Roman arrogance and Italian ignorance, about the bigotry of the seminaries, about modern Tridentine Catholicism, about modern hysterical piety and agitated devotion, about the delusions or impostures of modern miracles: all these dreadful things were too much, men said, for the good Archdeacon of Chichester. Exulting with the fervour of a convert, he threw himself blindly into this unwholesome atmosphere, this Roman fever, and his mind was infected, his taste corrupted. For most men, behind Cardinal Newman lay a long, pathetic history, the struggles of a great soul: he represented the Oxford of days that have now the enchantment of romance. Behind Cardinal Manning most men saw no pathetic history, no glamour of romance: nothing but the wiles of Rome and the diplomacy of the Vatican. If controversialists thought that they detected historical error in Newman, they pointed it out with half-regret; if in Manning, they talked confidently about unscrupulousness and the desperate straits of Roman theologians.

These parodies and travesties of the truth are now but little heard; but it is profitable to consider them again. Primarily, they were the result of honest bewilderment, due to ignorance. Newman, by the compulsion of circumstances, took the world into his confidence: in prose and in verse, he told the secrets of his soul. As the leader of a great movement, he became the fair prey or property of the public: the state of his mind in 1830 or in 1840 was a thing for literary discussion in 1860; no one could write upon the history of religious thought in the century without investigating his daily life, his early training, his Oxford career. Living away from the public view to extreme old age, he became a classic in his lifetime: men wrote of him, as they might have written of Shelley and Byron; they never saw him; he took no part in public affairs; London knew him not; editors did not ask for his opinions on strikes, or temperance, or imperial federation; he did not belong to the Metaphysical Society, nor attend Royal Academy dinners, nor was he a member of the Athenæum. But scholars, historians, theologians, critics knew the story of his spiritual travels and adventures. All this was reversed in Manning's case; the world saw him and heard him. He was the indefatigable official, the untiring ruler of a great diocese, the unfailing friend of all philanthropic and national movements: he had relations with the world upon all sides, and was well in touch with his contemporaries. But the man himself remained unknown, save to his immediate friends; no one could anywhere read the story of his soul. No poems, no sermons, no personal revelations, full of yearning and affection, and sorrow and faith, gave him a place in the hearts of strangers; instead, they only knew a few hard, external facts, nothing intimate, nothing spiritual, nothing "psychological." And so, Manning was the energetic organiser, the man of practical policy, the ecclesiastic of administrative genius; the world almost forgot the man in the archbishop. The world wrote and spoke of "John Henry" Newman with a tone of half familiar admiration and love; "Henry Edward" was but an official signature, not the name of a friend. Manning deliberately suppressed himself: he disliked and distrusted many things in modern life and thought, but nothing more than self-display, even of the harmless sort untainted by vanity. He relied absolutely upon the objective strength of the Faith, as guarded and taught by the living authority of the Church: he was careful to present the Faith, not as it was to himself in the recesses of his soul, but in the clear, strong, definite outlines common to all the faithful of all the ages. Secretum meum mihi: he never wore his heart upon his sleeve. Now and again, so great was his horror of any approach to egoism, he seemed, in outward manner, to repress his emotions, lest his words of counsel or of warning should be valued rather for his own sake than for that of his high office. And apart from all religious motives, he was by nature of an austere habit: he impressed his hearer as the greatest of great nobles, the finest of fine gentlemen, according to all the highest traditions of courts and salons. Lord Chesterfield would have honoured a man so perfectly gracious, courteous, with that absolutely unforced distinction which is a fine art. But this refined bearing is always marked by a certain reticence and reserve: it is never profuse and lavish of itself. Newman, Hurrell Froude, Ward, one and all, were men of less natural and inevitable dignity: dignified, each in his own way, they were; but their natures were more expansive and less discreet. Mr. Pater writes of Fénelon, Archbishop of Cambrai:

"Certainly, it was worth while to have come so far only to see him and hear him give his pontifical blessing, in a voice feeble but of infinite sweetness, and with an inexpressibly graceful movement of the hands. A veritable grand seigneur! His refined old age, the impress of genius and honours, even his disappointments, concur with natural graces to make him seem too distinguished (a fitter word fails me) for this world. Omnia Vanitas! he seems to say, yet with a profound resignation which makes the things we are most of us so fondly occupied with seem petty enough."

There is a touch of sentimental unction, in a good sense, about that: a not uncommon mark of the French hierarchy and priesthood. But though Manning had greater strength than appears in Mr. Pater's portrait of Fénelon, it well suggests that singular hieratic dignity, added as a last grace to a nature always dignified, which distinguished the late Cardinal.

Such a man is easily misinterpreted. His friends, his colleagues, his associates understood him: he was not careful to make the world understand. His public actions he would, if called upon, defend in the interests of the Church; otherwise, with a kind of noble pride and humility in one, he let the insinuations, the misconstructions, the malice, and the gossip, go by. His writings, almost the whole of them, express this character: he had other things to think of than himself. He would write of "the Infallible Magisterium of the Supreme Pontiff," in a way that exasperated many. Newman, preaching and teaching the same doctrine, clothed it in all manner of persuasive graces: showed, in most winning manner, what it meant to him, his own apprehension of it; explained how he had considered it at different periods of his life. The result was not always conviction on the part of his readers, but always a fresh submission to the golden words, the magical charm of Newman. Cor ad cor loquitur, heart to heart speaketh, was Newman's motto and Newman's method: Manning, by an instinct equally gracious, hid himself away from his readers, and did but lend his voice to the living Church. "I am of Paul, I of Apollos," was hateful to him, and he refused to run the risk. At the same time, a man and his style are inseparable: and Manning wrote always with a certain stately beauty, a grave and chastened simplicity, measured and academic. But he had no modern ingenuities. In these days, Addison and the great Augustan writers seem deplorably uningenious: they never tortured a thought into contortions; they were simple and unshamed. Manning was no more afraid of a truism than Sophocles or Horace: truisms are probably the truest truths, the best attested in the world. But the word indicates our longing for some new thing; and he who will invert a truism into a paradox passes for the happiest and most refreshing of wits. A magazine article by Manning, with the latest clevernesses on either side of it, had an old-world air: he wrote not as the scribes.

Now, by the devotion of a loyal editor, we have a little volume of essays. Had they been published ten years ago, the public would have understood Manning somewhat better. For they are not controversial, nor dogmatic, nor theological, nor historical: they are moral, social, ironical, secular. Thackeray might have written them, using the precision of Aristotle and the brevity of Bacon. They deal with such matters as Honour, Consistency, Courage, Pride, Vanity, Popularity, Selfishness, Gossip; they touch upon Journalism and Criticism; they conclude with a dissertation upon the Daemon of Socrates. They show the writer treating of these things with a light hand, a shrewd head, and a full heart. For the most part he is examining society, social standards and ideals, with equal humour and seriousness, according as folly and merriment, or wickedness and sorrow, are the dominant topics. They are at least masterpieces of the lucidus ordo: each little sketch is complete, methodical, systematic. Bacon tells us that revenge is "a wild kind of justice"; it is much in that manner that the Cardinal searches out the origin, nature, moral affinity of each social fault or characteristic. It is done with no heavy scholastic implements, yet in the scholastic spirit: the logic of moral theologians underlies the satire, and the irony, and the scorn. The reader cannot but see that Manning had a supreme satisfaction and delight in the whole teaching of his Church, in its Aristotelian inheritance, in all its traditional ways and aspects. Usually, upon taking up a modern book or article, I find my author begin by saying white, proceed to say black, and end in saying grey. There is a generous air of seeing all sides of the case in this bewildering style; but it only means that my author has not seen his subject steadily, nor seen it whole. Skepticism, so spelled, may be a most sacred thing; but it sometimes produces a most maddening and mystifying style. My author may preach to me the doctrines in religion, philosophy, politics, art, that I most abhor; but if he will do it methodically and coherently, I will be grateful. Aristotle and his ethics are not the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; but their manner is magnificent and immortal. Manning allowed nothing to lie outside the reach and range of his principles: the smallest silly fashion, the most trifling social pretence, is traced by him to its radical home in the conscience and will. You may resent and dislike his principles, but you confess he has a view of life, intelligible if unacceptable. Dante, perhaps Manning's favourite poet, wrote so; Aquinas wrote so, as Mr. Patmore has reminded us; the Mystics, whose very name stands, with some, for confused obscurity, wrote so. "Grandeur of ideas," said Blake, "is founded upon precision of ideas"; it was the constant principle of his life and work. A vast and vague sublimity is possible to the dreamer, but never to the artist; and it is profitable to remember the influence of numbers and ideas of numerical relation upon Greek thought, metaphysical and aesthetic.

Dissimilar in so many things, the two Cardinals were alike in this, that neither of them wrote for pleasure. Newman, in a letter to Ward, describes the physical pain of writing, which he felt to such a degree, that "I have hardly written anything unless I was called to do so." Almost the whole of their volumes, some seventy in number, were undertaken as a duty. The present volume is, indeed, the fruit of Manning's rare leisure; and even these Pastime Papers "drive at practice," and have a moral bearing. In the excellent introduction by "J. O.," Manning is happily portrayed in just those touches which make portraits live. I have quoted neither from this, nor from the essays. The whole book is too delightful, too much of a single piece, to allow of very effective or fair quotation. I have preferred to dwell upon its writer; it is as useful, as it is uncommon, to be able to dwell upon a man thus at unity with himself:

"Whose faith and work were bells of full accord"

The Dog in British Poetry. Edited by R. Maynard Leonard. (David Nutt.)

AMID all the now multitudinous makers of more or less modish verse, few are more accomplished—certainly none shows a greater delicacy of touch—than Mme. Darmesteter. Her early volumes were the natural outcome of certain phases of thought and culture peculiar to their period of production: the apparent result of the influences of the hour upon an extremely earnest and impressionable order of mind. In common with the works of most minor poets, Miss Robinson's verse took colour from its artistic surroundings, being instinct with modern mediaevalism and latter-day languor, much as the songs of L. E. L. and Mrs. Hemans re-echoed the note of sentiment sounded all around them by the poetry, fiction, and painting of their proper age. The later development touches obviously a higher plane of expression: we have less of bombast, less of banality, together with the undoubted charms of literary sensitiveness and some graceful evidences of scholarship. If in such productions the literary faculty be wont to overweigh the creative element, if the pretty show of learning make somewhat for pedantry, the result is hardly the less pleasing, and (albeit a little lacking in freshness) goes far to satisfy the demands of at least one section of contemporary taste. With the vitality of this school we need hardly concern ourselves too seriously; it is enough to say that it has its counterpart in pictorial art, and in prose. The symbols are altered, but the spirit is the same. Where we had sloping-shouldered Oriental beauties, turbaned and trousered, with infinitesimal extremities and abnormally large eyes, we have the moyenage chatelaine, the damoiseau and damoiselle, to say nothing of the Naiad airs and classic faces of our modern conceptions of the heroines of old Greece—the Cynthias of the minute for many a nineteenth-century writer. Roses and jasmine have given place to the lily and the single dahlia; harp and gondola are discredited and cast aside, while sundials and sphinxes reign in their stead. Time turns the old modes to derision, though, perhaps, after all, one set of properties is just as good as another, and the difference may lie mainly in the eyes of the gazer and the favour of fashion. To be sure, the highest forms of art own no definable trademarks, are sealed with no obvious sign and superscription; while, on the other hand, it is the easiest thing in the world to classify such works as are the outcome of given combinations and conditions of artificial cultivation. Clever, thoughtful, possessed of some workmanlike qualities, and touched here and there with an appreciable tinge of poetry, Mme. Darmesteter's work is yet the work of an intelligent student rather than that of a singer, the production of the poet who has been made rather than born. At the same time, it is by reason of those merits aforesaid (which he who runs may read), well worthy of respect and of admiration, if not of enthusiasm. We should be grateful for elegance and some measure of restraint: in themselves virtues of no mean order. You do not look to gather roses from gardenia plants, or sweet peas from geranium stocks; and the geraniums and the gardenias are good, each after a fashion of their own.

Educated wistfulness was, and still is, the keynote of Mme. Darmesteter's poems: her muse, polite, self-conscious, is a person of sensibility and of much gentility to boot, who is most at ease within the pale of arbitrary forms, of traditional restrictions. One of the best, if not the very best, of the poems in the present volume is the following sonnet, with its felicitous second line, its excellent sestet:

"Sometimes, when I sit musing all alone
The sick diversity of human things,
Into my soul, I know not how, there springs
The vision of a world unlike our own.
O stable Zion, perfect, endless, One,
Why hauntest thou a soul that hath no wings?
I look on thee as men on mirage-springs,
Knowing the desert bears but sand and stone.
Yet as a passing mirror in the street
Flashes a glimpse of gardens out of range,
Through some poor sick room open to the heat;
So in our world of doubt, and death, and change,
The vision of Eternity is sweet,
The vision of Eternity is strange!"

As for the ballads and legends that form the closing section of the book, they fail to impress, partly, perhaps, because they fail to convince. Their archaism makes for boldness; their archaeology, careful enough though it be, is devoid of colour. With one sole exception, they are like "confectionary plums," sweet enough in all conscience, but somewhat insipid. Yet "The Widower of Haiderabad" gives furieusement à penser of better things, of a fuller-blooded inspiration, a more hale and vigorous manner.

Much of this same quality of wistfulness, a little less mature in expression, and considerably less exotic, pervades a charmingly-produced volume called Under the Hawthorn, by Augusta de Gruchy. Here, too, the personal note, so essentially feminine, predominates, and the narrative poem exists unbeautifully, even after the manner of Mr. George R. Sims. And this is a pity, for there is sufficient evidence to show that the writer was possessed of a very happy lyrical faculty and a nice appreciation of words, which should, had she been aware of her own capacity, have preserved her from the banalities of anecdotal verse as it is understood and written by the majority. One lyric, entitled "The Old Garden," is so musical, so full of pleasing sentiment and agreeable colour, as to invite quotation:

No change you say? nothing of loss that tells?
Trees, flowers, are they as lovely as of yore?
Does Spring still deck with corals and green bells
Our favourite sycamore?

The early lilacs, bloom they rank on rank,
Purple and white as they have bloomed for years?
Old Crown-Imperial on the mossy-bank,
Sheds he his hoarded tears?

The rose-acacia, does it carpet now
The pathway with its waxen blossoms red?
Drop the smooth berries from the laurel bough
Into the violet bed?

Suffer the birds no loss, bereft so long
Of us? is not the blackbird mute for doubt?
Is no part wanting to the thrush's song?
No liquid note left out?

Does the moon show behind the hedgerow elms,
Black bars against a spectral sea of light?
Reigns our one star over the heavenly realms
King, on a clear, cold night?

They bloom, sing, shine, our absence hindering not;
They are but waiting till ourselves have ranged Enough, so we revisiting that spot
May find them all unchanged."

Not especially deft in technique nor instinct with any compelling charm of originality of thought or rhythm, there is yet something very like poetry—something of a genuine inspiration in this little song. But it was as a writer of what, for want of a better phrase, we call vers de société, that this author might have made her mark. She had the right touch, neither too slight nor too heavy, the proper admixture of daintiness, tenderness, and humour that makes for the success of such metrical wares. The following lines ("At a Dance") furnish forth a fair instance of her pretty facility in this scarce-sufficiently appreciated genre:

"My Queen is tired and craves surcease
Of twanging string and clamorous brass;
I lean against the mantelpiece,
And watch her in the glass.

"One whom I see not where I stand
Fans her and talks in whispers low;
Her loose locks flutter as his hand
Moves lightly to and fro.

"He begs a flower; her finger-tips
Stray round a rose half veiled in lace;
She grants the boon with smiling lips,
Her clear eyes read his face.

"I cannot look, my sight grows dim—
While Fate allots unequally,
The living woman's self to him,
The mirrored form to me."

And the epigrammatic grace of these "Evening Reflections" (after Horace) pronounces for itself a more eloquent and adequate eulogy than were otherwise practicable. It is, indeed, a most excellent jeu d'esprit:

"Child, I detest your dress; my anger rises
At rasping silks, at waists of eighteen inches;
Cease buying at the shop that advertises
The gown that pinches!"

"Wear flowing muslins, nothing else, I bid you,
Or softest woollens if the sky be fretful;
Good night! sleep well, and, that I ever chide
you,
Awake forgetful."

Very charming, again, is "Dulces Amaryllidis Irae"; but the lays inspired by divers pictures, together with the story-verses and the various essays in Provençal forms, seem to have been efforts in the wrong direction. The book, however, is well worth having, if only for the sake of the few really good things therein, and for its frontispiece from the skilled hand of Mr. Walter Crane.

The making of verse is presumably a soothing exercise for the versifier; it is, moreover, a safe and blameless outlet for superfluous yearnings, and a safety-valve for sorrow that refuses to be assuaged in other ways. But as to whether the deliberate setting before the public in general, and before the critic in particular, of such ebullitions when they are entirely devoid of artistic merit or literary interest, be a censurable weakness or no is yet to be decided. One thing at least is certain—"least said, soonest mended," to wit. You do not break butterflies on wheels, or comment on rhymes that are, on the face of it, so absolutely without any kind of claim to attention as Songs, Measures, and Metrical Lines, by Jean Carlyle Graham. In all likelihood it pleased the author to construct them, and thus their mission is fulfilled, and all as it should be.

To-day is the day of anthologies, of books about books, of poems about poets, and so forth. Every month finds us with a fresh collection of verse or prose anent some special subject; and one of the last, and not the least acceptable, of these is Mr. Maynard Leonard's anthology of poetry inspired by dogs. Mr. Leonard, who has performed his congenial task with some taste and a good deal of patience, well-nigh disarms criticism in his preface by his open confession of the difficulties that beset his path, and by his comparatively impartial attitude towards the olla-podrida of verses in his volume. There are certainly not many therein that "reach a high poetic standard," but that is perhaps a little beside the question. Much thought and research have evidently been expended upon the compilation, and the book should meet with a cordial welcome from all who care for dog literature. Anthologies make strange book-fellows, and The Dog in British Poetry is naturally no exception to the rule; you are made to think of the millennium when you discover Sims (sic), Shakspeare, Lewis Morris, and Wordsworth, cheek by jowl, as it were, "Julius Caesar, and Nebuchadnezzar, all standing naked in the open air." But this is a detail; the mottoes are well chosen, and the contents include not a few interesting items. It is, nevertheless, to be regretted that the compiler has seen fit to include poems which he has found it necessary to abridge, supplying the places of the deleted lines with prose epitomes of his own. The effect is not happy.

GRAHAM R. TOMSON.

Philosophy and Political Economy in Some of their Relations. By James Bonar. (Son-nenschein.)

AMONG the thinkers to whom Political Economy owes its constitution as a science, several have earned an equal or superior reputation in pure philosophy. Plato and Aristotle in antiquity; Hume, the two Mills, and Jevons in modern times, are names that at once occur to the memory. The greatest of all economists, Adam Smith, holds a high place in the history of ethical theory. Other philosophers, without being professed economists, have, with more or less authority, given their views on the industrial organisation of society; as Fichte, Hegel, and Comte. There have no doubt been similar relations between philosophy and other sciences, more especially mathematics and physics, but the union has been less fruitful of results; whereas, as Dr. Bonar shows, political economy owes some of its chief conceptions to philosophy. It might be maintained that the debt is not all on one side; but apart from a reference to the part played by the Malthusian Law of Population in Darwin's theory of Natural Selection, Dr. Bonar has nothing to tell us about that aspect of the relation. His learned, thoughtful, and suggestive volume might, with at least equal appropriateness, be called a history of economical ideas. Some of these ideas were reached by a comparatively rapid process of generalisation; others were only won by a long and difficult elaboration, occasionally extending back to the systems of early Greek philosophy.

The Division of Labour was first formulated as an economical principle by Plato, to whom also the first scheme of Socialism is due. Aristotle touches on the Theory of Value, and fully explains the use of Money in his Ethics; while in his Politics he has stated the arguments for private property with a force to which little has since been added. But both Plato and Aristotle studied the interests of a class rather than those of the whole community, and both regarded the accumulation of wealth beyond very narrow limits as an unmixed evil. Stoicism rose to a much more comprehensive view of human obligation, but by aiming to a still greater extent at the extirpation rather than the satisfaction of human wants, it failed still more completely to realise the actual importance of industrial conditions; nor did Christianity look with more favour on the pursuit of material goods.

But no direct contribution made by ancient philosophy to economics can be compared in importance with the indirect influence of the idea of Natural Law. Under the hands of Grotius, Hobbes, and Locke, its discussion took the form of a supposed opposition between individual right and social order, with various attempts to reconcile the claims of both. Locke, according to Dr. Bonar, first caught the momentous distinction between the state, which can only exact a limited obedience from its citizens, and the wider sphere of society where they deal with one another as free persons in the exercise of their inalienable natural rights. It is to the latter that economical phenomena belong. Property is a creation of labour, and therefore exists independently of the state, the duty of which is to guarantee it. Here we have a principle excluding not only the absolutism of Hobbes, but also the communism of More's Utopia and the agrarian law of Harrington's Oceana. It is also a principle implicitly opposed to what was known as the Mercantile Theory. The doctrine so-called did not, according to Dr. Bonar, represent the opinions of a philosophical school, but was rather a generalised expression of the ideas that inspired the policy of such statesmen as Colbert. In order to increase the power of the sovereign, it was believed that the most efficacious method was to increase the quantity of precious metals accumulated within his dominions, and that the best means for the attainment of this object was to encourage the foreign trade of the country. A reaction against governmental interference with industry called into existence the French Physiocratic School of political economy, whose chief exponent was Quesney. Here the idea of Nature seems to have played a two-fold part. Agriculture, which draws wealth direct from the soil, is the most "natural" of all industries, while the mercantile system drew men away from agriculture to manufactures and trades; it belongs to the natural liberty of man that he should produce what he thinks best, and buy and sell where he thinks best, whereas the mercantile system caused him to be hampered in both directions by regulations imposed in the interests of the state, but really detrimental to the state itself. Hence arose the two great maxims—laissez passer, laissez faire.

"It was the lamp of Quesney," says Carlyle, "that kindled the lamp of Adam Smith." But Dr. Bonar shows that the author of The Wealth of Nations was at least equally indebted to the tradition of English philosophy. A line of thinkers, culminating in Hume, had substituted social utility for natural law as the supreme principle of ethics, and at the same time had attempted to show that social phenomena were themselves subject to the operation of law in the scientific sense of the word. They had also tended to recognise self-interest as the leading motive of human conduct. Lastly, there was a general spirit of optimism abroad, a belief that all things worked together for the best. With the help of these various principles Adam Smith constructed an economical system, of which the central idea seems to be that the individual efforts of men to better their condition result, under the guidance of Providence, in an order of things where the greatest possible amount of happiness is distributed with tolerable equality among all ranks of society. In practice, this theory led to very much the same conclusion as that reached by the French Physiocrats—the restriction of state-interference with industry to a minimum.

The Utilitarianism of Bentham and James Mill harmonised perfectly with the new political economy, in its inculcation of unfettered liberty as the best means for securing general happiness. But, meanwhile, Godwin had pushed the growing hostility towards government to the length of predicting its complete disappearance in a perfected social condition, an anticipation which Malthus met by erecting his famous Law of Population as a barrier to the supposed future progress of humanity. But Malthus subsequently came to admit the possibility of exercising an efficient prudential check on the increase of population, thus taking a first step towards a new political economy, of which laissez-faire should not be the highest principle. J. S. Mill advanced still further in the same direction, by his famous distinction between the laws of Production, which are independent of the human will, and the laws of Distribution which it can modify to an indefinite extent. This distinction, if I remember rightly, was suggested to him by Mrs. Taylor—a circumstance not deemed worthy of mention by Dr. Bonar. Mill made a certain advance in the direction of Socialism; but, while utterly discarding the idea of natural rights, he continued to advocate a large measure of individual liberty on utilitarian grounds.

So far we can follow the author with sympathy and profit, as he traces the connexion between economical and philosophical ideas. But when he passes to the development which has led up to the Socialism of Karl Marx and Engels, the case is altered. His expositions of the various systems of social philosophy constructed by Kant and Kant's idealistic successors are no doubt excellent pieces of work; the account of Hegel's Philosophy of Right in particular is written with a lucid mastery not always to be found in his treatment of apparently easier subjects. But one cannot help feeling that the connexion between Hegel and any form of modern Socialism is purely artificial and accidental. Dr. Bonar quotes Engels as affirming their intrinsic affinity, but it seems to amount to no more than a common doctrine of historical progress through the evolution of opposites from one another. Granting the desirability and practicability of Socialism, it can, with a moderate exercise of ingenuity, be brought under this or any other fashionable formula; perhaps a shelter might be found for it even in Mr. Spencer's system. Certainly Hegel himself was little more of a Socialist than the author of the Synthetic Philosophy. When it came to finding something that looked like real arguments for revolutionising the laws of property, Marx had recourse to Ricardo's theory of value rather than to the dialectic method. Of all living German Socialists, Dühring (whom Dr. Bonar never mentions) is the most distinguished as a speculative thinker, and he sets himself against the whole post-Kantian tradition. The truth is, that the authoritative state-systems of the continent prepare the ground for theoretical Socialism, just as English habits of personal liberty find their expression in philosophical individualism. But if the Socialists can show that their proposed reorganisation of industry is practicable, and that it is more conducive to the general happiness than the present régime, or than any probable development of private proprietorship, English utilitarians will not be precluded from accepting it by any national prejudices. If the Socialists fail to satisfy these conditions, their chances of success will be small in Germany or anywhere else.

ALFRED W. BENX.

The Literary Works of James Smetham.
Edited by William Davis. (Macmillans.)

In this pleasant little volume the friends of the late James Smetham, whose interesting Letters were reviewed in the ACADEMY of February 20, 1892, have collected the more important of his writings. It cannot be said that the present has the full interest of the former volume: the man was greater than his works, and his personality is disclosed to us more frankly and unreservedly in his familiar correspondence than in his more conscious literary efforts. Yet the present book forms very pleasant reading. Mr. Smetham had a singularly genial and sympathetic nature; he was full of intelligent and enthusiastic admiration of all things admirable—of nature, of art, of literature; and he possessed enough literary gift to give to his admiration clearing and telling expression.

Three of the prose essays that are here collected first appeared in the London Quarterly Review; the fourth, a study of Gerhard Dow, briefer than the rest, is republished from the Art Journal. Probably the most valuable paper is that dealing with William Blake, a "deeply sympathetic and assimilative study," as Dante Rossetti justly styled it, when he incorporated the greater part of it in the second edition of Gilchrist's Life of Blake. Mr. Smetham had, of course, not studied the poet-painter with the minute and painstaking care which Messrs. Ellis and Yeats, his latest editors, have bestowed upon their subject; he had not sought to elucidate his enigmatical utterances, does not appear to have felt—what, indeed, is only now, as the result of patient investigation, beginning to be perceived—that all the dark sayings of the great English mystic derive coherency from a mystical system which lay beneath them, and which, in Blake's own mind at least, was clear and sequent enough. Yet, within his own limitations, Mr. Smetham is a helpful and sympathetic critic of Blake; he is deeply impressed with the beauty of Blake's life and character, with the impersonality, the absolute single-mindedness, of all his aims. He feels the visionary power of his art, and guides us pleasantly through the sweetly pastoral works of his Virgil woodcuts and his illustrations to his early poetical books to the great inventions to the Book of Job, which were the crowning production of his last years upon earth. It is curious, however, to find so sympathetic a critic, and that critic himself an imaginative artist of considerable power and individuality, falling into raptures over "the knowledge and skill" displayed in Schiavonetti's engravings of Blake's illustration to Blair's "Grave," and finding it necessary to preface the consideration of Blake's own splendid plates to the Book of Job—in which thought and artistic method are fused into one perfectly harmonious whole—by the warning that they are "the latest productions of a hand growing stiff with age."

The essay on Sir Joshua Reynolds—a review of Leslie and Taylor's Life and Times—contains a bright and readable sketch of his career, and a just and well-weighed estimate of his art; and, in the paper suggested by the "Last Leaves" of Alexander Smith, we have a kindly record of that poet's life, and some true criticism of his verse, with, incidentally, a well-deserved eulogium on Dobell's splendid ballad, "Keith of Ravelston."

Some forty pages at the end of the volume contain a selection from Smetham's poetry. While his verse seldom reaches any very high pitch of literary quality, it certainly shows the writer in a pleasing aspect, as a man of beautiful and cultivated nature, and of a deeply religious mind. He seems to have gained facility in metrical expression by practice, for most of his better poems—we must except "The Soul's Departure," which was published in 1841—were written in later life. There are several translations of the Psalms, for which Sir Philip Sidney's version seems to have served as model; and we have admirable verses in "The Rotifer." As a specimen of this part of the book, I may quote one of the finer of the shorter poems, a piece full of grave and earnest impressiveness:

"AN ANTIDOTE TO CARE.

"Think that the grass upon thy grave is green;
Think that thou seest thine own empty chair;
The empty garments thou wast wont to wear;
The empty room where long thy haunt hath been,
Think that the lane, the meadow, and the wood,
And mountain summit feel thy feet no more,
Nor the loud thoroughfare, nor sounding shore;
All mere blank space where thou thyself hath stood.
Amid this thought-created silence say
To thy stripped soul, what am I now and where?
Then turn and face the petty narrowing care
Which has been gnawing thee for many a day,
And it will die as dies a wailing breeze
Lost in the solemn roar of bounding seas."

Something Wrong. By E. Nesbit. (Innes.)

MR. CLARK RUSSELL is a great writer of sea stories—not merely of stories of the sea; and, though this may seem fine-drawn phrasing, it is not a distinction without a difference. A story of the sea differs mainly from a story of the land in having a maritime background, the ocean supplying the place of the fields or the town, and the vessel—be it ship, yacht, or open boat—of hall or cottage. The true sea story, on the other hand, is a tale in which the billows and the craft which they upheave are much more than a mere background: it is a drama in which, if we may so put it, they are not merely scenery or "properties," but partakers in the main action, and are of hardly less interest or dramatic value than the human actors to whom they are by turns friendly and hostile. In its general and essential features List, ye Landsmen! resembles its numerous predecessors; but in every book from Mr. Clark Russell's pen there are some touches of an always fresh invention, which gives to the newcomer a place of its own. The adventures in search of the stranded treasure-ship are as exciting as ever; the superstitious captain, with the taint of madness in his brain, is a noteworthy addition to the writer's remarkable gallery of naval portraits; and some of the descriptions, especially that of "the white sea," are among Mr. Clark Russell's best things in this line. Both landsmen and seamen will find it delightful to obey the call of the title, which would indeed fit any story from the author's pen.

Perdita is so exceptionally bright and interesting a novel that one would like to praise it without any reserve; but there is just one matter in which Miss Mann seems to have attempted a little too much, and by the attempt she misses unalloyed success. We soon discover that Robert Sant, who has married Perdita, is identical with the swindling husband of Pauline Ashford; but the identity is never made vitally real to us: we do not feel it "in our bones" as we know we ought to feel it—to the imagination the one man is not one but two. Whether the comparative failure arises from lack of power or lack of patience, it is there; and as a matter of course it goes some way towards marring the total effect of what is in the main a capital story. We do not remember anywhere—even in The Professor—a more lifelike picture of the humours of a girl's school than that to be found in Miss Mann's pages, the imaginative and idealising heroine-worshipper, Barbara Norris, being a singularly natural and carefully studied rendering of a type which has been often caricatured, but hardly ever sympathetically portrayed. Perdita is not merely bright and capable all through; it has some really dramatic situations, and is, in all respects but the one indicated, a most pleasant and satisfying piece of work.

Satisfying is an epithet which we do not think many readers will apply to The Jew, a translation of which has been added to "Heinemann's International Library." When Mr. Gosse says that Kraszewski "was of the brood of the giants," and "is to be thought of with Lope de Vega, with Voltaire, with Alexandre Dumas," we begin to be excited; but our excitement is somewhat allayed when we discover that the kinship is indicated, not by "the nature of his writings," but by "their bulk, their volume, their encyclopaedic character." In a description of the output of a novelist, these be words of evil omen; and the omen is not averted in the pages of The Jew. The book has knowledge, intelligence, enthusiasm; but it has nothing to make us think of its author as a creative artist, or even as a master of narrative. The characters are for the most part wooden, the structure of the book is laboured and mechanical; and save as regards its quality of information—which cannot be depreciated—The Jew is tiresome. Kraszewski must owe his native popularity to his purpose, which is lofty, rather than to his art, which is very ineffectual.

It is a terrible accusation to make, but it is to be feared that Mr. Jerome is largely responsible for the existence of An Unco Stravaig. Mr. Jerome is a humorist; and though Three Men in a Boat was not his happiest effort, it had a great success. Success is the will-o'-the-wisp that dances before the amateur scribe; and in this case the results of the dance have been the hackneyed, strained, laughterless, attempts at jocularity of which Mr. Morris's dreary sketch of a Highland tour is all compact. There are illustrations also, "by the author"; and the best or worst that can be said of them is that they are worthy of the text.

The next two stories on our list are about as thin as stories well could be, but the first of them is by no means wanting in literary skill. It must, however, be described as much ado about nothing, or, at any rate, about very little. The Bishop of Northminster brings home a young wife; and though she is a delightful and apparently faultless person whom everybody admires, there seems to be some mystery about her. As a matter of fact, there is no mystery at all, save her concealment from her husband and her friends of her passion for the military surroundings to which she has been accustomed, and her feeling of the strain of her new duties. An act of impulsive heroism on the occasion of a fire at the Northminster brings the strained situation and the story to an end together. There is very little in The Bishop's Wife, but that little is distinctly agreeable.

There is still less in A Norseman's Wooing; and though the story is pleasantly told, we cannot help being irritated by such a couple of geese as the hero and the heroine. She is as much in love with him as he is with her, and he is in every way a desirable suitor; but being a young woman in a novel, she does her best to make him believe the opposite. He seconds her endeavours to prevent the course of true love running smooth by ridiculous jealousy of a young man who is his idol's prospective brother-in-law, and is beating a retreat to Brussels when he is captured at Liverpool-street Station, brought back, and happily married. Mr. Cole will write a better book when he finds a less absurdly conventional story to tell.

The King of Honey Island, which is described as "an historical romance of the Creole coast" is poor stuff. The present writer cannot pretend to be a judge of the details of its history, but its romance is of the cheapest and most tawdry melodramatic kind; and though even indifferent melodrama may be agreeably exciting, we have found nothing to stir us in the record of the objectionable person who was a highwayman in Honey Island, and a persona grata in the fashionable society of New Orleans.

The fighting chapters at the close are the best part of the book.

The Mystery of North Fortune unfortunately has no best or worst: it is from first to last monotonously bad. Even the title is bad, because as we know from the outset that Mr. Kilpont was poisoned by his wife—the "fair-haired woman, with a skin like a ripe peach, full red lips, and narrow black eyes"—there is no mystery at all, though there is a great deal of muddlement. It is a relief to escape to the gay, pretty story, A Mad Prank, which in its necessarily slighter way is quite as enjoyable as its author's longer novels. Mrs. Hungerford could hardly have written what she has written had she not been of Irish birth, and her latest story is a variant of the motive of her great countryman's comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer." The heroine goes in the attire of a housemaid to a fancy dress ball, where she expects to see, and hopes not to be seen by, the suitor whose person and fortune have been assigned to her by the will of a match-making relative. He does see her, however, and as they have never met, takes her for what she seems to be, asks her to get him some refreshment, and gives her a florin. She insists on retaining the disguise at a family luncheon to which the young man has been invited; and both the luncheon itself and the complications which follow represent Mrs. Hungerford at her best. Indeed, there is not a flat passage in the story, which could easily be transformed by judicious management into a charming little comedietta.

The New England tales of Miss Jewett deserve, and will doubtless receive, a welcome not less warm than that which has been given to the beautiful work of Mrs. Slosson and Miss Wilkins. They lack the glamour and spiritual vision of Seven Dreamers, and as a rule they have less of purely narrative interest than is to be found in A Humble Romance, A Faraway Melody, and their companion stories; but the very slenderness of the motive, and the writer's rigidly ascetic adherence to the unadorned familiarities of homely life, throw into relief her penetratingly sympathetic comprehension of an impoverished existence which is cheerfully unconscious of its own penury, and which surveys its narrow horizon with no painful yearning for a wider outlook. The most modern school of fiction revels in the existing complexities of life, and exploits its skill in the invention of new ones; Miss Jewett, on the contrary, delights to show what infinity of interest is to be found in the elemental simplicities of thought and emotion which, to every faculty but that of a patient imaginative observation, seem barren of creative suggestiveness. And the style is in fine accord with the matter, thus proving itself a style and not a mere manner. Once—in the story of "A White Heron"—she lets herself go with a passionate, almost lyrical, abandonment, which achieves such a sudden effect of beauty that we could wish the venture repeated; but for the most part the rendering is so reticent that it would be austere were it not everywhere so warmly and sympathetically human. Space is lacking for detailed comment; but readers of the stories entitled "Miss Tempy's Watchers," "A Native of Winby," and "A Lost Lover," will find ample justification of all that has been said. The delightful low-toned comedy of "The Dulham Ladies" sets it in a place apart from the rest; and the last story, "The Courting of Sister Wisby," is the only one which, in virtue of a certain want of proportion, is not quite up to the level of its companions.

The tales told by "E. Nesbit" in the little volume called Something Wrong have more narrative body and perhaps something less of the charm of delicate, sympathetically interpretative rendering than is to be found in Miss Jewett's work. Indeed, the methods and manners of the two writers are so different that a contemplated comparison between them must needs be futile. In short stories, as in most other things, there are various species of goodness; and at least two of the stories in Something Wrong—"The Blue Rose" and "A Woman's Vengeance"—are as good as they well could be. As the title of the book indicates, the stories deal more or less directly with the seamy side of human nature, but the satire has no cynicism in it: it is simply the natural attitude of a sympathetic nature towards an antipathetic object. "Tim" is a charming dog-story, and in it, as in "A Grand Piece of Work," the pathos is spontaneous and unforced, which, perhaps, cannot be said of "The Linguist," though this last has a quaint beauty, which seems to forbid words of depreciation. "Not exceeding £5" is trivial; "Hurst of Hurstcote" is not a great success; and "The Judgment" is simply repulsive. But the other tales have unmistakable quality.

RECENT BOOKS ON THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

Captivité et Derniers Moments de Louis XVI. Récits originaux et Documents officiels recueillis et publiés pour la Société d'Histoire Contemporaine, par le Marquis de Beauchamp. Tome I. Récits originaux. (Paris: Alphonse Picard.) In the ACADEMY for May 27 attention was called to the first publication of a society newly founded in Paris for the publication of documents bearing on the history of the French Revolution. It was pointed out that this society would in some degree compensate for the unfortunate discontinuance of the Revue de la Révolution, and was intended to represent the attitude of those Frenchmen who look on the great Revolution from the most unfavourable point of view. With the Raigeourt Correspondence the new society made an auspicious start; and the first volume of the two which are promised on the captivity and execution of Louis XVI. affords a further proof that the society will confer a great boon on all students of the history of the Revolution. This volume, of which the title is given above, is made up, with one exception, of various contemporary publications upon the captivity and last days of Louis XVI. It contains the well-known stories of Madame Royale, Madame de Tourzel, Hue, Cléry, and Edgeworth de Firmont, with the less familiar narratives of the various municipal commissioners in charge of the royal prisoners in the Temple—Goret, celle, and Lepitre. To the latter is added the hitherto unpublished Memoir on the subject by another municipal commissioner, Verdier. The volume also comprises reprints of eighteen contemporary accounts of the execution of Louis XVI. from various journals and pamphlets. It is a distinct advantage to have these memoirs and documents united in one well-printed and well-edited volume. Though the Marquis de Beaumont adds nothing fresh of any importance to our knowledge of the imprisonment and death of the most illustrious victim of the Revolution, he deserves all credit for refraining from the use of strong language, and for giving us a useful text of documents, which are constantly needed for reference, and have hitherto only been procurable in rare early editions, disfigured reprints, or bulky collections of memoirs.

La Journée du Juillet 14, 1789: Fragment des mémoires inédits de L. G. Pitra, publié avec une introduction et des notes par Jules Flammarion. (Paris: Société de l'Histoire de la Révolution Française, 3, Rue de Furstemberg.) The Société de l'Histoire de la Révolution Française represents exactly the opposite view to the Société d'Histoire Contemporaine. It is maintained by ardent believers in the generally beneficent result of the Revolution, and by admirers of the revolutionary statesmen. But though their point of view is different, its editors are equally inspired by the true scientific spirit. M. Flammarion, like the Marquis de Beaumont, is too truly an historical student to allow his appreciation of the documents he publishes to be biased by his personal attitude. While, however, both editors deserve credit for their work, the part of M. Flammarion is far more important than that of the Marquis de Beaumont. Whereas the Introduction of the latter is short compared to his documents, that of M. Flammarion is very long; in fact, his volume contains 278 pages of Introduction to 56 pages of text. But it is not a page too long. For it contains the most careful critical résumé of all the known accounts of the capture of the Bastille; and no one who wishes to obtain a correct idea of the proceedings on the important day of July 14, 1789, can afford to neglect it. It is a model of critical analysis, and worthy of the learned editor of Mercy-Argenteau's Correspondence.

The Flight to Varennes, and other Historical Essays. By Oscar Browning. (Sonnenschein.) Mr. Browning has done well to reprint these essays from the different periodicals and Transactions in which they first appeared. By far the most valuable of them is the essay mentioned on the title-page, which is followed by Mr. Browning's lucid exposition of the errors committed by Carlyle in his account of the flight of the royal family from Paris on June 21, 1791. Many Englishmen still believe Carlyle to be an historian. To such Mr. Browning's essay is to be commended; for from it they will discover that in describing the episode, in which he expended so much elaborate writing, he went wrong about as often as it is possible for a writer to go wrong. In truth, Carlyle had none of the elementary qualities of an historical writer. He was unable to weigh evidence patiently; he allowed his imagination to run away with him; he had no sense of historical proportion; he could not understand the importance of details; and he fitted his facts to a priori ideas instead of deducing conclusions from his facts. But though Mr. Browning's study of the flight to Varennes and his criticism of Carlyle's account are the most noteworthy essays in this book, the others all deserve to be rescued from ephemeral publications. Perhaps the best of them are those relating to Hugh Elliot and to Queen Caroline of Naples. His hearty admiration of Pitt, which is shown in more than one of the essays, deserves particular commendation; and whenever the publication of Pitt's despatches is undertaken—as it ought soon to be, if a true idea is to be formed of English policy at the close of the last century—no better editor, qualified alike by knowledge and enthusiasm, could be found to undertake the task than Mr. Oscar Browning.

The French Revolution, by C. S. Mallet (John Murray), is one of a series of University Extension Manuals, edited by Prof. Knight. It makes no claim to originality, and the author does not pretend to have kept pace with the constantly accumulating literature on the period. It is confessedly a summary account of the events of the French Revolution, and errs rather in its want of historical proportion than in its statement of facts. Out of 283 pages, no less than 54 are devoted to an account of France in the eighteenth century and the last years of the ancien régime, 100 to the Constituent Assembly, 27 to the Legislative Assembly, and 102 to the Convention. This is the chief fault of the little volume, and indicates clearly where its author finds his main interest. It is useless to protest against the dragging in of the inevitable prefatory matter, which writers of handbooks will insert, on the causes of the Revolution. Mr. Mallet is no worse than the rest; but it is difficult to see what purpose is served by these disquisitions. His narrative is generally correct; but it distinctly falls off in the last two chapters, and his account of the Thermidorians fails lamentably to emphasise the important work of those great statesmen. It is on this period that Mrs. S. R. Gardiner's little volume in the "Epochs of History" series is strongest; and for this reason, if for no other, Mr. Mallet's volume is not likely to supersede Mrs. Gardiner's in catering for the type of University Extension students for whom he writes. There are some mis-spellings of proper names which should be corrected: such as Billaud-Varennes for Billaud-Varenne, Lebon for Le Bon, Javogues for Javogues, and Bazire for Basire.

Revolution and Reaction in Modern France. By G. L. Dickinson. (George Allen.) This is a volume of a very different character to Mr. Mallet's. Mr. Dickinson does not even attempt to summarise the received secondary histories of the Revolution; he sifts their statements, and endeavours to point out lessons to be learnt from their accounts of the events that occurred. In short, he does not write as a historian on any scale, large or small, but as a political philosopher. It is not necessary to agree with his conclusions in order to appreciate the value of his work, which is intended not so much to impart instruction as to awaken reflection. Perhaps its most valuable characteristic is its recognition of the fact that the influence of the Revolution is still a political power in France: that its varying ideals are the aims of existing political parties, and that its importance did not come to an abrupt end with the establishment of the Directory in 1795. Mr. Dickinson's volume is one well worth reading by all who have studied the modern history of France; and such a stimulating writer may be expected to do more useful work in the future.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. announce a volume of Historical Essays, by Lord Acton, whose name (so far as we know) has not previously appeared on the title-page of any book.

MR. E. GORDON DUFF, the keeper of what we must now call the Ryland-Althorp Library, will publish immediately a portfolio of facsimiles illustrating the history of printing in England in the fifteenth century. It consists of forty plates, showing every type that can be ascertained to have been used in England before 1500. The facsimiles have been reproduced by the collotype process, and consist in every case of an entire page of the exact size of the original. Mr. Duff has added an introduction, in which he gives an account of the several types, and also short notices of the printers. The edition of the work is limited to three hundred copies.

MR. WALTER BESANT's school reading-book, on the History of London, will be published by Messrs. Longman & Co. next week. It is illustrated with seventy-four woodcuts, showing the topography and architecture of the city, the costumes of various epochs, and the incidents of social life.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL will publish immediately a book by Mr. R. S. Gundry, entitled China and her Neighbours. It deals with the relations between France and Indo-China, between Russia and China, and between India and Tibet; and it is illustrated with several maps.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD announces Recollections of a Social Worker, by Miss Louisa Twining, who (it is hardly necessary to state) has taken an active part in most of the great social movements of the last half-century.

THE next volumes in the new issue of the "Aldine Poets," published by Messrs. Bell, will be an edition of Herrick, by Mr. George Saintsbury. The text has been carefully collated with early editions, and the annotation has designedly been kept down to its lowest limits. The edition will be in two volumes.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish shortly the thirty-fifth volume in the "Story of the Nations," under the title of The Australian Commonwealth. It will treat of Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand. The author is Mr. Greville Tregarthen, to whom the Australian governments have supplied many illustrations. This volume will be the first of a sub-series on the English colonies, which will form a cabinet in the "Story of the Nations."

THE next issue in "Constable's Oriental Miscellany" will be a reprint, in two volumes, of Sleeman's Rambles and Recollections of an Indian Official, edited by Mr. Vincent A. Smith, of the Bengal Civil Service.

DR. JAPP is about to publish, through Mr. John Hogg, a volume entitled Hours in my Garden, with Other Nature Sketches. The book contains some records of personal experiences and impressions, as well as the results of much reading.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL & Co. have in the press a new book by the author of "Jesus, the Carpenter of Nazareth," entitled "A Child's Religion," which will form a sequel to his popular Life of Christ, now in a seventh edition. It is intended to set forth simple Christianity for the young.

THE Midland Education Company, of Birmingham, announce the publication, in twelve monthly parts, of Historic Worcestershire, by Mr. W. Salt Braddon, with numerous illustrations in photo-typography of the chief places of interest in the county, and reproductions of old portraits, maps, and documents.

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS will publish shortly, in three volumes, Mr. Frank Barrett's new novel, The Woman of the Iron Bracelets.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish immediately two novels. One, entitled Anabel: A Military Romance, is by a new writer, who, it is hoped, will carry on the traditions of the late Mr. Hawley Smart; the other is Bianca, a society story, by Mrs. Bagot Harte.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON have in the press a new novel by Mrs. J. Kent Spender, entitled A Strange Temptation, which will be published in three volumes.

MESSRS. SKEFFINGTON & SON will publish early in October a novel by Mr. Charles E. Hall, entitled An Ancient Ancestor, which deals indirectly with the authenticity of the poems of Ossian.

A SECOND edition of Michael Field's Underneath the Bough will be published very shortly by Messrs. Bell. The limited first edition was exhausted before publication. The new edition has been revised and "decreased."

A UNIFORM edition of Q.'s books, including Dead Man's Rock, The Splendid Spur, The Blue Pavilions, The Astonishing History of Troy Town, I Saw Three Ships, and Noughts and Crosses, will be issued by Messrs. Cassell & Co. in a few days.

MR. JOSEPH HATTON's latest novel, Under the Great Seal, which treats of our most ancient colony Newfoundland when it was under the jurisdiction of those rude and ignorant skippers known as "Fishing Admirals," is to be published this week in cheaper form by Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

MR. JOHN MURRAY will publish next week a new edition of his Handbook for Cornwall, thoroughly revised, with several new maps and plans.

MR. CARRINGTON, curator of the Belvoir manuscripts, has just discovered some very important deeds at Belvoir Castle. One is the grant by King John to an ancestor of the Vernon family of the land on which Haddon Hall now stands. This deed, which is in splendid preservation, is dated 1199.

THE Librairie Lamarche, of Dijon, has just published a book by the late Joseph Milsand, who is well known in this country—at least by name—as the intimate friend of Robert Browning. The book, which is entitled Littérature Anglaise et Philosophie, includes articles on Browning and Mrs. Browning, on Tennyson, and on Charles Dickens. The English agents for the publishers are Messrs. Williams & Norgate.

MR. C. H. FIRTH has reprinted from the Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society a Life of Major-General Thomas Harrison, the parliamentary soldier and regicide. It is an expansion of the article he wrote three years ago for the Dictionary of National Biography; but he has now been able to ascertain the facts about his birth and marriage. The conclusion that Harrison left no children must be held to disprove the popular tradition that two Presidents of the United States are descended from him. The political part that Harrison played is also made clearer, partly by help of the Clarke Papers, which Mr. Firth is editing for the Camden Society. In the Appendix are given a number of original documents, some of which have never been printed before; and also a list of contemporary pamphlets relating to Harrison.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE Century Magazine for October will contain an instalment of the unpublished diary of Mr. Glover, who was secretary to the admiral (Sir George Cockburn) on board the Northumberland, which conveyed the Emperor Napoleon to St. Helena in 1815. The second instalment will be given in the November number.

THE October number of the English Illustrated Magazine—which will henceforth be published at the offices of the Illustrated London News—will contain: a poem by Mr. Lewis Morris, entitled "At the Gate," an illustrated description of Ranelagh Gardens, by Mr. Austin Dobson; and the first chapters of "A Pardonable Liar," a new serial story, by Mr. Gilbert Parker.

IN the October number of Scribner's will be published for the first time Robert Stevenson's reminiscences of a voyage made to inspect the lighthouses of Scotland in 1814, when Sir Walter Scott was his companion. There will also be a paper by Mr. W. D. Howells on "The Man of Letters as a Man of Business."

THE October number of the United Service Magazine will contain an article entitled "Two Maritime Expeditions," by Capt. A. J. Mahan, of the U. S. Navy; and also a paper on "The Loss of the Victoria and the Manoeuvring Powers of Steamships," by Vice-Admiral Colomb.

NEXT month will appear a new illustrated magazine for women, entitled The Woman at Home, to be edited by Annie S. Swan. Among the contents of the first number will be: a biographical sketch of the Princess of Wales, an illustrated interview with Mme. Adelina Patti, a short story by the editor herself, and contributions by Norman Gale and Sarah Grand. There is, apparently, to be no serial fiction. The publishers are Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

PRINCESS CHRISTIAN will contribute an article on "The Royal British Nurses' Association" to the October number of Atalanta.

AN illustrated interview with Edna Lyall will appear in the October number of the Young Woman. This number, which commences a new volume, will also contain stories by Mrs. Oliphant and Barry Pain, an article on "How to Play the Violin," by Rev. H. R. Haweis, a "Plain talk about Plain Cookery," by Mrs. Boyd Carpenter (wife of the Bishop of Ripon), and a paper on "How to Preserve the Complexion," by Dr. Gordon Stables. Miss Willard begins a series of articles entitled "The Story of my Life," and the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes writes on "What Christianity has done for Women."

Cream (of the World's Fact, Fun, and Fancy) is the title of a new weekly penny paper, which will shortly appear under the editorship of Mr. Francis George Heath. It will consist mainly of brief extracts from the press of the world.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will henceforth be the publisher of the New Review, and also the English publisher of the North American Review.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THE WIND OF THE DEAD MEN'S FEET.*

Oh, "wind of the dead men's feet," blow softly,
Disturb not thou their rest,
Why should ye waken them from quiet slumber
Within earth's toil-worn breast?
The day will come, when like a mighty ocean,
Which rolls from pole to pole,
Resistless thou wilt sweep the nations over;
And then must every soul
Prepare to meet the One, who following after,
Appeareth in the East,
And wakeneth all men from death's dreamless slumber,
The greatest and the least.
So, "wind of the dead men's feet," blow softly,
Until shall dawn that day,
When, strong and terrible, thou wilt give warning,
That all things pass away.

FLORENCE PEACOCK.

* "Tradition authorises the expectation that our Lord will appear in the East, therefore all the faithful dead are buried with their feet towards the East to meet him. Hence in Wales the east wind is called 'the wind of the dead men's feet.'" "Burial Customs," by England Howlett (The Westminster Review, August, 1893).

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for September opens with a paper on "Sin," by Dr. R. W. Dale, which, though simply a sober statement of the ordinary Christian doctrine in so far as it is Biblical, is valuable as proving the action of the new study of Biblical theology on an eminent practical divine. Prof. J. T. Marshall replies to Mr. Allen's article and Dr. Driver's note on his learned and acute papers on the Aramaic Gospel. It is much to be hoped that he may find leisure to work up his papers into a volume. That he should have been hurt by the tone of his criticisms is regrettable; but we still think that the hesitation of scholars (both those who have spoken and those who have not) to follow him, except a very little way, was very natural. Mr. G. B. Gray discusses the parallel passages in Joel, in their bearing on the question of date. His paper gives evidence of sober, critical judgment; though, in his opening statement, that Joel must be either of the ninth century or post-exilic, and in his closing inference from the undoubted phenomena of post-exilic prophets that the post-exilic psalms must have had pre-exilic psalms as models, his usual caution deserts him. Oort long ago showed that there was something to be said for assigning at any rate a part of Joel to the close of the Jewish State; and König, a very cautious critic, gives the whole book to this period. Nor does anyone doubt that there were pre-exilic psalms; but some critics are unconvinced that psalms like ours, either in style or in religious sentiment, can have been written in the period of Isaiah or even of Jeremiah. Dr. Bruce continues his remarkable studies of St. Paul, and Dean Chadwick his eloquent defence of disputed miracles in the life of Christ. Mr. Darlow gives a suggestive note on Galilean fish-curing.

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for September, in its opening paper by Dr. Knappert, gives a wholesome blow to the conventional "pastoral theology" of one's youth, and generously recommends an orthodox German presentment of "scientific practical theology." Dr. Van Manen continues his masterly studies on the Peter-Gospel. The author used, he thinks, one or more narratives, especially a "Hebrew Gospel," either in the original text or in a Greek translation. This work is not to be identified with the common starting-point of our Gospels, but is later than that. The author of the Peter-Gospel was not a born Jew, and probably lived in East Syria; his work was known to and used by Justin Martyr, Ignatius, and Barnabas, perhaps also by the writer of the Didache, by Polycarp, Hermas, and Clemens Romanus. The Peter-Gospel is rather to be called older than younger than our canonical Gospels, because apparently it stands nearer to the oldest Gospel. Dr. Oort speaks favourably of Wildeboer's Old Testament Literature, referred to recently in the ACADEMY, and Dr. Van Manen gives warm praise to the Cambridge Texts and Studies, and other English works of textual criticism.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SEPTUAGINT VERSUS THE HEBREW TEXT OF THE BIBLE.

Athenæum Club: August, 1893.

It is a curious fact, that while a close and vigilant criticism has been recently applied to every statement in the Old Testament, so little should have been done in recent years to fix the text of perhaps the most important of its versions: namely, the Septuagint. It has been taken for granted, without evidence or proof, that such venerable Greek MSS. such as the Alexandrinus, the Vaticanus, and the Sinaiticus, because they contain the Greek Bible, therefore contain the Septuagint version of the Greek Bible; and it has been the fashion to style editions directly dependent on these and similar sources as editions of the Septuagint. Assuredly this is a most inconsequent proceeding.

In regard to Daniel the fact is admitted. We know from the statement of Jerome that the Septuagint version of that book was excluded from the Greek Bibles by the early Christians in favour of that of Theodotion. I have tried to show in the ACADEMY that the canonical Ezra and Nehemiah, and probably also Chronicles as contained in the early Greek codices, also represent another version than the Septuagint, which latter version we have in part preserved to us in the First of Esdras. All this assuredly throws the gravest doubt on the claims which have been continually and continuously set up, on behalf of the older Greek codices, that they preserve for us the Septuagint version. It might be well, therefore, before the syndicate of scholars proceed further with the scheme initiated at Cambridge for publishing a critical edition of the Septuagint, that some definite conclusion should be arrived at on rational grounds as to what the Septuagint really was.

On a priori grounds it is assuredly very improbable that these old MSS. preserve for us the unsophisticated Alexandrian text. Those who argue as if it does, entirely underrate the influence of Origen upon the Bible. The result of his collation and of his critical work in the Hexapla and the Tetrapla was to secure for the Christian world what it sorely needed, namely a fairly uniform edition of the Bible; and this was attained, as it would seem from many facts, by accepting Origen's eclectic text and dropping his asterisks and oboli. In this way a text was created, and generally received very much as the Textus Receptus of the Greek Bible and the Vulgate of the Latin Bible was received in later days; and it was this eclectic text of Origen's (with inevitable variants) which, it seems to me, found its way into the old Greek MSS. Because it was a Greek text of the Old Testament, it became the fashion to refer to it as the Septuagint. No doubt it embodies large portions of the Septuagint translation; but it also, probably, embodies large portions of the translations of Theodotion, Symmachus, &c., which preserved not the Septuagint tradition, but the Hebrew tradition.

The question is one of the highest importance. In fact, I know of no question of equal importance in Biblical criticism; for if we can only reach and secure the unadulterated and unsophisticated Alexandrian version, we shall have secured by far the best text available for recovering the contents of the Old Testament books as originally written. In the letters which you have permitted me to print on the book of Esdras, I have tried to show, not only that that book represents the true Septuagint version, but that it is in its contents and arrangement incomparably superior to the Hebrew text, which, instead of preserving for us the oldest tradition, has been mangled, rearranged, and altered by the Jewish Rabbis at Jamnia, to whom we can trace it.

On this point I should like to say something more. I would first remark, however, that Dr. Gwynne writes to me to say he is convinced that the Greek of Esdras I. is from the same hand as the Chisian Daniel which is usually accepted as the Septuagint version of Daniel. This is another piece of evidence to be added to the many I have already adduced in favour of Esdras I. being the Septuagint version. I am more concerned, however, in this letter to argue that the Septuagint, if recovered, would prove a much more satisfactory authority than the Masoretic text. It seems to me that this is notably so in regard to the Book of Daniel. The narrative in the Hebrew Daniel has been admittedly disarranged, and the order of its paragraphs is entirely confused. The Alexandrian text, on the other hand, as has been previously remarked, has its paragraphs in much better and more logical order. Not only so, but it is much more complete.

The Septuagint Daniel contains not only that part of the book contained in the Masoretic text, but also incorporates the so-called additions, viz., Bel and the Dragon, Susanna and the Elders, &c., which form as much a part of its text as any other part of the book. The notion that the so-called additions were Alexandrian fabrications, and did not belong to the original work, seems to me to be entirely based either upon dogmatic a priori grounds or upon a morbid advocacy of the Masoretic text; and, to be most arbitrary, Origen distinctly accuses the Jews of having withdrawn the history of Susanna purposely from the people.

In our day Fürst, in his well-known work on the Canon, published in 1868, speaks very definitely about these so-called additions having existed in Hebrew. The fact that Susanna and the Elders, Bel and the Dragon, the Prayer of Azariah, and the Song of the Three Children should be referred to in the Talmud and Midrash, seems to me almost conclusive that they existed in a Hebrew or Aramaic version. For the Prayer and the Song Fürst quotes Perash 118a, and Karmel II., 3, 166, and for Bel and the Dragon Ber rab c 68, &c.

De Witte-Schrader has argued that there was a Chaldean original for these additions. He quotes a large number of Chaldaisms on page 508, Note c, of his well-known work.

Fürst sums up thus in regard to these additions: "Es ist mehr als zweifelhaft für deren Grundsprache die Griechische anzunehmen."

This is assuredly very interesting and important. It has always seemed to me an extravagant notion that the Alexandrian Jews in Ptolemaic times should have foisted stories of this particular kind into a book so much thought of by the later Jews. Neither the matter nor the manner of the stories can be reconciled with such a theory. It seems, on the other hand, that they belong to the same mintage as the story of Daniel in the lion's den, the story of Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego, &c., and that they formed an integral part of the original work. If so, it seems equally probable that they were cut out of the text when it was rearranged; and this was, in all probability, done by the Jamnia Rabbis, to whom I have previously attributed the cancelling of the story of Darius and the three young men, and that it was done in order to reconcile the book better to public opinion, to relieve it from a story, such as that of Susanna, not too creditable to the priestly caste, and for other reasons. Whether these additions were originally in Hebrew or in Aramaic is another matter. The probability is that the greater part of them, like large parts of Daniel, were in Aramaic; but it may be that this was not the case in regard to all, for Berthollet has argued that the Prayer of Azariah is by a different author to the Song of the Three Children. In the former the Hebrew names of the three men are used instead of their Persian titles. Lastly, I would suggest as a possibility, and it is only a possibility, that the Aramaic parts of Daniel, including such portions of "the additions" as may have been written in Aramaic, were parts of the same Aramaic Chronicle from which other parts were abstracted in Ezra or Esdras I. The dialect is the same, the style is the same, and it may well be that the compiler of Daniel, like the compiler of Ezra or Esdras, abstracted portions of a once continuous work. If the extracts are not from the same work, they must be from some very nearly contemporary one.

My object, however, is not to discuss this side issue, but to point out that the Hebrew text of the Bible, before which so much incense has been burnt in recent times, and which was the sheet anchor of the last Revision, ought to be discarded in favour of the Septuagint. It ought to be discarded, not because the Septuagint was the Bible of Christ and the early Christians, but because the Masorets have not preserved the original text, but one prepared and edited by Jews, as lately as the second century A.D., for polemical and other purposes, and because, instead of being reliable, the Hebrew text has been disarranged and otherwise tampered with by its promulgators. The appeal is not from a Greek translation to the original text of the Bible, but from an honest Greek translation to a Bible mutilated by Rabbi Akiba and his men—for various reasons, some uncritical, others probably sinister. I hope to pursue the subject in another letter.

HENRY H. HOWORTH.

MR. FREEMAN AND THE "QUARTERLY REVIEW."

Sept. 5, 1893.

It is scarcely a surprise to learn that Mr. Archer has, "of course, no intention of replying" to the article on "The Battle of Hastings" in the current Quarterly Review. To discover that your arguments, as Mr. Freeman's champion, can be instantly and effectually confuted by simply quoting Mr. Freeman's words, is not for any man a pleasant experience; and when the other little shifts to which you are driven in default of any valid rejoinder are laid bare to the public gaze, it is not wonderful that you should lose your temper, as Mr. Archer has lost his.

My article, which gives its references throughout, may be safely left to speak for itself; but as Mr. Archer—in the cloud of dust he raises to cover his retreat—finds himself once more driven to his favourite tactics, it becomes necessary to expose his latest misrepresentations.

1. As to escu, carefully avoiding, as usual, quoting my own words, he paraphrases them thus:—

"The reviewer proceeds to lay down that the mediaeval word escu invariably means a shield, i.e. is never used in a metaphorical sense."

My own words were (p. 85):—

"It was obviously, therefore, incumbent on Mr. Archer to vindicate the rendering by 'barricades' of a term which is one of the commonest in Wace, and which, as everyone knows, invariably means shield."

Mr. Archer now triumphantly produces passages which are—not from Wace, but from more poetical writers, conveniently ignoring his own dictum that "Wace is no rhetorician, but a very plain speaker" (Cont. Rev., p. 351).

Secondly, Mr. Archer omits to mention that the English escuz occur twice over (ll. 7815, 7823) in the "crucial passage," and that, in the second instance, as I showed (Q. R., p. 85), he himself abandoned his own fantastic rendering, and translated the word, as I do, by "shields" simply (Cont. Rev., p. 351), thus hopelessly contradicting himself.

Thirdly, he also suppresses the fact that the word is rendered as "boucliers" by Pluquet, who, as a Frenchman, Mr. Archer has reminded us, "should have known better than to mistranslate his own language" (Cont. Rev., p. 340). As Pluquet's rendering was the same as mine, it is comforting to reflect that he must share with me the charge of being "ignorant" of his own tongue.

2. The charge that my rendering of pel proves me to be "ignorant of old French" is so audacious in its sheer misstatement that it is difficult to qualify it in permissible language.

Mr. Archer actually writes:—

"The reviewer renders 'il ne doterent pel ne fosse' by 'They dreaded neither stake (i.e., stick) nor fosse' . . . This blunder is as bad as it would be to translate our English 'Hue and Cry' by the French 'complexion et plainte'; or better still, our English 'Christmas-box' by 'Coup de Noel.'"

Only those who have read my exposé of Mr. Archer's tactics can be prepared for the crushing reply that: (a) the words quoted are not to be found in my article; (b) the words in question are Mr. Archer's own.

Incredible as it may sound, the "blunder" he denounces was perpetrated by himself! As, unlike Mr. Archer, I always prove my statements, I here append the exact words from his article and from mine:—

MR. ARCHER.

QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"Again, in line 8499, 'As to the solitary the Normans came on, and 'dreaded neither stake nor ditch'; 'Ne Wace's account of the battle (l. 8499) he himself renders the word, not 'palisade,' but 'stake' (p. 96)."

Every reader of these lines can decide for himself this issue. He will see that my alleged "blunder" consists in faithfully quoting Mr. Archer's own word—

"The very head and front of my offending Hath this extent, no more."

Mr. Archer now indignantly claims that pel, here, "has a definite meaning—'palisade.'" Why then had he not the courage so to render it? Why did he feel bound to give it the literal meaning "stake"? He must take the consequences of so doing. For my part, I did not give it a rendering, I purposely confined myself to quoting his own.

Judging from this amazing example, it is as well, for Mr. Archer's own sake, that he did not "go on for two or three hours exposing the Quarterly Review's other blunders." We know now what this bluster is worth.

But before taking leave of "Old French," I will ask Mr. Archer whether he imagines that either or both of the words he selects—ais and pel—would be chosen to describe that "net or hurdle-work of trees and trunks," which formed, in his opinion, the "barricade" (Cont. Rev., p. 352). If he does, it will be my turn to comment on his knowledge of "Old French."

As to Mr. Archer's attempt to renew his juggle about the "fosse," I need only refer him to my last article (pp. 86-8) where he will find it duly exposed. He now once more attempts to confuse a fosse down in the valley with what he requires—a fosse round the camp on the hill.

But, after all, what is the use of his attempting, by all these devices, to shirk the real issue? It is "pretty," as Pepys would have said, to see how he and his friends take to flight as soon as I confront him with it.

τῶν δ', ὡς τε ψαρῶν νέφος ἔρχεται ἡ ἐκ τοῦ οὐλοῦ κεκλήγοντες, ὅτε προῖδωσιν ἰόντα κίρκον, ὃ τε σμικρῆσι φόνον φέρει ορνίθεσσιν, ὡς ἐρ' κοῦροι Ἀχαιοὶ οὐλον κεκλήγοντες ἴσαν, λήθοντο δὲ χάριται.

That issue is simplicity itself. Mr. Archer boasts, in his letter, that he has "proved" (Cont. Rev., pp. 348-351) that the "crucial" passage in Wace cannot possibly describe a shield-wall, and that, I have "found it convenient to slide over" his proof. Not at all. I have relied (a) in my first article; (b) in the intervening correspondence; (c) in my second article—on the one indisputable fact that Mr. Freeman (in his latest edition, remember) asserts, in the only place in which he quotes this "crucial" passage (p. 763), that it describes, and describes well, "the array of the shield-wall." Now Mr. Archer set out by asserting "Mr. Freeman to have been entirely right in the view he took of the whole question" (Cont. Rev., p. 344). Therefore as I say (Quarterly Review, p. 88):—

"Although in our previous article (p. 14) we had insisted on the fact that Mr. Freeman himself had explicitly pronounced the disputed passage to be a description of the shield-wall, and had thus freed us from the necessity of discussing it; although Mr. Archer had thus had the fact pressed upon his notice, he found that his only chance of even attempting a reply lay in coolly ignoring a fact in the presence of which his elaborate argument collapses like a house of cards. And to this policy he has continued to adhere."

To that policy he adheres still. For he must either throw Mr. Freeman over, and thus abandon his whole position; or he must eat his own words, and declare that he is wrong after all. And so I leave him writhing on his own pel, indifferent as to which of these courses he may find himself driven to adopt.

In tale stato, in così dubbia sorte
Cedron non place, econtrastar non vale :

E tai piavono in te nembì d'affano
Che se sperio o disperio, o si o paventi, Diverso è 'l rischio, e sempre ugual fia'l danno.

As Mr. Archer has now chosen "Old French" as his battle-ground, it is amusing to note that in his own article he devoted a whole section to the "additional evidence from Benoit de Ste. Maur" in his favour, and claims that "Encombros ert li leus" can be best interpreted "as referring to the rude barricades behind which the English had entrenched themselves" (p. 346). This desperate attempt to twist even one word into the sense he wants receives no countenance from Benoit's editor, Michel, who, in his glossary renders "encombres" as "escarpé, impracticable," referring to this very passage:

"Encombros ert li leus e haut Ou esteient les genz Heraut";

nor will Mr. Archer derive comfort from Godefroi, who renders the word: "qui embarrasse, qui arrête par les difficultés qu'il présente, fâcheux." In other words, the English position was a difficult one to attack, from the nature of the ground. But Mr. Archer will doubtless retort that Michel and Godefroi, like myself, were "ignorant of Old French."

THE QUARTERLY REVIEWER.

THE RESPECTIVE POSITIONS OF PATRICK AND PALLADIUS.

Ballyclough: Sept. 5, 1893.

The outline Mr. Nutt has given of Prof. Zimmer's Nennius Vindictus is of great interest to students of early Irish history, but his view as to the respective positions of Patrick and Palladius seems a little difficult to understand.

Assigning the death of Patrick to the middle of the fifth century, with all recent authorities, he may be presumed to hold also the earlier date of his mission. Nennius gives it as 405; but as Palladius is said by Prosper to have been sent in 431, how can Patrick "have taken up his abandoned mission"?

The Rev. Dr. B. McCarthy, in his Todd Lecture (p. 19), states that in the original draft of the Chronicle of Marianus Scotus (ob. 1082) the two missions were stated but not correlated. After quoting Prosper as follows: "Ad Scotos in Christum credentes ordinatus a papa Celestino Palladius primus episcopus missus est," the MS. went on: "Sanctus Patricius genere Britus a sancto Celestino," &c. Here nothing is said as to the order of their coming; but, according to Dr. McCarthy, Marianus went over the Chronicle supplementing and altering the work of his amanuensis, and in this place he inserted "Post ipsum" before "Sanctus Patricius," thus determining the position of Patrick as subsequent to that of Palladius. At first then it would seem it was not settled; and the change now referred to, with others of minor importance in this entry, was probably made to bring the Chronicle into conformity with later tradition. Wherever Palladius' mission is placed, it involves formidable difficulties. But in fact the passage from Prosper is classed by Haddan and Stubbs with the fictitious story of King Lucius and Pope Eleutherus (Councils, vol. i., p. 25). It is entirely uncorroborated; while another of his statements, that Celestine "fecit barbaram insulam [Ireland] Christianam," is directly contrary to the Book of Armagh and all native authorities, who represent his mission as a failure.

F. OLDEN.

"DRYTHE" AND "SHOULD."

Rochester: Sept. 9, 1893.

This word is commonly used in the part of Kent where I live. My gardener has several times lately lamented to me the effect of the "drythe" on the garden. It seems to be precisely equivalent to "drought."

Probably "R. B.'s" London tradesman came from the North of England. In Cumberland or Westmorland "Bismarck should say" would be at once understood to mean "Bismarck was reported to have said." So in German, "der Friede soll geschlossen sein" means "peace is said to be concluded." "Hopkins should say," in the instance from Lord Herbert given by "R. B.," means in like manner, "Hopkins was reported to have said." J. C.

Bere Alston, Devon: Sept. 11, 1893.

The word "drythe," to which Mr. C. L. Perkins refers, is common enough in Devonshire as a synonym for "drought"; but the oddest form of the word that I have met with is "draught" (pronounced "draff"), which was used repeatedly to me in the same sense the other day by a market gardener in South Devon.

With "should" as a sign of the past tense in narration, as described by "R. B.," I have been familiar all my life in Devonshire. "Then Farmer Harris he shud stand up before all the gentry, and he shud say," meaning simply, so far as I understand, "stood up and said," though possibly with an idea of marking the statement as important or as deliberately made.

There is a curious word, "mock," used in the cider districts of this county (Devon) for the pulp of the apple after the cider has been pressed out. Is anything known of this word? It is an odd coincidence, if nothing more, that "marc" is the name in French for the pulp of the grape after extraction of the wine. It is also used for dregs, coffee-grounds, &c. I have no litré at hand; but if I remember rightly, Brachet says that the derivation of "marc" is unknown. A. C.

London: Sept. 9, 1893.

I have heard the word "drythe" used by labourers in Kent; the labourers in question were working on a farm near the village of Hearne. The following expressions are, perhaps, also worth recording: "The ground is quite sod," for "the ground is quite wet"; "it queers me," for "it makes me feel queer"; "the flies do terrify the animals so," for "the flies worry the animals so"; and "looker-ing," for "looking after," used with reference to sheep and cows. All the above phrases I heard in Kent.

CHARLES E. FRANCK.

Cardiff: Sept. 9, 1893.

During the past summer my wife spent some time in Cornwall at a little village about two miles from Fowey, and there noticed that the word "drythe" was in constant use. One old woman said to her, "Butter is dear, but this 'drythe' is to be blemmed for it, me deare."

SCIENCE.

"SOURCES OF SANSKRIT LEXICOGRAPHY." Edited by Order of the Imperial Academy of Sciences of Vienna. Vol. 1. The Anekārthasamgraha of Hemachandra. Edited, with Extracts from the Commentary of Mahendra, by Th. Zachariae. (Vienna: Alfred Hölder; Bombay: Education Society's Press.)

THE Imperial Academy of Sciences at Vienna has undertaken to publish a small series of original Sanskrit Glossaries, of which the first volume has been just issued. It contains a critical edition by Prof. Zachariae, of Hemachandra's Anekārthasamgraha, or Collection of Homonyms, which gives the meaning of upwards of four thousand words. Mahendrasūri, a pupil of Hemachandra, composed the commentary on his teacher's work after the latter's death, about the end of the twelfth century A.D. The commentary is too bulky to be given entire. The editor has, therefore, wisely confined himself to printing such extracts as are likely to be of material interest to students of Sanskrit. We would rather have a competent editor act on this plan than wait for an opportunity to edit the complete work, which, after all, may perhaps never offer.

The materials at the disposal of the editor were so good, and the commentary is so explicit, that the present text of Hemachandra's work may be regarded for all practical purposes as faultless. This is one advantage. For the old Calcutta print was altogether untrustworthy, and its countless erroneous readings have occasioned many a mistake in our dictionaries. Another, and an even greater advantage, is that we now have in the commentary authentic explanations of the meanings of the words. The want of such an help must have been seriously felt by European compilers of Sanskrit dictionaries, whenever they had to deal with words and meanings for which no examples could be adduced from the printed texts.

A few instances will make this plainer. When the editors of the St. Petersburg Dictionary gave the meanings of the word Kala, they must have been in doubt how to translate Hemachandra's and Medinikāra's explanation ajirna. For ajirna has many meanings; and, in the absence of a reference or quotation, they had nothing to guide them but probability or the precedent in H. H. Wilson's Dictionary. They adopted from the latter "undigested, unverdant"; but they were wrong, as we now can see from the commentary, which explains the word by jarārahita, "not old or not decrepit with age," and adduces a metrical passage in support of that meaning, from what source we are ignorant. Similar is the case with mandūka, to which the meaning sonake is attributed. The editors of the St. Petersburg Dictionary, following Wilson, render in this instance sonaka by "Bignonia Indica"; but the commentary explains it by nadabheda, the name of a particular river.

These examples, which might easily be multiplied to a considerable extent, show how great an importance the works planned in the Vienna series will have for future compilers of Sanskrit dictionaries. They contain the results of the lexicographical labours of many a generation of native scholars. And though we may not always be disposed to follow blindly the native authorities, we, at least, now learn what they really mean, and are thus enabled to control them effectively.

It is impossible to speak in terms of too great praise of the manner in which Prof. Zachariae has done his work, for which he proved his competence long ago by his edition of the Sādvata Kosha (Berlin, 1882), and by his learned Beiträge zur indischen Lexicographie (Berlin, 1883). The text of the original is singularly free from errors, and that of the commentary is, in general, as correct as the condition of the MSS. permitted to make it. Prof. Zachariae has identified a great many of Mahendra's quotations; and though about half of them still remain untraced (a portion of which might, perhaps, even now be identified), still the patient labour of the editor, in hunting up fragments of verses through a very extensive literature, must have been enormous. It is to be hoped that the supervising committee of the Vienna Academy will ask Prof. Zachariae to bring out more numbers of the new series. He is sure to do them in the same satisfactory manner as the first, which augurs well for those to come.

The volume is got up in the best style of the Bombay Education Society's Press. It will be an ornament to the book-shelves of every Sanskrit scholar.

HERMANN JACOBI.

PHILOLOGICAL BOOKS.

A New Dictionary of the Portuguese and English Languages, based on a Manuscript of Julius Cornet, by H. Michaelis. In 2 volumes, Portuguese-English and English-Portuguese. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.) This dictionary is a distinct improvement, on the whole, upon the works of Vieira and Lacerda. We do not lay as much weight as the compiler does upon the mere fact of its being bulkier and containing a greater number of words than its predecessors. For the additional words seem to be chiefly technical terms, which are so similar in all languages, and so easily intelligible from their derivation, that it is hardly a praiseworthy quality in a lexicographer to include them. Where Dr. Michaelis deserves credit is in inserting under the heading of most of the important words a far greater number of idiomatic uses or phrases than other dictionaries contain. To give an instance, Saudade is one of the most difficult Portuguese words to translate into English. It has no exact equivalent which renders its mingled sense of regret, melancholy longing, and passion. Dr. Michaelis translates it: "Longing, ardent wish or desire," which is hardly complete, but among the phrases which follow he gives: "I long mightily to see him, to be home-sick, to have a longing or hankering for one's own country, I die with impatience to see him, he was missed by everybody," &c., which render something of its sense, and afford a glimpse of its poetical feeling. It need only be added that the dictionary is one of a series being published by Brockhaus of Leipzig, and is well and most carefully printed.

WE have received the second fasciculus—the first appears not to have reached us—of Norges Indskrifter med de ældre Runer, udgivene for det Norske Historiske Kildeskriftfond ved Sophus Bugge. (Christiania: Brøgger.) The present part deals with the Fonnaas brooch and the inscribed stones of Einang and By, and is illustrated with engravings. The discussion of the inscriptions is very elaborate, and is characterised throughout by the author's wonderful ingenuity and learning. If in some points the interpretations cannot be regarded as certain, the fault is in the subject. Many of Prof. Bugge's new results seem to us conclusively established. A long excursus on the rune called in the Old-English futhorcs eoh or ih will probably be accepted as settling the long-voiced question of the value of this letter. Prof. Bugge's exhaustive investigation shows that it represents the two sounds of which its name is composed—the unvoiced palatal spirant, and a vowel sound between i and e. As to the origin of its form he declines to offer any opinion, wisely considering that the existing materials afford no scientific basis for deciding the question. This excursus contains some interesting attempts at decipherment of the Freilaubersheim, Osthofen, Nordendorf, and Charnay inscriptions. The first of these Prof. Bugge reads Boso wræt runa: odiþo mal ina goim[?], and translates "Boso carved the runes: may the sign of blessedness [i.e., the cross] preserve him"; he considers the language to be Lower Frankish or Saxon, odiþo being the genitive plural of ōdiþa=audiþa. In the Charnay inscription the author thinks that the puzzling ubfnbai is a transposition of unþa fabi, and he translates the whole sentence as "Liano has given it to her bridegroom Idda." This is admittedly not altogether satisfactory, but it yields at least a more plausible sense than does Henning's version. Prof. Bugge propounds an extremely ingenious theory to account for the fact that the old Z rune has in the later shortened Scandinavian alphabet the sound of e and y, as well as the sound of -r (the etymological representative of the original z). His view is that the rune ȝr or ēr of the later alphabet is a blending of two different runes of the original series, deriving its form and its consonant power from the old Z rune, and its names (ȝr < iūwaz, ēr < ihwaz) from the old ih rune. The various functions which the letter had as a vowel are accounted for by the variety in the initial sound of the name. We are glad to observe the author's emphatic testimony to the services rendered to runic studies by Prof. Stephens, whose unfortunate deficiencies in philological science have too often been allowed to prevent his really great merits from receiving due recognition.

WE regret to hear of the death of Prof. Eduard Schwan, of Jena, of whose well-known Grammatik des Altfranzösischen (Leipzig: Reisland; London: Williams & Norgate) a second edition has just appeared. The work has undergone thorough revision, and in its present form is probably the best and most convenient existing compendium of Old-French phonology and accidence. As in the first edition, the author has confined himself strictly to Central French, the phenomena of the other dialects being seldom referred to even for the sake of illustration. If this restriction be, from one point of view, a defect in the book, it has the advantage of rendering possible a degree of simplicity and clearness of treatment that could not otherwise have been attained.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN LITERARY SOCIETY, IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.—(Tuesday, Sept. 5.)

E. A. CAZALET, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. A. G. Nash read a paper on "Sport in Russia." He mentioned the famous trotters of the stud of Count Orloff, which are the pride of the rich Russian merchants. He enumerated the various species of game birds which abound in Russia. The wily bustard in the south and the methods of outwitting it were dwelt on in some detail. Wolf-hunting in its original phases presented considerable entertainment. The exciting and dangerous encounters of the Russian peasants in bear-hunting, as practised by their primitive methods in the governments of Archangel and Olonetz were new to those not initiated in that sport. In the course of his paper, Mr. Nash made the following remarks as regards wolves:—"The Russian wolf is a much misunderstood animal. I was always led to believe that fierce packs of hungry and gaunt wolves, almost countless in their numbers, ranged over the country far and wide, lurking in the forests bordering the high road, and springing out on the hapless traveller who was reckless enough to travel in the winter. To my terrified imagination, these wolves made a point of refusing all the provisions cast to them by the fugitives, and were only to be appeased by the gradual abandonment of the traveller's family, commencing with the baby! As a matter of fact nowadays, these harrowing incidents are almost entirely confined to Siberia, and even there they are not matters of daily occurrence. A wolf in summer is a most cowardly and harmless animal, running away at the sight of a shepherd-boy with a stick. The only danger in summer is from mad wolves, who occasionally run amuck like mad dogs. In autumn, when the wolves begin to feel the pinch of hunger, they become more daring, seizing cattle in the field at night, even when guarded by shepherds. In winter they join company, but I have never heard of more than a score of wolves in a pack, and even that number is exceptional in Kowsk and Borenesch governments (but in the north they abound). They will, especially in severe winter, attack and carry off domestic animals from villages before dawn, and then retreat to the impenetrable forest. A description of the steppe at dawn will interest even those who are not sportsmen. "Now, at about six o'clock in the morning, we are all ready to start, for there is a ride of about eight or nine versts to the forest. The hounds, which enter the wood and force the wolves to break cover, are like harriers; they have already left for the scene of action in the charge of the huntsman and his assistant, linked together in couples for the present. Let us mount and be off. Each horseman wears a truculent-looking dagger, and holds in a long leash a couple of superb wolf-hounds, 30 inches high at the shoulders, beautiful as the day and staunch as steel. Leaving the park gates, the cavalcade enters the steppe. What a splendid sight meets the eye! At the edge of the limitless horizon the rising sun shoots his level rays across the vast expanse of the steppe, touching with light here and there the gleaming gilded cupola of a distant village church, and charging the earth and sky with a thousand rich and glorious colours. The fleecy white mists seem to roll together along the ground as the sun rises higher, chased by a pure healthful breeze uncontaminated by the breath of crowded cities or the smoke and stench of clanking mills and factories. This, indeed, is freedom: here is a glimpse of earth as God created it." Mr Nash expressed the opinion that the Russian nation was fond of sport, and he gave instances of pluck and energy, and especially of endurance and patience, which are worthy of admiration. Most Russian landowners are keen sportsmen, and their hospitality and kindness is proverbial. A polite request for permission to shoot on their land is almost invariably followed by a hearty assent, with directions as to the most likely places to find game.—This paper was followed by a discussion, in which some of the gentlemen present related their own experiences or those of their friends, who had found a wide field for their sporting proclivities in the virgin forest and boundless steppes of Russia.—M. Mortimer H. de Larmoyer, the director of the Institute of Mercantile Education, which has been established on Streatham Common, read a paper in which he described the advantages of modern education combined with a thorough knowledge of the art of trade, which is unfortunately too much neglected in this country. The divine, the lawyer, the physician have all to undergo a preliminary course of systematic training, while the future merchant is not only stunted in his general and primary education, but wastes his time in acquiring a smattering of Latin and Greek, of which he is never able in after life to make a practical application. The lecturer expressed the opinion that the Mercantile Institute, which was opened on January 18, by Sir Mountstuart E. Grant Duff, would supply a long felt want. In view of the great commercial development of Russia, and the friendly relations which the Anglo-Russian Society was promoting with that country, it might be anticipated that young Russians, in whose country commercial schools were certainly far less numerous than other educational establishments, might perhaps be induced to profit by the advantages offered to them in England. The Russian language was also mentioned in the prospectus, and might, perhaps, be useful to English young men whose future commercial relations and correspondence would place them in direct connexion with Russia.—In the discussion which followed, M. de Larmoyer's views were approved in sympathetic terms, and votes of thanks were awarded to the authors of both the papers.—The president announced that on Tuesday, October 3, at 3 p.m., papers would be read on "Russia and Great Britain in the East," by Mr. H. G. Keene; "Shakspeare in Russia," by Mr. A. Kremlov, in Russian; and a speech on patents, also in Russian, would be delivered by M. Borzenko, a Moscow barrister, who is on his way home from Chicago.

THE BRISTOL INDUSTRIAL AND FINE ART EXHIBITION.

II.

BAXTER-TYPE.

It would seem that the passion for collecting, when once it has taken possession of a man with time and means, is ever leading him on, causing him to sigh with Alexander for new worlds to conquer, driving him restlessly to "fresh woods and pastures new."

Mr. Frederick Mockler having quietly acquired all that was collectable of the relics of worthy Dr. Edward Jenner, starts anew on a voyage of discovery. He adopts the tactics successfully employed by other astute collectors, and resolves to get into his cabinet of curiosities all that is procurable of that now obsolete process, the printing in oil colours from wood blocks, to the perfection of which George Baxter devoted his life and energies. There are no examples extant of later date—in this gathering at all events—than 1858. If you inquire in the Print Room of the British Museum, you will ascertain that it can show no more than sixty examples. In the fine art section of the Bristol Industrial and Fine Art Exhibition, Mr. Mockler shows about one hundred and ninety: some of them duplicates of the same picture, but differing in colour. This was a peculiar feature of the process, that no two impressions were turned out exactly alike. Some prints are in monochrome, say a light brown, and others of the same picture in colours; while others again of the same picture show a somewhat different scheme of colouring.

A short sketch of his life will at the same time tell the story of the inception and progress of his art. George Baxter, Mr. Mockler tells us in the preface to his catalogue, was born at Lewes in Sussex in 1806, where his father was in business, and where George no doubt worked with him. In 1827, J. Baxter, of 37, High-street, Lewes, printed and published a little work, entitled Baxter's Select Sketches in Brighton, Lewes, and their Environs, with a Series of Engravings in Wood. In 1835 were published four little works, called The Heavens, The Earth, The Air, The Sea, in each of which were a frontispiece and vignette, printed in oils by George Baxter. This was the first year of his patent. In 1833 George Baxter was still working with his father, and there appeared Baxter's Agricultural and Horticultural Gleaner, embellished with two little woodcuts in colours. At the end is this advertisement:

"Mr. George Baxter, engraver in Wood, begs to inform publishers that, after several years' arduous labour, anxiety, and expense, he has succeeded in an art for which he has had granted to him His Majesty's Letters Patent. It is a new mode of printing in Oil Colours Landscapes, Portraits, Animals, Flowers, &c., for the embellishment of Works. N.B.—Woodcuts designed and engraved in a superior style."
